MONDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1836.

The Senate assembled at 12 o'clock, M.

The VICE PRESIDENT took the chair, and the following Senators appeared in their seats, viz:

Mr. RUGGLES, from Maine; Messrs. HUBBARD and PAGE, from New Hampshire; Messrs. PRENTISS and SWIFT, from Vermont; Mr. DAVIS, from Massachusetts; Messrs. KNIGHT and ROBBINS, from Rhode Island; Messrs. NILES and TOMLINSON, from Connecticut; Mr. WRIGHT, from New York; Messrs. SOUTHARD and WALL, from New Jersey; Messrs. BUCHANAN and MCKEAN, from Pennsylvania; Mr. BAYARD, from Delaware; Mr. KENT, from Maryland; Mr. RIVES, from Virginia; Mr. KING, from Georgia; Messrs. EWING and MORRIS, from Ohio; Messrs. CLAY and CRITTENDEN, from Kentucky; Messrs. GRUNDY and WHITE, from Tennessee; Messrs. HENDRICKS and TIPTON, from Indiana; Messrs. ROBINSON and EWING, from Illinois; Messrs. KING and MOORE, from Alabama; Mr. WALKER, from Mississippi; Messrs. BENTON and LINN, from Missouri.

Mr. BENTON presented the credentials of Messrs. FULTON and SEVIER, Senators elect from the new State of Arkansas.

Messrs. FULTON and SEVIER were qualified and took their seats.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. BENTON, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes in which the Senators of the State of Arkansas shall be inserted, in conformity with the resolution of the 14th of May, 1789, and as the constitution requires.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, it was then

Ordered, That the Secretary put into the ballot box three papers, of equal size, numbered 1, 2, 3. Each of the Senators from the State of Arkansas shall draw out one paper. Number 1, if drawn, shall entitle the member to be placed in the class of Senators whose term of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1837; number 2 in the class whose term will expire the 3d day of March, 1839; and number 3 in the class whose term will expire the 3d day of March, 1841.

It was accordingly so determined, by lot, that Mr. SEVIER's term should expire in 1837, and Mr. FULTON's in 1841.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Secretary of the Senate was directed to inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate was present, and ready to proceed to business.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, a committee was ordered to be appointed on the part of the Senate, on a joint committee of both Houses, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of both Houses of Congress are assembled, and ready to receive from him such communication as he may be pleased to make.

Messrs. GRUNDY and SWIFT were appointed by the Chair members of said committee, on the part of the Senate.

Mr. LINN offered the usual resolution to supply the members of the Senate with newspapers during the session. Adopted.

The CHAIR presented the following letter of resignation from the Secretary of the Senate:

WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 5, 1836.

SIR: I herewith resign the office of Secretary of the Senate of the United States.

Having so long possessed the confidence of the Senate, and enjoyed such continued and friendly intercourse with its members, it is with feelings of deep and painful sensibility I now separate from them; and these feelings are greatly increased, when I reflect on the courtesy and kindness I have received from yourself, as the presiding officer of the Senate, and on the uniform and unbroken confidence and friendship which have for so many years subsisted between us. No length of time or change of circumstances will ever efface from my mind the recollections growing out of these associations; and I shall always rejoice to hear of your prosperity and happiness, and of that of every member of the Senate.

WALTER LOWRIE.

HON. MARTIN VAN BUREN,
Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, it was Ordered, That the Chief Clerk of the Senate perform the duties of Secretary till a Secretary shall be appointed.
Mr. MACHEN accordingly took the usual requisite oath.
The Senate then adjourned till 12 o'clock to-morrow.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6.

The annual message from the President of the United States was received, and read by the acting Secretary, and five thousand copies of the message and the accompanying documents were ordered to be printed. (See appendix.)

DEATH OF Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH.

Mr. KENT rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: Yonder vacant seat, heretofore so ably and so faithfully filled, but too significantly indicates the object of my addressing you at this time.

I rise, sir, for the purpose of announcing to you and to the Senate the melancholy intelligence of the death of my very worthy and excellent colleague, the late ROBERT H. GOLDSBOROUGH. He departed this life during the late recess, after a short illness, in the midst of his usefulness, and at a period when we should have been justifiable in allotting to him many years of vigorous health.

But few individuals have occupied a greater space in public estimation in his native State than Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. He filled, from an early period of his life, with no inconsiderable degree of reputation, various public stations, and was twice elected to a seat in this body. Possessing the advantages of a liberal education, which had been well improved, with the most polished address, he was ever found a ready and efficient debater, remarkable for his courtesy and politeness. He was truly said to have been "a man of manners and of letters too."

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH's exertions for the benefit of his fellow men were not confined to public life. He was prominent as an agriculturist, making frequent and judicious experiments, enforcing his views by very able essays, thereby directing the attention of the agriculturists to such objects as were calculated to ameliorate and improve the condition of his exhausted lands. Truly exemplary in all the relations of private life, as a friend, neighbor, and in the domestic circle, he was unrivalled.

To me, personally, his loss is truly afflicting. A severe hoarseness, under which I have labored for some time, obliges me to be thus brief. I beg leave to offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Honorable ROBERT H. GOLDSBOROUGH, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape round the left arm."

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

On motion of Mr. KENT, the Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7.

Mr. BROWN, Senator from North Carolina, and Mr. NICHOLAS, Senator from Louisiana, were present to-day in the Senate chamber.

Sundry communications were laid before the Senate, from the heads of Departments, by the Vice President.

MADISON'S WRITINGS.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of ANDREW JACKSON, Jr. Esq. his private secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit, herewith, copies of my correspondence with Mrs. Madison, produced by the resolution adopted at the last session by the Senate and House of Representatives, on the decease of her venerated husband. The occasion seems to be appropriate to present a letter from her on the subject of the publication of a work of great political interest and ability, carefully prepared by Mr. Madison's own hand, under circumstances that give it claims to be considered as little less than official.

Congress has already, at considerable expense, published, in a variety of forms, the naked journals of the revolutionary Congress, and of the conventions that formed the constitution of the United States. I am persuaded that the work of Mr. Madison, considering the author, the subject-matter of it, and the circumstances under which it was prepared—long withheld from the public as it has been by those motives of personal kindness and delicacy that gave tone to his intercourse with his fellow men, until he and all who had been participators with him in the scenes he describes, have passed away—well deserves to become the property of the nation; and cannot fail if published and disseminated at the public charge, to confer the most important of all benefits on the present and every succeeding generation—accurate knowledge of the principles of their Government, and the circumstances under which they were recommended, and embodied in the constitution for adoption.

ANDREW JACKSON.

December 6, 1836.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, the reading of the correspondence was dispensed with, and it was ordered to be printed.

EXPUNGING THE JOURNAL.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that on the first day on which there was a Senate sufficiently full, he should ask leave to introduce a resolution to expunge from the journal certain sentences thereon. He would state, at the same time, that the resolution he should introduce would be in the same words as the one introduced by him at the last session, and it was his wish that the resolution might be disposed of by the Senate, before the other important business of the session commenced.

After transacting some other business the Senate adjourned.

STATEMENTS OF COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

The following resolution, moved by Mr. BENTON, of Missouri, being under consideration—

Resolved, That the annual statement of the commerce and navigation of the United States be hereafter printed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and be communicated in a printed form as soon as possible after the commencement of each stated session of Congress."

In supporting the resolution, Mr. B. observed that this document being always a very extensive one, consisting almost entirely of figures, great delay was unavoidably incurred in the printing of it, insomuch that, under the existing practice, it was seldom obtained in time, and the Senate was usually a year in arrear in its reception. To remedy this inconvenience an order had been passed some sessions since requiring its earlier preparation; but this had not answered the end. The measure proposed in the resolution would, he believed, be the only effectual means of putting Congress in possession of this important document as early as was desirable.

Mr. KNIGHT said it was not his design to make an objection to the resolution, but to inquire whether any extra copies are to be printed under it? This document, said he, is an important one, and an extra number of copies are always ordered to be printed by the Senate. It is one of the most profitable to the printer among all the documents printed—containing mostly rule work and figures. If the usual extra copies are printed by order of the Secretary of the Treasury, distributed in the usual manner, and at the same price, I do not know as I have any objection; but the number of copies and the price of printing should be stated in the resolution.

Mr. BENTON called for the reading of the original order under which the document was prepared; but some delay occurring in turning to it, the subject was for the present laid upon the table.

Several bills were introduced on leave and passed to the second reading.

After fixing upon next Monday for the appointment of the standing committees and the election of a Secretary of the Senate, the Senate adjourned over to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 12.

Mr. BLACK, Senator from Mississippi, Mr. TALLMADGE, Senator from New York, and Mr. WEBSTER, Senator from Massachusetts, appeared to-day, and took their seats.

STATEMENTS OF COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

Mr. BENTON called up the resolution he had offered on Thursday last, respecting an alteration in the mode of printing the annual report from the Treasury on commerce and navigation.

Mr. KNIGHT moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting—

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the annual statement of the commerce and navigation of the United States be hereafter printed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and communicated as soon as possible after the commencement of each stated session of Congress, and that said statement be printed in the same form and at the same price as the ordinary printing of the two Houses of Congress; that the same number of copies as are usually printed be furnished for the purpose of binding and distribution, and that five thousand additional copies be equally distributed to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. BENTON said that, on looking further into the existing law providing for the printing of this document, he had become convinced that some such modification of the resolution was necessary as had now been proposed. The only objection he had to it related to the five thousand additional copies to be printed for the Senate; he thought this number larger than necessary, and proposed that it be reduced to three thousand.

Mr. KNIGHT assenting, the resolution was so modified accordingly, and in this form it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.

On motion of Mr. KING, and in accordance with the Senate order of Thursday last, the Senate proceeded to ballot for a Secretary of the Senate, in place of WALTER LOWRIE, Esq. resigned.

On the first ballot, Mr. ASBURY DICKINS received 20 votes; Hon. ARNOLD NAUDAIN, late of the Senate, 18; scattering 3; 21 being necessary to a choice.

On the second ballot, Mr. DICKINS received 21; Mr. NAUDAIN 18; Mr. BRYAN 1; 21 being necessary to a choice.

Mr. DICKINS was accordingly declared to be duly elected Secretary of the Senate.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

The Senate proceeded to ballot for the chairmen of their several standing committees.

The several elections resulted as follows:

Mr. BUCHANAN, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, by 21 votes.

Mr. WRIGHT, chairman of the Committee on Finance, by 20 votes.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, chairman of the Committee on Commerce, by 20 votes.

Mr. NILES, chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, by 22 votes.

Mr. PAGE, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, by 21 votes.

Mr. BENTON, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, by 26 votes.

Mr. WALL, chairman of the Committee on the Militia, by 19 votes.

Mr. RIVES, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, by 20 votes.

Mr. WALKER, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, by 21 votes.

Mr. LINN, chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, by 21 votes.

Mr. WHITE, chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, by 29 votes.

Mr. HUBBARD, chairman of the Committee of Claims, by 19 votes.

Mr. BROWN, chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, by 18 votes.

Mr. GRUNDY, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, by 21 votes.

Mr. ROBINSON, chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, by 22 votes.

Mr. HENDRICKS, chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, by 21 votes.

Mr. TOMLINSON, chairman of the Committee on Pensions, by 31 votes.

Mr. KENT, chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, by 19 votes.

Mr. MORRIS, chairman of the Committee on Engrossed Bills, by 25 votes.

SENATE.]

Memory of Mr. Kinnard—The Treasury Circular.

[DEC. 13, 14, 1836.]

The election of the remaining members of the committees was deferred until to-morrow.

MEMORY OF MR. KINNARD.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, of Indiana, it was Resolved, That, in memory of the late Hon. Mr. KINNARD, a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Indiana, the members of the Senate wear crape on the left arm for the space of thirty days. And then the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 13.

ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., elected Secretary of the Senate, appeared to-day, was qualified, by taking the prescribed oath, and took his seat.

After transacting the usual morning business,

The Senate proceeded by ballot to choose the remaining members of the respective standing committees, whose chairmen had been appointed yesterday. The result was as follows:

On Foreign Affairs.—Messrs. Buchanan, Tallmadge, King, of Georgia, Clay, Rives.

On Finance.—Messrs. Wright, Webster, Cuthbert, Nicholas, Benton.

On Commerce.—Messrs. King, Davis, Linn, Brown, Ruggles.

On Manufactures.—Messrs. Niles, Morris, Black, Hubbard, Preston.

On Agriculture.—Messrs. Page, Morris, Kent, McKean, Clay.

On Military Affairs.—Messrs. Benton, Preston, Tipton, Wall, Ewing, of Illinois.

On Militia.—Messrs. Wall, Hendricks, Swift, Ewing, of Illinois, Moore.

On Naval Affairs.—Messrs. Rives, Southard, Tallmadge, Cuthbert, Nicholas.

On Public Lands.—Messrs. Walker, Ewing, of Ohio, King, of Alabama, Ruggles, Fulton.

On Private Land Claims.—Messrs. Linn, Porter, Bayard, Preston, Sevier.

On Indian Affairs.—Messrs. White, Swift, Tipton, Linn, Sevier.

Of Claims.—Messrs. Hubbard, Tipton, Prentiss, Crittenden, Ewing, of Illinois.

On Revolutionary Claims.—Messrs. Brown, White, Hubbard, Crittenden, Niles.

On the Judiciary.—Messrs. Grundy, Crittenden, Morris, King, of Georgia, Wall.

Having proceeded thus far, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14.

Mr. CALHOUN, Senator from South Carolina, appeared to-day in his seat.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, the message of the President on the subject of the proposed publication of Mr. Madison's History of the Convention, was, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on the Library.

When the morning business had been disposed of—

Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.—Messrs. Robinson, (chairman,) Knight, Grundy, Brown, Niles.
Committee on Roads and Canals.—Messrs. Hendricks, (chairman,) McKean, Robinson, Nicholas, Page.

Committee on Pensions.—Messrs. Tomlinson, (chairman,) Prentiss, Hubbard, Morris, Sevier.

Committee on the District of Columbia.—Messrs. Kent, (chairman,) King of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Buchanan, Nicholas.

Committee on Engrossed Bills.—Messrs. Morris, (chairman,) Page, Fulton.

Joint Committee on the Library.—Messrs. Robbins, Preston, Wall.

THE TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The following resolutions, introduced by Mr. EWING, of Ohio, being at their second reading:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Treasury order of the eleventh day of July, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, designating the funds which should be receivable in payment for public lands, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

"Resolved, also, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to delegate to any person, or to any corporation, the power of directing what funds shall be receivable for customs, or for the public lands; nor shall he make any discrimination in the funds so receivable, between different individuals, or between the different branches of the public revenue."

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, spoke as follows:

Mr. President: When I presented these resolutions, a few days since, it was suggested by the Senator from Missouri, over the way, [Mr. BEXTON,] that he would oppose them at their second reading, for the purpose of being early heard in support of the order which it is their principal office to rescind. With this I am entirely satisfied. I also wish to be heard on a subject which is of vital interest to the State which I represent, and to the whole West; and I concur with him most heartily in this expedient to avoid delay in bringing before the Senate, and sending abroad to the nation, the opinions of members of this body on this important subject. I, therefore, in accordance with that suggestion, which seemed to meet the sanction of the Senate, will now proceed to give my views upon the order which these resolutions propose to rescind.

This extraordinary paper was issued by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 11th of July last, in the form of a circular to the receivers of public money in the several land offices in the United States, directing them, after the 15th of August then next, to receive in payment for public lands nothing but gold and silver and certificates of deposits, signed by the Treasurer of the United States, with a saving in favor of actual settlers, and bona-fide residents in the State in which the land happened to lie. This saving was for a limited time, and expires, I think, to-morrow. The professed object of this order was to check the speculations in public lands; to check excessive issues of bank paper in the West, and to increase the specie currency of the country; and the necessity of the measure was supported, or pretended to be supported, by the opinions of members of this body and the other branch of Congress. But, before I proceed to examine in detail this paper, its character, and its consequences, I will briefly advert to the state of things out of which it grew.

I am confident, and I believe I can make the thing manifest, that the avowed objects were not the only, nor even the leading objects for which this order was framed; they may have influenced the minds of some who advised it, but those who planned, and those who at last virtually executed it, were governed by other and different motives, which I shall proceed to explain.

It was foreseen, prior to the commencement of the last session of Congress, that there would be a very large surplus of money in the public Treasury beyond the wants of the country for all their reasonable expenditures. It was also well understood that the land bill, or some other measure for the distribution of this fund, would be again presented to Congress; and, if the true condition of the public Treasury were known and understood, that its distribution, in some form or other, would be demanded by the country. On the other hand, it seems to have been determined by the party, and some of those who act with it thoroughly, that the money should remain where it was, in the deposit banks, so that it could be wielded at pleasure by the Executive. Hence the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made to the two Houses of Congress on the 8th day of December, 1835, (doc. 2, page 2,) makes the aggregate balance in the Treasury, on the 1st day of January, 1836, no more than $19,147,000; but now the controversy is ended, he shows, in his report of the 6th of December, 1836, that the true amount of that balance was $26,749,803, making an error of $7,602,803. There enters into this, and thence arises the egregious error, an estimate of the receipts for the last quarter of the then current year. After three quarters of that quarter had elapsed; after this was in the hands of inferior officers, and, in the ordinary course of business, within the knowledge of his several bureaus at Washington, receipts within that quarter of about seven millions, he estimates the aggregate receipts for the whole quarter at $4,950,000, whereas the true amount, as now reported, was $11,950,000, making a difference in the receipts of that single quarter of seven millions. I think I am very safe in saying that this most extraordinary error never would have occurred in this report if it had been the wish of the Executive to parade before the nation a very prosperous state of the public Treasury, and a large receipt for the year 1835. If nothing had been feared about the land bill or distribution project, the estimate for that quarter would probably have equalled the actual receipts.

The statement of the Secretary, however, showed a surplus; but he proceeds to calculate it away in the year 1836. He conjectures that the receipts of that year will amount to $19,750,000, and of this he allows the public lands to produce $4,000,000. The whole receipt being less, by about $4,000,000, than sufficient to sustain the estimated expenses of the year. But in his report of December 6, 1836, he gives the receipts of the same year at $47,691,898; more, by about $28,000,000, than his estimate; and of this the public lands yield $24,000,000, six times the amount of that estimate.

These facts are striking; and if the errors originate in mere mistake, which I am willing to believe, they indicate a most extraordinary degree of ignorance as to the business of the country, and the direction of its capital, or a mind easily biased and led into error by preconceived opinions.

But Senators, in the course of the debate which afterwards sprang up on the land bill, went much farther than the Secretary of the Treasury. They denied, and most unequivocally, that there was any surplus, or that there would be any: and, when some of us offered an estimate of what would be the receipts into the Treasury in the current year, we were told that it would be very difficult to fasten that estimate upon us at this session of Congress. I, however, for one, determined to relieve gentlemen from all trouble on that score, as far as regarded myself. On the 15th of March, 1836, I submitted my estimate of the revenues and expenditures of the current year, in a speech which I caused to be printed in pamphlet form. In this I estimated the receipts from customs for the year at - - - $19,000,000
The public lands at more than - - - 20,000,000
And I made the whole amount on hand, and received and receivable, in that year, in round numbers, without deducting expenditures - - - 77,000,000

lands $24,000,000—about the sum which I had supposed. And the footing of the column in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which answers to my estimate of $77,000,000, is $74,441,702, being two and a half millions less than I conjectured. More than this deficit, however, is accounted for by the fact that the bank stock which I had supposed would fall in, within the current year, has not yet been sold, or the avails of it received into the Treasury.

When the true state of things became too obvious to be any longer successfully contested; when it became apparent to every one here and to the public that there was a large amount of public money lying in the deposit banks, and likely to remain there for years, an injury to the public, and beneficial to nobody, except bankers and brokers; and when no other means seemed to offer of resisting a distribution of this fund, the country became suddenly threatened with a foreign war—and, at one time, the walls of our Capitol were actually threatened with demolition by the great guns of the French navy—we were in imminent danger of invasion, and appropriations to the amount of more than $80,000,000 were called for by gentlemen who are in favor of economy and reform, to enable the Executive to prepare for defence. But this spectre vanished. Then we were threatened with Indian invasion and Indian massacre on our whole Northwestern frontier. The squabble with a miserable horde of naked savages in the swamps of Florida, which has engaged the attention of this warlike administration for the last year, was magnified into a general and formidable rising of all the tribes east of the Rocky mountains, and military preparations were called for that we might be in armor to do battle with them. At last a report of the Secretary of War, sanctioned by the President, put an end to all this absurdity; the deposit bill passed, after a desperate struggle, and then came this measure—the Treasury order—intended to destroy its effect.

This order grew out of the contest to which I have referred. It was issued not by the advice of Congress or under the sanction of any law. It was delayed until Congress was fairly out of the city, and all possibility of interference by legislation was removed, and then came forth this new and last expedient. It was known that these funds, received for public lands, had become a chief source of revenue, and it may have occurred to some that the passage of a Treasury order of this kind would have a tendency to embarrass the country; and as the bill for the regulation of the deposits had just passed, the public might be brought to believe that all the mischief occasioned by the order was the effect of the distribution bill. It has, indeed, happened, that this scheme has failed; the public understand it rightly, but that was not by any means certain at the time the measure was devised. It was not then foreseen that the people would as generally see through the contrivance as it has since been found that they do.

There may have been various other motives which led to the measure. Many minds were probably to be consulted, for it is not to be presumed that a step like this was taken without consultation, and guided by the will of a single individual alone. That is not the way in which these things are done. No doubt one effect hoped for by some was, that a check would be given to the sales of the public lands. The operation of the order would naturally be, to raise the price of land by raising the price of the currency in which it was to be paid for. But, while this would be the effect on small buyers, those who purchased on a large scale would be enabled to sell at an advance of ten or fifteen per cent. over what would have been given if the United States lands had been open to purchasers in the ordinary way. Those who had borrowed money of the deposit banks and paid it out for lands, would thus be enabled to make sale to advantage, and by means of such sales make payment to the banks who found it necessary to call in their large loans, in order to meet the provisions of the deposit bill. The order, therefore, was likely to operate to the common benefit of the deposit banks and the great land dealers, while it counteracted the efforts of the obnoxious deposit bill.

There may have been yet another motive actuating some of those who devised this order. There was danger that the deposit banks, when called upon to refund the public treasure, would be unable to do it; indeed, it was said on this floor that the immediate effect of the distribution bill would be to break those banks. Now this Treasury order would operate to collect the specie of the country into the land offices, whence it would immediately go into the deposit banks, and would prove an acceptable aid to them while making the transfers required by law. These seem to me to have been among the real motives which led to the adoption of that order.

But one of the good effects which it was said this order would produce was, that it would prevent overissues of the banks, especially in the West. Such an opinion, however, if sincerely held, must have grown out of a very narrow view of our commerce and currency. There were no overissues, save by the deposit banks only, and with respect to them the order would have no such effect. They had made very great loans to land speculators; but that business was cut off by the distribution bill. That bill straitened those banks, and forced them to draw in their loans: and it was strongly resisted on that very ground; so strongly, indeed, that it was not until within two days before the passage of the bill that the opposition could be brought to believe that they could succeed in passing it. Some of the deposit banks had in their vaults public money to the amount of three times their nominal capital. The regular commerce and business of the country did not employ much beyond that capital; the residue could only be applied to extraordinary purposes. The progress of trade is steady. The commerce of the country advances in a regular manner. It would not absorb this sudden increase of banking resources, but the extra capital found an outlet in loans for the purpose of purchasing public land. Large amounts of specie were borrowed from the deposit banks and paid into the land offices, whence it was soon after returned to the banks, and loaned again for the same purpose. The distribution bill put an end to this: it went at once to cut up this business by the roots. The banks were required to pay back all the money deposited with them over and above three-fourths of the amount of their capital actually paid in; of course their loans were at once cut short. The Treasury order, therefore, could not be required to do what was already done by an act of Congress. The patient had already been depleted: no sooner was the regular physician gone, but then in comes the quack doctor, and at once cuts an artery, to make the remedy perfect.

It has been said in the President's message, and in the report of his Secretary, that all the banks of the country were in the habit of making overissues of paper, and that this Treasury order was needed as a check upon such issues. It is a mere assumption; an entire mistake. Where is the evidence to prove it? I speak now, of course, of that part of the Union where I reside, and with which I am best acquainted, and where this order has had its chief effect, and I say that the assertion is wholly unfounded. I know, indeed, that the amount of banking capital has been increased of late years: it may, sometimes, and in some places, have been too extensive, but it never was so there. There never has been in that part of the Union too much banking capital. The banks have increased their issues, but they have not made excessive issues. The course of business with us has changed of late. Four or five years ago we sent our stock alive on foot to market: our flour went to New Orleans—little or none of it went to the North. It then took us from sixty to ninety days to get our returns. But now, since the opening of our canal, we have a Northern as well as a Southern market; and, according to the present course of trade, it takes the merchant from six to ten months to make his returns. He must purchase his produce, let it lie by him till the canals open, then ship to New York, and thus in about ten months realize the proceeds. One thousand dollars turned three times is the same in the business of the country as three thousand turned but once. Of course, as the time is three times longer, we want three times the amount of money to do the same business. This has rightly increased three-fold the amount of bank issues. Besides, banks do not issue their notes upon the specie in their vaults—the notion is utterly fallacious: it is the staple produce of the country which those bank notes purchase; it is the pork and flour of the West, and the cotton and sugar of the South; that is the true capital on which the banks make these issues. The business of the country could not be transacted if the issues of bank paper were based on the amount of gold and silver alone. Our banks at the West are solely commercial. They make loans for no other purpose than purposes of trade; at least if they know the purpose to which it is to be applied. They do not knowingly loan their money for the purpose of purchasing public land, nor even for the purpose of building or other improvements. A man, to be sure, may obtain a loan, and go and buy land with the money, but that is not the course of our bank business. A merchant buys $100,000 worth of pork or flour on acceptances in New York; he borrows the money to buy it; but it is the produce which is the capital that the bank paper represents; it is that which pays the debt. None of our banks expect that gold and silver are to be demanded for their notes. Drafts are demanded; these drafts meet the bills of exchange; and thus the whole transaction is settled. And who calls this overtrading? It is not overtrading. It is apportioning bank issues to the demands of commerce, and nothing more. This currency answers all the purposes of gold and silver. Gold and silver are useless save so far as they represent exchanges. It was such overtrading, however, which the Treasury order put a stop to. It did stop it most effectually. No bank in the West dare now, or has dared since the emanation of this order, to make any loans or any issues. On the contrary, the banks, as soon as it appeared, all fortified themselves against apprehended danger, and with one accord shut their doors against all loans whatever. Nor dare they open them again until that order shall be taken out of the way, unless, indeed, the course of business should unexpectedly change. Commerce, as we all know, is one of the most ductile things in the world, and it may by circumstances be forced into a new channel; and when it has just scooped out for itself a new course, then, I suppose, some other executive order will be thrown in to check or obstruct the smooth onward flow of the current.

In my speech of the 15th of March last, to which I have adverted, I explained the manner in which the public funds were made to pay for the public lands—performing a circuit from the deposit banks to the speculator; from him to the land office, and from the land office to the deposit banks again—thus operating the exchange of the public lands by millions of acres to large purchasers for mere credit. I was denounced for this at the time; but the President has adopted (an honor which I duly appreciate) the very sentiment, and almost the language which I then used, in his recent message; and he tells us that the Treasury order was intended to remedy this evil—an evil which Congress had, in fact, remedied effectually before the issuing of that order. It would have been a fortunate thing if the mischief had been discovered sooner by the executive officers, and the abuse corrected before it became a subject of investigation before Congress.

Another object to be effected by this order is the putting down a paper, and putting up a gold and silver currency. This is its purpose, while its effect has been to banish almost entirely gold and silver from among us. No such thing is now to be heard of. You cannot, in the West, unless it be in towns, get a five dollar bill changed into specie in a ride of thirty miles; not that the banks do not pay specie for their notes, but the effect on the community is the same as if they did not. In consequence of this order, all purchasers of land exchange their notes for gold and silver. In the town in which I reside, there is a bank well provided with resources, and within a circuit of thirty or forty miles there are six or seven more equally strong. Before the issuing of this Treasury order, the paper of these banks constituted the currency of that region of country; but, as if touched by the wand of an enchanter, that whole amount of paper has vanished from circulation: not a dollar of it is to be seen. The men who had it carried it to these banks to get gold and silver, and the banks, having redeemed it, shut it up in their vaults, where it remains to guard their gold. There are still some notes in circulation, but they are notes on remote and inconvenient points—on distant banks in Ohio, on Western Pennsylvania, Western New York, Michigan and Virginia. Our local banks used to receive their bills as cash, and, as the course of business permitted, send them home for exchange; but now they husband their own notes, and pay them out, so that paper of this kind constitutes nearly all our circulation, and they are so mixed in small parcels on each bank that it would cost nearly half their value to send them home and cash them. This is our gold and silver currency. The amount of our produce last year was unusually great, and our supply of pork this year, consequent upon it, is very large. There is now a great demand in the Eastern cities for all we have to dispose of: our merchants are well inclined to purchase, but they cannot do it, they deal more or less in borrowed capital, and our banks dare not lend them. They have tried to get money at the East, but the Eastern banks would not loan, because their paper would immediately return upon them. Some of our adventurous men thought of a third expedient: they would go to an intermediate point in Western New York, where no trade centres, and try to get a loan there, because it would be so long before the money would make its way to the Eastern cities, and from thence return to the bank that loaned it. The plan has been tried, and I am told it has to some extent succeeded. I have myself seen bundles of notes issued in Michigan, and payable somewhere in the State of New York, making their way as welcome strangers among us; and such is the sort of currency with which we are obliged to do business; such has been the effect of tampering with the currency by individuals who know nothing of the matter. Currency is a thing which admirably regulates itself, which our merchants admirably regulate; but the hand of ignorance must not touch it. The interference of such regulators is like the effort of some rude giant to move the wheels of a machine which he does not understand: the only effect is to ruin the engine, or give it a motion directly the contrary of that which was intended.

Another alleged object aimed at by the order is to check speculation. And here we find a saving provision in favor of residents within the State, and of actual settlers. Thus a discrimination is made by the Executive between different classes of American citizens, entitled to equal rights under our constitution and laws. An attempt was made last winter to urge this same measure, or a part of it, upon Congress, but Congress refused its assent, and now it is forced upon the people by executive authority. No doubt it was supposed that the order would be unpopular without this exception, and would have an especially bad effect just before a presidential election. The sale was therefore so limited in point of time, as to continue just beyond the time of election, and then to cease. Can any other reason be assigned for the particular date fixed upon? There is a provision in the constitution directly in the face of this order. Those who drew up the order seemed to have been aware of it, and to have avoided employing the same words as are used in the article of the constitution. But it is not, therefore, any the less in violation of its provisions. The constitution declares that the citizens of each of the United States shall enjoy all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States; even the States themselves cannot discriminate. But this order gives to the citizens of one State a privilege which the citizens of no other State are allowed to enjoy—that of paying for public land in the ordinary currency of the country. With some, this argument will have but little effect, especially as it is directed against an executive act; but it is not, therefore, the less sound. But there is another which will find more favor when that will fail. The measure is unpopular; as far as it has been felt and understood, it is decidedly unpopular. It is universally condemned throughout the West, at least as far as my acquaintance extends. The very discrimination between citizens of different States is unpopular, as it is unconstitutional and unjust. It is easy, by a familiar example, to show the effect of this branch of the order, how it works in practice, and how it will strike the minds of plain common men. Two neighbors, farmers, whose lands are separated by the boundary line between Ohio and Indiana, each have sons for whom they wish to purchase land, and they set out together on a journey into the northwest of Indiana to make their purchases. They buy side by side, and enter the land in the same office; they are both citizens of the United States, and it is the United States that sells the land. Yet one of them, he who lives on the Indiana side, is allowed to pay in the ordinary currency of the country, while the other must pay in gold and silver. Yet their fences join; they can see the smoke of each other's chimneys, and nothing separates them but an imaginary line. Our Western people cannot perceive the justice of this. They do not understand it, and they do not like it; the thing is generally unpopular.

But now, sir, there is an expedient for getting rid of the effect of this order, which ordinary plain people do not think of. It is the easiest thing in the world for gentlemen who understand how to manage it. There never was any thing more happily contrived to enable those who are shrewd and experienced in business, to get a selection of the public lands, and all for paper. Suppose one of these gentlemen wishes to purchase ten thousand acres of land; he provides himself with no cart to lug about gold and silver to make the purchase, indeed, scorns that cumbrous kind of machinery; he takes an easier road. He just goes to three times as many of the neighbors as he wants thousands of acres of land, and he promises to treat them for the mere use of their names. That, you know, costs them nothing, and so A, B, and C, bonafide residents of the State in which the land lies which he wishes to enter, authorize him, under their hand, to enter land in their names. He makes his entry, pays for it in paper, and then gets the whole transferred to himself. This gentleman carried no specie; he did nothing to help the circulation of gold and silver, and yet very snugly gets possession, himself, of all the land he wants. The Treasury order is the very thing for him, while it keeps down the plain dull man that would otherwise be his competitor. Thus genius is patronized, and a gold currency introduced.

But this is not all. There is yet another way of evading the order; and it is provided for in the order itself. Any man may make a deposit of money in the Treasury of the United States, and a certificate of such deposit is receivable at the land office as so much cash. It is said, indeed, that this is according to a law of Congress. But what is the provision of that law? It is, that no man shall obtain a certificate for land till he pays the price of it into the office of a receiver, or into the Treasury of the United States. My construction of this law is, that the individual must have paid for that particular section of land, and not merely have made a general deposit of money. This, however, has been overlooked, and the ordinary course is to deposit a sum of money in one of the deposit banks; the certificate of which is sent to the Treasury, and then a Treasury certificate is issued for the same amount; and I am told that individuals have shaved honest purchasers on these certificates to the amount of fifteen or twenty per cent. It took them about a month to get this thing well into operation. But within the last two months there has been about $200,000 of this kind of specie capital created for the occasion. This is nothing but a fair sample of the practical effect of all attempts to juggle with the public money. The result always is the injury of ordinary industrious citizens, and the enriching and aggrandizing of those who are already rich, and who are keen-sighted and sagacious.

It has been said, and it is a familiar answer to objections such as I have now urged, that, notwithstanding all these difficulties, the price of produce is high, and that, therefore, what has been done to the currency has been for the benefit of the country. It is true produce is high, and what is the reason? We know in this country, from the papers, the wants of all parts of our extended community, and it has happened partly owing to a failure of crops, and partly from other causes, that grain is so scarce and in very great demand east of the mountains. It is nominally high with us in the West, but not as high as it should be in proportion to other things, because our traders cannot get funds to buy with, and competition in the purchase is put down. As the causes of these high prices are not generally understood, I will briefly sketch an outline of my views on that subject. There is an impression gone abroad that the people of the United States ought, of course, to be exporters of grain. But never was there a more incorrect idea. It is against the ordinances of nature, and the whole course of human things. We never can be exporters of grain unless there be war or famine in Europe. A great part of Europe, the north part of Asia, the north coast of Africa, Egypt, and the islands in the Mediterranean are all grain-growing countries. Grain is their great commodity. England, too, is a rich grain country. All these regions of the earth will supply their own demands for bread, and are destined to do so, while a large part of their clothing will be drawn from our great South.

We have at the North populous cities, extensive manufacturing; in addition to which, there is our immense marine, our navy, our merchantmen, our fishing vessels, all to be supplied from our own grain region. Yet we are seldom in the habit of reflecting that it is but a belt of about four or five degrees of latitude which, in this country, produces wheat advantageously. This comparatively small portion of our country is relied on to supply our whole northern continent, the West India islands, and South America, all of which are, in this point of view, entirely dependent upon us. Is it astonishing that the price of wheat should be high? It is no Governmental arrangement. It is not the skill of any administration which has given to our farmers the existing prices. Nor is it owing to any deranged or diseased state of the currency, or of commerce; these prices, in the general, will be maintained; for the price in this country must at last be regulated by the price at which grain can be imported from the Baltic and the Black Sea. And, indeed, we at the West have reason to complain of the prices we get in comparison with those which our staples command in the Eastern cities. I have lately seen it stated that pork is selling at Montreal at $30 per barrel, and at about the same rate in Boston; while in the West we get what is equivalent to about ten or twelve dollars per barrel.

[Mr. KING, of Alabama, here stated that the price was $30 in Mobile.]

The price, I am sure, is decidedly too low with us.

And now, sir, believing as I do that the Treasury order in question has been productive of all the effects I have stated, I hold that it ought to be rescinded, were it as a mere matter of policy. I am persuaded that its rescission would soon restore the confidence of the people of the West, now so extensively impaired. We ought to prevent the improper discrimination between specie and notes payable in specie. It would enable our banks to make loans to the amount of our produce, and no more. Those institutions with us are skilful and cautious; they make no loans for the purchase of public lands, nor for any object which will prevent its speedy return. In a word, they refuse permanent loans of every kind. Sir, I would prevent the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other Executive officer, from making an unwarrantable discrimination between different classes of the citizens of the United States. There should be no such discrimination. We have no right to set up the public property to sale, and then say to A or B this is the price if your business is so and so, or if your politics are of this complexion; but if not, you must pay a higher price. It is against the letter as well as the spirit of the constitution. I would abolish it. It ought to be abolished. It is peculiarly oppressive on the people of the West.

If there is to be a specie currency, why not try the experiment in our Eastern cities? Surely it would be more convenient there. A man in our Western region, if he selects a tract of land from the public domain, but is obliged to go away to get the money to pay for his purchase, loses his opportunity. His footsteps are tracked by the speculator or his agent, and the land is gone. If he would secure his section, he must carry his specie in his saddle-bags, and take a pistol in his hand to defend himself from robbers. Is it in this way you would compel your citizens to seek out their home upon the public domain? As soon as he finds a spot to suit him, he must carry away the specie to a land office; and whenever a large quantity accumulates there, an ox-cart, with a guard, must be employed to bring it back to the spot whence he got it. This, sir, has been all the specie currency of which we have heard so much. This is the active circulation of the precious metals. This is the way in which the Secretary makes up his statements on that subject. The money is carried one way in saddle-bags, and the other way in a cart. I would put an end to this state of things. I would try the hard money experiment, if it must be tried, on the seaboard, where it is easier to try it. As long as your land is offered at sale, it is lawful for all your citizens to buy it. You have no right to disfranchise any of them, under the plea of compelling them to get up a specie circulation.

It is said by the Secretary that he does not possess the same power over the deposit banks since the distributing act which he did before. He succeeded, he tells us, in keeping down the rate of the exchanges until the passage of that law. Now, sir, there is one species of control, which, if the Secretary do not possess, Congress does, and ought to exercise it. It is said that there are several of the deposit banks who have millions of the public treasure in their vaults, and who use it, by their officers or agents, in shav[ing] upon notes or exchanges. They take advantage of the difficulty of the times, and virtually act as brokers, thus keeping up the pressure and embarrassing the public, while they make enormous profits out of the public money. I would institute an inquiry into this matter, and if banks are guilty of practices of this kind, I would at least leave them to do it with their own money, and not with the money of the people of the United States.

Mr. BENTON observed that he should want to make some exposition of facts, which he thought would go far to invalidate the statements made respecting the previous effects of this Treasury order, and to demonstrate clearly what had been its practical and beneficial results. For this purpose he should want a little more time, in order to get the returns, and such other documentary evidence as it would be necessary for him to refer to. He should show then to the Senate, far more satisfactorily by facts, than the gentleman from Ohio had been able to do by argument, why the banks had been prevented from extending the usual accommodations to the public. While on his feet, he would say that he entirely concurred with the Senator from Ohio in his construction of the law as respected payments into the public Treasury, for the purchase of lands. It had been his opinion for sixteen or seventeen years past, that the law ought to be so construed, though it had remained but as a dead letter on the statute book. He remembered that some years ago a register of a land office in Missouri, construing the act as he and the Senator from Ohio did, refused to receive from a purchaser a Treasury certificate of deposit, and he (Mr. B.) was applied to by the individual to get the money returned to him.

He had, however, heard it said since his arrival here, (though he did not get his information from any officer of the Government,) that as soon as the attention of the Secretary was turned to the law, he had given it the same construction that had been given to it by himself and the Senator from Ohio.

While up, he would remark, that as to this large amount of surplus on hand to distribute, which showed that there was so great a mistake on the part of those who said that there would be none, (though they said so with the necessary qualifications, that the appropriations should be made in time to be used,) yet when they came to look at the President's message, they found that of this large surplus, fifteen or sixteen millions of it was appropriated money, which could not be used, because the year was half gone before the appropriations were made. This (said Mr. B.) we represented so often last session on this floor, that if walls had tongues, as they are said to have ears, they would again and again reverebrate the warning. But (said Mr. B.) the committees were so organized, being controlled by gentlemen who were in favor of distribution, and consequently anxious for surpluses, that the necessary appropriations were "staved off," for the purpose of making them.

In this way they might have surpluses in abundance at every session, and the whole revenue might, by keeping off the appropriations till too late to be used, be converted into surplus. It was almost incredible (Mr. B. said) to see the manner in which business was procrastinated at the last session. These few leaves, said Mr. B., (turning over a few pages of the acts,) contain every private act passed by Congress at the last session. They were Mr. Whittlesey's acts—acts sent up by the industry of one single man in the other House. Here, said Mr. B., (turning again to the volume,) are the remainder of the acts; and when you come to look at them, you will find that the appropriation bills were "staved off" until the last moment. He repeated, that if the appropriations had been made in time to be used, which would have been done had it not been for the extraordinary organization of the committees of that body, by which they were controlled by those gentlemen in favor of surpluses, the case would have been far different from what it was. There would not have been so much surplus to talk of, and there would have been no occasion for this new application of the term to an unexpended balance. It was a new idea to prevent the appropriations from being passed; and, instead of letting the money remain for two years before it could be called a surplus, as under the usage of the former law, to immediately seize upon it for distribution.

We have often (said Mr. B.) had fifteen or sixteen millions of surplus in the Bank of the United States, and not one word was said about it; and if the appropriations of the last session had been made in time to be used, (and there were many, too, that had been given up by their supporters,) there would be no more surplus in the Treasury now than had frequently been in the Bank of the United States, without causing excitement or alarm.

Mr. B. only rose to say that he concurred with the Senator from Ohio in his construction of the law as to Treasury certificates of deposit, and to state what he had heard, that the officers of the Government had given it the same construction. What he had further to say was, that some disposition of this resolution of the Senator from Ohio should be made, which would permit the ordinary business of the Senate to go on without interruption, and not to have the important bills attending the commencement of the session blocked out by a protracted debate. He wished that the resolution might be laid on the table for the present, to give him time to refer to the documents necessary to be used in reply to the Senator, and that the ordinary business of the Senate might go on.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed his assent to a postponement of the discussion, but hoped it would not extend beyond the residue of the week. He knew of no subject more important, or in which the public mind seemed at this moment to take a deeper interest. The condition of the country in reference to the currency was admitted on all hands to be greatly deranged. A state of things, indeed, existed which was anomalous and unprecedented; for while the price of all sorts of commodities was unusually high, there existed at the same moment a scarcity of money. Such a state of the pecuniary interests of the country called for investigation, and demanded the prompt attention of Congress. He concluded by expressing a hope that Monday might be fixed upon for the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. EWING had no objections to such an arrangement, though he was opposed to any unnecessary delay. He said a few words in reply to some of the remarks which had fallen from Mr. GAVNEY, disclaiming all agency in retarding the appropriations for the purpose of creating a surplus, &c. but reserved himself for the fuller discussion of the subject.

The resolution was then postponed to and made the order of the day for Monday.

STATEMENTS OF COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

The joint resolution introduced some days ago by Mr. BENTON, providing for the earlier preparation of the annual report on commerce and navigation was read a third time, and passed.

When the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15.

Mr. RIVES presented the credentials of RICHARD E. PARKER, Senator elect from Virginia; and

SENATE.]

Duty on Coal—Burning of the Post Office—Mr. Clay's Land Bill.

[Dec. 19, 1836.]

Mr. BROWN the credentials of ROBERT STRANGE, Senator elect from North Carolina.

DUTY ON COAL.

Mr. WEBSTER presented two petitions; one from John Haskell, and a great number of other persons; and the other from N. D. Snelling and others, of Boston, praying for a reduction of the duty on coal.

Mr. W. said these petitions were very numerous and respectfully signed, and he hoped the subject would attract the serious attention of Congress. The duty on coal, like that on salt, wheat, and wool, though not a duty on manufactured articles, was yet either originally laid, or is now continued, for purposes of protection. Indeed, coal was one of the articles first brought forward, after the establishment of this Government, as requiring and deserving protection. As these petitions, therefore, might be thought to affect a part of the general system of protection, he thought it proper to refer them to the Committee on Manufactures. Coal was a necessary of life; it was now very high, the price being nearly twice as great now, he believed, as when the duty was laid. He was of opinion that, unless this duty on coal was to be considered as a part of the general system of protection, it ought to be reduced, or perhaps repealed altogether. He hoped the committee would examine the subject and bring it to the consideration of the Senate at an early day. At the present price of fuel in the larger cities, a reduction in the price of coal is most desirable, if there exist against it no insurmountable objection.

The memorials were referred, as moved by Mr. WEBSTER, to the Committee on Manufactures.

BURNING OF THE POST OFFICE.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the following resolution, and moved its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the cause of the destruction by fire of the building in which were kept the General Post Office, the city post office, and the patent office.

Mr. CLAY suggested whether it would not be expedient to invest the committee with power to send for persons and papers, so far as there might be any papers remaining.

Mr. ROBINSON said the idea of the committee was that the proposed committee of inquiry should proceed in the duty assigned them till they should find it necessary to send for persons and papers, when they could readily ask and obtain the requisite power.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, so much of the President's annual message as relates to finances was referred to the Committee on Finance.

After disposing of various petitions, resolutions, and bills,

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, when the doors were opened,

Adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 19.

The CHAIR presented the credentials of Mr. BUCHANAN, elected a Senator by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, for six years from the 4th of March next.

After the reception and disposal of various petitions,

Mr. CALHOUN gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to continue the operations of the deposit act of the last session, so as to op-rate on the excess of revenue that may be received this year.

While up, Mr. C. said he would put a question to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. WRIGHT.] He wished to be informed by that gentleman whether his motion of Thursday to refer so much of the President's message as relates to finance to the Finance Committee, included that part of the message which relates to the reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government?

Mr. WRIGHT replied that he was unable to answer the question precisely. In making his motion, he had intended to refer all parts of the message relating to finance to the Committee on Finance. He had had no consultation with his colleagues as to how far they considered that portion of the message referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina, as coming under their consideration. Whether or not they considered it as more properly belonging to the Committee on Manufactures than to the Committee on Finance, he knew not.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he would then move, in order to remove all doubts on the question, that that portion of the message to which he had alluded, be referred to the Committee on Finance. He made the motion, because of its probably having a stronger bearing on the action of this body, and on political events hereafter, than any other question which might be brought before the Senate.

MR. CLAY'S LAND BILL.

Mr. CLAY, in pursuance of the notice which he had given, rose to ask leave to introduce the land bill. He felt it due to the occasion to make some explanations.

The operation of the bill which had heretofore several times passed the Senate, and once the House, commenced on the last of December, 1822, and was to continue five years. It provided for a distribution of the nett proceeds of the public lands during that period, upon well-known principles. But the deposit act of the last session had disposed of so large a part of the divisible fund under the land bill, that he did not think it right, in the present state of the Treasury, to give the bill—which he was about to apply for leave to introduce—that retrospective character. He had accordingly, in the draught which he was going to submit, made the last day of the present month its commencement, and the last day of the year 1841 its termination. If it should pass, therefore, in this shape, the period of its duration will be the same as that prescribed in the former bills. The Senate will readily comprehend the motive for fixing the end of the year 1841, as it is at that time that the biennial reductions of ten per cent. upon the existing duties cease, according to the act of the 2d March, 1833, commonly called the compromise act, and a reduction of one half of the excess beyond twenty per cent. of any duty then remaining is to take effect. By that time, a fair experiment of the land bill will have been made, and Congress can then determine whether the proceeds of the national domain shall continue to be equitably divided, or shall be applied to the current expenses of the Government.

The bill in his hand assigns to the new State of Arkansas her just proportion of the fund, and grants to her 500,000 acres of land as proposed to other States. A similar assignment and grant are not made to Michigan, because her admission into the Union is not yet complete. But when that event occurs, provision is made by which that State will receive its fair dividend.

He had restored, in this draught, the provision contained in the original plan for the distribution of the public lands, which he had presented to the Senate, by which the States, in the application of the fund, are restricted to the great objects of education, internal improvement, and colonization. Such a restriction would, he believed, relieve the Legislatures of the several States from embarrassing controversies about the disposition of the fund, and would secure the application of what was common in its origin, to common benefits in its ultimate destination. But it was scarcely necessary for him to say that this provision, as well as the fate of the whole bill, depended upon the superior wisdom of the Senate and of the House.

In all respects, other than those now particularly mentioned, the bill is exactly as it passed this body at the last session.

The bill was read a first time, and passed to a second reading.

PATENT OFFICE.

Ma. RUGGLES submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to examine and report the extent of the loss sustained by the burning of the Patent Office, and to consider whether any and what measures ought to be adopted to repair the loss, and to establish such evidences of property in patented inventions, as the destruction of the records and drawings may have rendered necessary for its security; and to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the committee was appointed by the Chair, and consists of the following gentlemen: Messrs. RUGGLES, PRENTISS, STRANGE, PAKER, and BAYARD.

The remaining portions of the President's annual message were appropriately referred to the various standing committees.

Several bills were introduced and appropriately referred, as also a number of resolutions submitted for consideration.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolutions, introduced by Mr. EWING, of Ohio, in the following words, being at their second reading, as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c. That the Treasury order of the 11th day of July, anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, designating the funds which should be receivable in payment for public lands, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

"Resolved, also, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to delegate to any person, or to any corporation, the power of directing what funds shall be receivable for customs, or for the public lands; nor shall he make any discrimination in the funds so receivable, between different individuals, or between the different branches of the public revenue."

Mr. BENTON said it was unusual to oppose joint resolutions at their second reading, but he had given notice of his intention to oppose this resolution, not for the purpose of attempting to arrest its course, but to excite attention and discussion, and to lay the foundation for a motion which he intended to make, namely, to send the subject to a committee, and to make it the duty of that committee to inquire into the operation and effects of the Treasury order proposed to be rescinded and into the conduct of the banks which affected to be crippled by it. This motion, and the scope and details of the inquiry, will be brought forward in due time.

The resolution consists of two clauses, the first clear, the second ambiguous. The rescision of the Treasury order, excluding paper from the land offices, was the object of the first clause; but the second was without specification, and making no allusion to the constitutional currency, and imposing no obligation on the Secretary of the Treasury to use or employ it, it seemed to him that the whole revenues of the Government might be made receivable in paper money. Funds is the word used in the resolution, a word which had no place in our constitution, nor in our legislation, previous to the imposition of the paper system upon us, and which had no definite or legal meaning. It is a paper system phrase, and, in the jargon of that system, is understood to comprehend all sorts of paper credits and securities, and all sorts of currencies, which can be made available in the payment of debts, or in the support of credit. It is a wretched phrase to come into legislation, and ought to be substituted by something of clear and precise import. Gold and silver is the language of our constitution, and to supersede them by the word "funds," is to banish them from our financial system, and to open the Treasury to the inundation of paper money.

In the observations which he should make upon these resolutions, Mr. B. said he should not confine himself merely to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] but looking further back and all around, and having due regard to what had preceded this motion, and which was indissolubly connected with it, he should treat the whole subject as it appeared before him, and as it had been exhibited to the public. He had especially in his eye a certain speech, delivered in Kentucky in September last, and a certain letter written in Philadelphia, in November last. Passages from each of these would be referred to at proper places; and paying due attention to these givings out, and to all the signs which had been visible for some months past in the political zodiac, he could see distinctly that two great objects were proposed to be accomplished by the instrumentality of this joint resolution: first, the condemnation of President Jackson for a violation of the laws and constitution, and the destruction of the prosperity of the country; and, secondly, the overthrow of the federal constitutional currency, and the imposition of the paper money system of the States upon the Government and people of the Union.

In the first of these objects the present movement is twin brother to the famous resolution of 1833, but without its boldness; for that resolution declared its object upon its face, while this one eschews specification, and insidiously seeks a judgment of condemnation by inference and argument. In the second of these objects every body will recognise the great design of the second branch of the same famous resolution of 1833, which, in the restoration of the deposits to the Bank of the United States, clearly went to the establishment of the paper system, and its supremacy over the Federal Government. The present movement, therefore, is a second edition of the old one, but a lame and impotent affair compared to that. Then, we had a magnificent panic; now, nothing but a miserable starveling! For though the letter of the President of the Bank of the United States announced, early in November, that the meeting of Congress was the time for the new distress to become intense, yet we are two weeks deep in the session, and no distress memorial, no distress deputation, no distress committees, to this hour! Nothing, in fact, in that line, but the distress speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] so that the new panic of 1836 has all the signs of being a lean and slender affair—a mere church-mouse concern—a sort of dwarfish, impish imitation of the gigantic spectre which stalked through the land in 1833.

That every thing might appear in its proper order, and every actor in this drama have his proper place, Mr. B. would now introduce passages from the speech and letter to which he had referred, reserving other passages for introduction in other stages of the proceedings. And first, from the speech:

"Mr. Clay proceeded to speak of the constant tampering with the currency, which marked the conduct of this administration. One rash, lawless, and crude experiment succeeds another. He considered the late Treasury order, by which all payments for public lands were to be made in specie, with one exception, for a short duration, a most ill advised, illegal, and pernicious measure. In principle it was wrong; in practice it will favor the very speculation which it professes to endeavor to suppress. The officer who issued it, as if conscious of its obnoxious character, shelters himself behind the name of the President.

"But the President and Secretary had no right to promulgate any such order. The law admits of no such discrimination. If the resolution of the 30th of April, 1816, continued in operation, (and the administration on the occasion of the removal of the deposits, and on the present occasion, relies upon it as in full force,) it gave the Secretary no such discretion as he has exercised. That resolution required and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to adopt such measures as he might deem necessary, 'to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in said legal currency of the United States.' This resolution was restrictive and prohibitory upon the Secretary only as to the notes of banks not redeemable in specie on demand. As to all such notes, he was forbidden to receive them from and after the 20th of February, 1817. As to the notes of banks which were payable and paid on demand in specie, the resolution was not merely permissive, it was compulsory and mandatory. He was bound, and is yet bound, to receive them, until Congress interfere."

From the letter of Mr. Biddle to Mr. J. Q. Adams, Mr. B. read as follows:

"PHILADELPHIA, November 11, 1836.

"MY DEAR SIR: I proceed to the second subject of our conversation—the present state of the currency—which I shall treat dispassionately, as an abstract question of mere finance.

"Our pecuniary condition seems to be a strange anomaly. When Congress adjourned, it left the country with abundant crops, and high prices for them—with every branch of industry flourishing, and with more specie than we ever possessed before—with all the elements of universal prosperity. Not one of these has undergone the slightest change; yet, after a few months, Congress will reassemble, and find the whole country suffering intense pecuniary distress. The occasion of this, and the remedy for it, may well occupy our thoughts.

"In my judgment, the main cause of it is the mismanagement of the revenue—mismanagement in two respects: the mode of executing the distribution law, and the order requiring specie for the public lands.

"Such a measure was of itself sufficient to disorganize the currency. But it was accompanied by another, which armed it with a tenfold power of mischief. This was the Treasury order prohibiting the receipt at the land offices of any thing but specie; an act which seems to me a most wanton abuse of power, if not a flagrant usurpation.

"The whole pecuniary system of this country, that to which, next to its freedom, it owes its prosperity, is the system of credit. Our ancestors came here with no money; but with far better things—with courage and industry; and the want of capital was supplied by their mutual confidence. This is the basis of our whole commercial and internal industry. The Government received its duties on credit, and sold its lands on credit. When the sales of land on credit became inconvenient, from the complication of accounts, the lands were sold for what is termed cash. But this was only another form of credit; for the banks, by lending to those who purchased lands, took the place of the Government as creditors, and the Government received their notes as equivalent to specie, because always convertible into specie. This was the usage; this may be regarded as the law of the country. By the resolution of Congress, passed on the 30th of April, 1816, it was declared that 'no duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States.'

"This resolution presents various alternatives—the legal currency or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or notes of specie-paying banks. A citizen had a right to choose any one of these modes of payment. He had as much right to pay for land with the note of a specie-paying bank, as to pay it for duties at the custom-house. If this be denied, certainly any one of them might be accepted by the Treasury; but to proscribe all but one—to refuse every thing but the most difficult thing—to do this without notice of the approaching change in the fundamental system of our dealings—is an act of gratuitous oppression.

"If he prohibits the receipt of any thing but specie, to correct land speculations, he may make the same prohibition as to the duties on hardware, or broadcloth, or wines, whenever his paternal wisdom shall see us buying too many shovels, or too many coats, or too much champagne; and thus bring the entire industry of the country under his control.

"It remains to speak of the remedy of these evils. They follow obviously the causes of them. The causes are the injudicious transfers of the public moneys, and the Treasury order about specie.

"The first measure of relief, therefore, should be the instant repeal of the Treasury order requiring specie for lands; the second, the adoption of a proper system to execute the distribution law.

"These measures would restore confidence in twenty-four hours, and repose in at least as many days. If the Treasury will not adopt them voluntarily, Congress should immediately command it."

From these documents, said Mr. B., and from the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] the charges which are made against President Jackson, and on which this resolution is supported, and for which the rescission of the Treasury order is demanded, are, first, a violation of the laws; secondly, a violation of the constitution; thirdly, a destruction of the prosperity of the country. Mr. B. would join issue upon each of these charges, and take each by itself, and all in their turn; and first of the illegality. This charge was bottomed upon the alleged contravention of the joint resolution of April, 1816, for the better collection of the public revenue, and although partly set out both in the Kentucky speech, and in the Philadelphia letter, he preferred to read it entire, as the first part, though merely directory, yet was directory in the essential particular of showing who was to be the active agent in carrying the resolution into effect.

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the 20th day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States."

This is the law, continued Mr. B., and nothing can be plainer than the right of selection which it gives to the Secretary of the Treasury. Four different media are mentioned in which the revenue may be collected, and the Secretary is made the actor, the agent, and the power, by which the collection is to be effected. He is to do it in one, or in another. He may choose several, or all, or two, or one. All are in the disjunctive. No two are joined together, but all are disjoined, and presented to him individually and separately. It is clearly the right of the Secretary to order the collections to be made in either of the four media mentioned. That the resolution is not mandatory in favor of any one of the four, is obvious from the manner in which the notes of the Bank of the United States are mentioned. They were to be received as then provided for by law; for the bank charter had then just passed; and the 14th section had provided for the reception of the notes of this institution until Congress, by law, should direct otherwise. The right of the institution to deliver its notes in payment of the revenue, was anterior to this resolution, and always held under that 14th section, never under this joint resolution; and when that section was repealed at the last session of this Congress, that right was admitted to be gone, and has never been claimed since.

The words of the law are clear; the practice under it has been uniform and uninterrupted from the date of its passage to the present day. For twenty years, and under three Presidents, all the Secretaries of the Treasury have acted alike. Each has made selections, permitting the notes of some specie-paying banks to be received, and forbidding others. Mr. Crawford did it in numerous instances; and fierce and universal as were the attacks upon that eminent patriot, during the presidential canvass of 1824, no human being ever thought of charging him with illegality in this respect. Mr. Rush twice made similar selections, during the administration of Mr. Adams, and no one, either in the same cabinet with him, or out of the cabinet against him, ever complained of it. For twenty years the practice has been uniform; and every citizen of the West knows that that practice was the general, though not universal, exclusion of the Western specie-paying bank paper from the Western land offices. This every man in the West knows, and knows that that general exclusion continued down to the day that the Bank of the United States ceased to be the depository of the public moneys. It was that event which opened the door to the receivability of State bank paper, which has since been enjoyed.

Mr. B. then approached an argument which he deemed authoritative in this case; it was the 24th article of the rules and regulations of the Bank of the United States for the government of their branches. It was made since the passage of the joint resolution of 1816, and related to the collection of the revenue of the United States. It made short work with the notes of the specie-paying banks of the States, excluding the notes of the whole of them from all branches of the revenue, except of such banks as might be situated in the same place where the branch bank was situated. The notes of these branches alone were to be received in payment; if the Secretary of the Treasury required others to be received, they would not be taken in payment, but merely noted as a special deposit at the instance of the Government. This is the article:

"Article 24. The offices of discount and deposit shall receive in payment of the revenue of the United States the notes of such State banks as redeemed their engagements with specie, and provided they are the notes of banks located in the city or place where the office receiving them is established. And also the notes of such other banks, as a special deposit on behalf of the Government, as the Secretary of the Treasury may require."

Here (said Mr. B.) is selection—a selection by which a few State banks, in no event exceeding those in twenty-five places, for there were never more than twenty-five branches, would have their notes received, while the mass of the State banks, amounting to many hundreds, were entirely cut off. The legality of this selection and exclusion has never been questioned; yet there are persons who deny to President Jackson the right of making the same selection; and who must stand before the public as denying to the President of the United States the power over the execution of the laws which they concede to the President of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. B. said that it might well be supposed that he had now sufficiently repelled this charge of illegality. He certainly deemed the charge sufficiently answered; but he had other arguments yet to use—arguments belonging to that authoritative class to which he had alluded, and from which the gentlemen making the charge cannot be allowed to appeal. It would be recollected, he said, that, about a dozen years ago, a committee of the House of Representatives had been raised to investigate certain charges against the then Secretary of the Treasury, that hunted-down and persecuted citizen, William H. Crawford. These charges happened to involve the point now in discussion, not as a charge, but incidentally and historically; and among the members of that committee there happened to be a gentleman who was the author of the joint resolution of 1816, who is now a member of this body, [Mr. WESTEN,] and who has signified an intention to speak in this debate. That committee made a report, purporting to be the unanimous opinion of the body; and from that report an extract will now be read:

"At the time of the adoption of this resolution, (joint, of 1816,) debts accruing to the United States, whether on account of the sales of public lands, or at the custom-house, or from any other source of revenue, were in fact received in some parts of the country, but evidently in disregard of the law, in the notes of the State banks which did not redeem their paper by cash payments. By this resolution it was obviously made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to correct that departure from law as soon as practicable; and it was, as is equally obvious, imperative on the Department, after the 20th of February, 1817, to allow nothing to be received in payment of debts due to the United States, but the legal money of the United States, Treasury notes, notes of the Bank of the United States, or those of State banks, the notes of which were payable and paid on demand in specie. The Bank of the United States was incorporated in April, 1816, &c. In the early part of the year 1817, it is represented by the Secretary, and appears to be true, that an arrangement was made with the Bank of the United States, by which the public funds were to be deposited in the branches of that institution in all places where such branches existed; and where there were no such branches, that bank was to designate certain State banks for which it would be responsible, and in which such public moneys would be deposited; and notes of all banks which the Bank of the United States would receive in deposit as cash, and none other, were to be received on sales of public lands. It is further represented that, in the execution of this engagement, difficulties and controversies arose between the United States Bank and the State banks thus employed in receiving the deposits of the public moneys; and ere long the Bank of the United States signified to the Department of the Treasury that it could not continue such arrangement; and that thenceforward it could receive nothing in deposit, as cash, but the legal currency of the country, or its own notes. The agreement with the Bank of the United States terminated, for these reasons, on the 30th June, 1818. About this period, also, the Bank of the United States issued orders prohibiting its Western branches from issuing any of their own notes for circulation, even in exchange for, or on deposit of, specie." * * * "That institution (the Bank of the United States) is indeed bound to give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place; but this can only mean cash funds; and it is bound also to receive money on deposit for the United States; but it is not bound to receive in deposit, as cash, the bills of any bank whatever but its own, although they may come within the provisions of the act of 1816."

This, Mr. President, continued Mr. B., was in 1824. It was eight years after the joint resolution of 1816 had passed, and two years after the author of the letter to Mr. Adams, which has been read, came to the presidency of that institution. It is, therefore, the report of transactions to which he was privy and a party. The report speaks historically, in reciting an agreement between the Secretary of the Treasury and the directors of the Bank of the United States, by which, among other things, the selection of the State bank notes receivable in payment of the public lands was to be left to the Bank of the United States, and none should be received except such as that bank would agree to credit as specie; that afterwards the bank receded from that agreement, and refused to receive any State bank notes whatever, taking nothing but gold and silver coin, and its own notes; and finally refused to issue its own notes in the West, even in exchange for specie! and thus left nothing but specie to be received; and after making these recitals, the committee conclude with the expression of their own opinion of the law, that the Bank of the United States was not bound to receive in deposit, as cash, the bills of any State bank whatever, although they come under the provisions of the act of 1816.

These are the recitals, and this the opinion of that committee, and certainly they are correct, both in the narration and in the judgment. What, then, becomes of this charge of illegality in the Woodford speech, and this letter to Mr. Adams, thus confuted and invalidated by the conduct of the bank itself? And what becomes of the pretended injury of all those Western banks in having their notes excluded under an order from President Jackson, when they had been previously excluded for nearly twenty years under the orders of the president of the Bank of the United States? Why not complain before? Why not apply to Congress to rescind the order of the bank president, as they now apply for the rescission of the order of the President of the Union? And the politicians and presses which have lavished denunciations upon President Jackson, and wept salt tears over the wrongs of these banks, and the oppressions of the people, on account of the specie order, where were those tears and those denunciations when the president of the Bank of the United States gave previously the same order so many years before, and enforced it up to the day of the removal of the deposits? The fact is, and all the inhabitants of the new States know it, that local bank paper, with few and stinted exceptions, was excluded from all the land offices, from the establishment of the Bank of the United States down to October, 1833. During that long interval, scarcely any thing was received but specie, or United States Bank notes. Local bank paper was in a state of general and permanent exclusion almost the whole time, and the whole country was quiet and contented. No complaint; no charge of illegality; no cry of oppression; no pretext of ruin on the part of the banks; no lamentations and denunciations on the part of politicians. But the instant that President Jackson has done what the president of the bank did; the moment he has restored things to their former footing, and put back local bank paper to the state of exclusion in which it had rested under the administration of both his predecessors, that instant the storm of rage and grief breaks out. A new impeachment must be got up; a new panic must be excited; the Senate chamber is again to become the laboratory of alarm; and a new chorus must become the burden of the song—that the specie order made the distress, and nothing can relieve the distress but the rescission of the order, or the recharter of the bank!

Surely we have accumulated proof enough upon this point; surely there is no necessity for any thing to refute this charge, and to establish the legality of this Treasury order. But other proof is at hand, and, though unnecessary, it shall be used. High as is the authority of the report of the committee of 1824, and close as it is to the point, there is yet a higher authority, and still closer to the point, yet to be adduced; for it is the authority of the same author of the resolution, and that before the question was raised, and while the resolution was on its passage; and in which he not only understood them, as shown afterwards in the report of the committee of which he was a member, but in which he went farther, and expressed his fear that the whole good effect of the resolution might be lost, if the Treasury Department should not execute it precisely as that Department, under the splendid and beneficent administration of President Jackson, had done!

Extracts from Mr. Webster's speech in the House of Representatives, April 26, 1816, on the resolution offered by him for the more effectual collection of the revenue in the lawful money of the country.

"Mr. W. said he felt it to be his duty to call the attention of the House once more to the subject of the collection of the revenue, and to present the resolutions which he had submitted. He had been the more inclined to do this, from an apprehension that the rejection, yesterday, of the bill which had been introduced, might be construed into an abandonment, on the part of the House, of all hope of remedying the existing evil. He had had, it was true, some objections against proceeding by way of bill, because the case was not one in which the law was deficient, but one in which the execution of the law was deficient. * * The situation of the country, (said Mr. W.,) in regard to the collection of its revenues, is most deplorable. With a perfectly sound legal currency, the national revenues are not collected in this currency, but in paper of various sorts, and various degrees of value. * * It is quite clear that by the statute all duties and taxes are required to be paid in the legal money of the United States, or in Treasury notes, agreeably to a recent provision. It is just as clear that the law has been disregarded, and that the notes of the banks of a hundred different descriptions, and almost as many different values, have been received, and are still received, where the statute requires legal money or Treasury notes to be paid. * * There are some political evils which are seen as soon as they are dangerous, and which alarm at once as well the people as the Government. Wars and invasions, therefore, are not always the most certain destroyers of national prosperity. They come in no questionable shape. They announce their own approach, and the general safety is preserved by the general alarm. Not so with the evils of a debased coin, a depreciated paper currency, or a depressed and falling public credit. Not so with the plausible and insidious mischiefs of a paper money system. These insinuate themselves in the shape of facilities, accommodation, and relief. They hold out the most fallacious hope of an easier payment of debts, and a lighter burden of taxation. It is easy for a portion of the people to imagine that Government may properly continue to receive depreciated paper, because they have received it, and because it is more convenient to obtain it than to obtain other paper or specie. But on these subjects it is that Government ought to exercise its own peculiar wisdom and caution. It is supposed to possess, on subjects of this nature, somewhat more of foresight than has fallen to the lot of individuals. It is bound to force the evil before every man feels it, and to take all necessary measures to guard against it, although they may be measures attended with some difficulty, and not without some temporary inconvenience. * * * * *

Treasury Circular.

The only power which the Government possesses of restraining the issues of the State banks, is to refuse their notes in the receipts of the Treasury. This power it can exercise now, or at least provide now for exercising it in reasonable time, because the currency of some part of the country is yet sound, and the evil is not yet universal. * * But I have expressed my belief on more than one occasion, and I now repeat the opinion, that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the return of peace, to have returned to the legal and proper mode of collecting the revenue. * * * It can hardly be doubted that the influence of the Treasury could have effected all this. If not, it could have withdrawn the deposits, and the countenance of Government, from institutions which, against all rule and all propriety, were holding great sums in Government stocks, and making enormous profits from the circulation of their own dishonored paper. That which was most wanted was the designation of a time for the corresponding operation of banks of different places. This could have been made by the head of the Treasury better than by any body, or every body else. * * * This Government has a right, in all cases, to protect its own revenues, and to guard them against devaluation or bad and depreciated paper. It is bound, also, to collect the taxes of the people on a uniform system. * * As to the opinion advanced by some, that the object of the resolution cannot, in any way, be answered—that the revenues cannot be collected otherwise than they now are, in the paper of any and every banking association which chooses to issue paper, it cannot for a moment be attempted. * * The thing, therefore, is to be done; at any rate it is to be attempted. That it will be accomplished by the Treasury Department, without the interference of Congress, I have no belief. If from that source no reformation came, when reformation was easy, it is not now to be expected. Especially after the vote of yesterday, those whose interest it is to continue the present state of things will arm themselves with the authority of Congress. They will justify themselves by the decision of this House. They will say, and say truly, that this House, having taken up the subject, and discussed it, has not thought fit so much as to declare that it is expedient even to relieve the country or its revenues from a paper money system. * * But while some gentlemen oppose these resolutions, because they fix a time too near, others think they fix a day too distant. In my own judgment, it is not so material what the time is, as it is to fix a time. The great object is, that our legal currency is to be preserved, and that we are not to embark on the ocean of paper money. * * I cannot say, indeed, that this resolution will certainly produce the desired end. It may fail. Its success, as is obvious, must essentially depend on the course pursued by the Treasury Department."

Having disposed of the charge of illegality, Mr. B. took up that of the unconstitutionality of the Treasury order. He read from the published speech of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] as found in a revised form in the National Intelligencer, the specific allegation of this alleged unconstitutionality, which ran thus:

"There is a provision in the constitution directly in the face of this order. Those who drew up the order seemed to have been aware of it, and to have avoided employing the same words as are used in the article of the constitution; but it is not, therefore, any the less in violation of its provisions. The constitution declares that the citizens of each of the United States shall enjoy all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States; even the States themselves cannot discriminate. But this order gives to the citizens of one State a privilege which the citizens of no other State are allowed to enjoy—that of paying for public land in the ordinary currency of the country. With some this argument will have but little effect, especially as it is directed against an executive act; but it is not therefore the less sound."

Mr. B. said there was an error in the quotation in this place, and not only in the quotation, but in the gentleman's head also. The constitution was erroneously quoted by the gentleman, and that error had pervaded his argument; and, if followed out to its legitimate conclusions, would present a picture of the rarest absurdities and impossibilities. The quotation says, "the citizens of each State of the United States shall enjoy all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States." The constitution said, "all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." The error of the quotation was in using the definite article the, and the preposition of; and this error unhinged the meaning of the clause, and conducted the argument off on a track which would lead into boundless confusion. The clause, as it stands in the constitution, is general and indefinite, clearly meaning that the States were to treat each other's citizens as members of the same general Government, and not as aliens. The quotation, and the argument upon it, give individuality and particularity to this general right; and, by giving to the citizens of each State the rights of the citizens of all the other States, abolishes at a blow all State lines, and makes one consolidated Government of the whole Union. Thus, by this reading, whatever any citizen can do in his own State, every citizen of every State in the Union may come there and do also—vote with him; hold offices with him; exercise licensed trades and professions with him; contend with him for the honors and emoluments of the State, without owing it allegiance, or paying it a tax, or residing within its limits. What scenes this would give rise to! What crusading visits, or visitations, at the successive elections! Whole States would precipitate themselves in masses upon their neighbors! Some zealous partisans, by aid of steam cars, and race horses, and flying chariots, might succeed in voting in every State in the Union! Suppose the gentleman was right, and this grand secret had been found out before the late presidential election, what a moving flood of living heads we should have seen! such as has never been beheld since Xerxes crossed the Hellespont, or Peter the Hermit led his countless host to the Holy Land! But it will not do. The definite article the, and the preposition of, which figure in the gentleman's quotation, and rule his argument, are not in the constitution; and so the citizens of every State are not to enjoy the rights and immunities of the citizens of every other State. Little Delaware is not to give two millions of votes at the next presidential election! Pursuing his error, the gentleman says the States themselves cannot discriminate between the rights of their own citizens and those of other States. But we all know that they can, and that they do discriminate. Every election proves it; every tenure of office proves it; many trades and professions prove it; the requiring or dispensing with bail proves it; the whole distinction between foreign and domestic attachment is founded upon this discrimination. Truly, the gentleman must choose between his pride and his patriotism—between his speech and his country; for his error must be fatal to his argument, or fatal to the States.

Another branch of the constitution assigned by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Ewing] is the temporary discrimination between payments from settlers and speculators. He insists that all should have the privilege of paying in paper money. Now, the constitution of the United States does not recognise paper for money; it does not recognise the existence of such currency; it is in vain, then, to talk of violations of the constitution on such a point. Again, if it be unconstitutional to discriminate between revenue payments, then Congress cannot do it; and yet Congress has done it, and that in relation to the lands themselves. In March, 1823, an act was passed to make the foreign gold coins of England, France, Spain, and Portugal receivable in payment of the public lands. This was a discrimination, and an exception; for an act of 1819 had illegalized the circulation of foreign coins. But the discrimination which excites greatest complaint is that between the classes of the purchasers—between the settlers and the speculators. What clause of the constitution is to be relied upon to favor these speculators? It is presumed it will be as hard to find their names as the name of paper money in that instrument. But, in one respect at least, they seem to be in a favorable way; they are gaining new friends, and finding advocates and protectors in those who denounced and stigmatized them six months ago! They are now in the hug of those whose kicks they received a few short months ago. But there is a distinction, founded in the nature of things, and recognised by laws, between the settler and the speculator. One is a meritorious class, deserving the favor of all Governments; the other is a pestilential and injurious class, discountenanced every where. The first report ever made under the Federal Government for the sale of our public lands recognised this distinction. It was made by General Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, in the year 1790, and is explicitly to the point. This is an extract from the report:

“That, in the formation of a plan for the disposition of the vacant lands of the United States, there appear to be two leading objects of consideration: one the facility of advantageous sales according to the probable course of purchases; the other the accommodation of individuals now inhabiting the Western country, or who may hereafter emigrate thither. The former, as an operation of finance, claims primary attention; the latter is important, as it relates to the satisfaction of the inhabitants of the Western country. It is desirable, and does not appear impracticable, to conciliate both. Purchasers may be contemplated in three classes: moneyed individuals and companies, who will buy to sell again; associations of persons, who intend to make settlements themselves; single persons or families, now resident in the Western country, or who may emigrate there hereafter. The two first will be frequently blended, and will always want considerable tracts; the last will generally purchase small quantities. Hence a plan for the sale of the Western lands, while it may have a due regard to the last, should be calculated to obtain all the advantages which may be derived from the two first classes.”

Thus (said Mr. B.) the discrimination between settlers and speculators, and between residents and non-residents, is as old as the first plan for the sale of the public lands; and with these distinctions the legislation of Congress has corresponded from that day down to the time when propositions were made for dividing the proceeds of the lands. Up to that day pre-emptions were granted to settlers; since that day there has been a strenuous opposition to such grants. The new policy is, not to settle the country with meritorious farmers, but to fill the Treasury with paper money for distribution. Formerly settlers were favored; and hence the settled legislation of the country for above forty years. The statute book contains nearly fifty laws in favor of pre-emptions. They begin in 1792, and continue down to about 1830. Six or eight of these laws were applicable to the State of Ohio, and may easily be found under the head of “pre-emptions,” in the volume of laws relating to the public lands. The pre-emption system, thus founded in a distinction resting on the nature of things recognised in General Hamilton’s report, and practised upon for above forty years by Congress, makes two discriminations—one as to classes of purchasers, the other as to price. The pre-emptioner was a resident; he paid the minimum price, without competition at auction sales. Now, if these distinctions are unconstitutional, Congress could not make them; if they were unjust or unwise, forty years’ legislation would not have recognised them. Sir, (said Mr. B.) the Treasury circular, in making this discrimination, only conforms to General Hamilton’s report, to forty years’ legislation, and to the common sense and common justice of all mankind. It has the sanction of reason, law, time, and precedent; and the only reason why it is attacked, is because we live in times when nothing that President Jackson can do, or not do, can escape attack.

Mr. B. having now fully answered, and, as he believed, entirely refuted, the legal and constitutional objection to the Treasury order, would take up the other branch of the general charge, namely, the ruinous and pernicious effect of the order upon the banks, business, prosperity, confidence, and industry of the country. The news of all this approaching calamity was given out in advance in the Kentucky speech and the Philadelphia letter, already referred to; and the fact of its positive advent and actual presence was vouched by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Ewing] on the last day that the Senate was in session. I do not permit myself (said Mr. B.) to bandy contradictory asseverations and debatable assertions across this floor. I choose rather to make an issue, and to test assertion by the application of evidence. In this way I will proceed at present. I will take the letter of the President of the Bank of the United States as being official in this case, and most authoritative in the distress department of this combined movement against President Jackson. He announces, in November, the forthcoming of the national calamity in December; and after charging part of this ruin and mischief on the mode of executing what he ostentatiously styles the distribution law, when there is no such law in the country, he goes on to charge the remainder, being ten-fold more than the former, upon the Treasury order, which excludes paper money from the land offices. Here is his picture of distress:

“The commercial community were thus taken by surprise. The interior banks making no loans, and converting their Atlantic funds into specie, the debtors in the interior could make no remittances to the merchants in the Atlantic cities, who are thus thrown for support on the banks of those cities at a moment when they are unable to afford relief, on account of the very abstraction of their specie to the West. The creditor States not only receive no money, but their money is carried away to the debtor States, who, in turn, cannot use it, either to pay old engagements or to contract new. By this unnatural process the specie of New York and the other commercial cities is piled up in the Western States; not circulated, not used, but held as a defence against the Treasury; and while the West cannot use it, the East is suffering for the want of it. The result is, that the commercial intercourse between the West and the Atlantic is almost wholly suspended, and the few operations which are made are burdened with the most extravagant expense. In November, 1836, the interest of money has risen to twenty-four per cent.; merchants are struggling to preserve their credit by ruinous sacrifices; and it costs five or six times as much to transmit funds from the West and Southwest, as it did in November, 1835, or '34, or '32. Thus, while the exchanges with all the world are in our favor, while Europe is alarmed, and the Bank of England itself uneasy at the quantity of specie we possess, we are suffering, because, from mere mismanagement, the whole ballast of the currency is shifted from one side of the vessel to the other." * * *

"In the absence of good reasons for these measures, and as a pretext for them, it is said that the country has overtraded, that the banks have over-issued, and that the purchasers of public lands have been very extravagant. I am not struck by the truth or the propriety of these complaints."

"Now the fact is, that, at this moment, the exchanges are all in favor of this country; that is, you can buy a bill of exchange on a foreign country cheaper than you can send specie to that country. Accordingly, much specie has come in—none goes out; this, too, at a moment when the exchange for the last crop is exhausted, and that of the new crop has not yet come into the market; and when we are on the point of sending to Europe the produce of the country, to the amount of eighty or one hundred millions of dollars. How, then, has the country overtraded? Exchange with all the world is in favor of New York." * * *

"The people of the United States, through their representatives, rechartered that institution. But the Executive, discontented with its independence, rejected the act of Congress, and the favorite topic of declamation was, that the States would make banks, and that these banks could create a better system of currency and exchanges. The States accordingly made banks; and then followed idle parades about the loans of these banks, and their large dealings in exchange. And what is the consequence? The Bank of the United States has not ceased to exist more than seven months, and already the whole currency and exchanges are running into inextricable confusion, and the industry of the country is burdened with extravagant charges on all the commercial intercourse of the Union." * * *

"In the mean time, all forbearance and calmness should be maintained. There is great reason for anxiety—none whatever for alarm; and with mutual confidence and courage, the country may yet be able to defend itself against the Government. In that struggle my own poor efforts shall not be wanting. I go for the country, whoever rules it. I go for the country, best loved when worst governed—and it will afford me far more gratification to assist in repairing wrongs, than to triumph over those who inflict them."

Here (said Mr. B.) is a woful picture of distress, drawn in the same colors in which the same pictures were drawn in 1833. But is it a true picture? and, if it is true, what has caused it? To these questions the answers are plain: first, that the picture is not true, except in places where the Bank of the United States and its affiliated banks have power to make it so; and, secondly, that whatever real distress is felt in some places, is occasioned by the deposit act of the last session, and the conduct of the banks acting with politicians and with the Bank of the United States. The general prosperity of the country is great; but there are places, Philadelphia, New York, and some others, where the withdrawal of money under the deposit act has occasioned a pressure, and where the policy to create distress, and to throw it upon the Treasury order, is seconded by the ability to accomplish what is desired. This is about the true state of the question; and evidence will be at hand to show it. Mr. B. said it would be remembered that, when this resolution was called up a few days ago, he had specified his intention to obtain from the Treasury Department the comparative returns of many banks, both in the new States, where there were public lands, and in the Atlantic States, where there were none; and, by looking into their condition before the Treasury order was issued, and since that order had gone into full operation, he would be able to see in what manner the banks had been affected by it. He had now obtained those returns. They, of course, were limited to the deposit banks; but being scattered over every State in the West, from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, and throughout the Atlantic States from Maine to Georgia, the result which they would present could not be otherwise than a fair index to the general condition of the whole country. He had looked carefully over these returns, covering as they did eight large folio pages, and the result indicated not only a good condition, but an improved condition; not only an ability to aid the community, but aid actually given. Mr. B. then went over the returns, one by one, taking for his points of comparison the months of July and November; that is to say, the month before the order went into operation, and the latest month at which the banks had been heard from since. He examined them under the three heads of 1. Loans; 2. Specie on hand; and, 3. Circulation; and the general results were, that the loans in November were larger than in July; the specie greater in November than in July; the circulation in many instances not diminished, in some increased; and in most instances the specie on hand and the circulation brought to a nearer proportion to each other; inasmuch that banks which had eight, ten, or twelve dollars of paper out for one dollar of silver in their vaults in July, were now brought to the safer proportion of three or four to one in November. This was proof that the banks were not crippled. It was proof that they were not denying accommodations. The proof was complete, as far as it went, and it went all over the Union, that these banks were not injured by the Treasury order, but were benefited by it; it was proof that they were not only able and willing to assist the community, but actually had assisted them.

On the other hand, there might be banks which were not assisting the community, and which were accomplishing a pecuniary and political object at the same time, by shutting their doors upon borrowers, and throwing them into the hands of money dealers at three per cent. discount per month. This was said to be the case in Philadelphia; that Philadelphia which was the seat of the new United States Bank, with her capital of thirty-five millions, which one short year ago was to make money so plenty in that State, and to reduce interest to 5 per cent. per annum. Three per cent. discount, equal to 4 per cent. interest, is now the rate of usury which prevails around her! And she can make it 6 or 12 per cent. per month whenever she pleases. Where banks have monopolized the currency, and become the dispensers of money, they can make interest, or usury, what they please. They have only to stop discounts, and throw the borrowers into the hands of usurers. Pretexts will never be wanting. Any thing that happens, or does not happen, will do; the removal of the deposites—the issuance of the Treasury order—or the last year's snow. One thing is as good as another; for the banks themselves are the sole judges of their own reasons, decide without argument, and without appeal, and act upon the decision without mercy and without remorse.

This is now going on in some of the principal cities, where the deposit act, creating a real pressure, gives to the Bank of the United States and its affiliated institutions the power to do great mischief. Of this power they avail themselves; but their sphere of action is limited, not general. Their victims are individuals, and not the Union. They destroy individuals, or, at most, isolated communities. At the most, they only do a Goliah business—kill their prisoners; that is to say, the debtors; a pen-full, or a pail-full, at a time. The debtor part of the community, where the powers of the Bank of the United States and its associates predominate, suffer severely and cruelly; but the remoter parts of the Union are safe. The Briarian arms of the monster no longer reach to the extremities of the Union. It can no longer strike down exchanges, sink the price of produce and property, and demolish merchants and traders in the towns and cities of the South and West. The tragedy of 1833, now performing on the local theatres of some of the Atlantic cities, cannot be again extended to the country towns and remote States.

Mr. B. remarked upon the statements in Mr. Biddle's letter; he chose to refer to that letter as being the revealed source of this proceeding against President Jackson, and the fountain from which all the arguments of the opposition are drawn; he remarked upon the statements in it, that it was the great transfer of specie to the West which occasioned distress in the East; that much specie had gone to the West, and that none had been exported. Mr. B. said he had prepared himself with facts to reply to these two assertions. In the first place, a Treasury return which he held in his hand, showed that no more than $1,463,656 in specie had been received at all the land offices under the Treasury order, and a like return showed that $312,811 in gold, and $4,123,004 in silver, had been exported from the United States this year. Here then was an export of specie to foreign countries of three times the amount of that which went into the land offices; yet the public are to be told by the president of the bank bearing the name of the United States, that no specie had been exported!

It is in this way that the public is deceived, and that the Treasury order is made the pack-horse, to be loaded with every thing that can be heaped upon it. The export of four and a half millions of specie to foreign countries is called nothing—is said to be none—while one and a half millions, gone into our land offices, has overset the national ship, and deranged the business of a continent! One million and a half out of seventy-five millions has gone into the land offices. Who would feel it? How could it disturb the business of the country? And, especially, how could one million and a half, by going into the interior of our country, do all this mischief, when four and a half millions, by going to foreign countries, is not felt or known? But there was another operation in specie of which Mr. B. had been informed, and which he should bring under the inquiries of a committee, if he should be so fortunate as to be allowed one, and which he mentioned now, not as evidence to convince the Senate, but as a ground for demanding a committee. His information was this: that in the month of September last, the merchants and bankers of New Orleans became suddenly surprised at the mysterious scarcity of specie. It had vanished as if by magic. A meeting was held to know what had become of it; and it was ascertained that the Bank of the United States had collected and boxed up $1,800,000 in that city, and refused a dollar of it to her creditors there! and that a bank holding $300,000 of her notes, had to send them, and did send them, to Philadelphia to be cashed, at great expense, and, what was more material, at great loss of time, when the city was otherwise pressed for specie by the double cause of demands to supply the Western land purchasers, and failure to receive the accustomed supplies from Mexico, on account of the Texian war. Here, then, was $300,000 more taken out of circulation by the Bank of the United States in one month, than all the land offices received in four months; and if the fact was true, as related to him, the evidence was clear and incontestable that this bank was itself making the scarcity and pressure which it has been falsely throwing upon the Treasury order, and upon President Jackson. Mr. B. asked no one to condemn the bank unheard upon this statement; but he also asked that no one would refuse to have it inquired into by a committee.

The real cause of the pecuniary pressure and derangement of the exchanges experienced in some of the large cities, exclusive of that created by some of the banks, was the deposit act of the last session. That act causes thirty odd millions of dollars, about fifteen millions of which is money appropriated to useful and essential objects, to be suddenly withdrawn from the vortex of business, and transferred to places where it must stagnate for some time before it can come again into active employment. Aware of this, and sensible that the public eye was fixed upon this act as the real source of a bonafide distress, the attempt is made to turn off the effect from the act itself, to the mode of its execution. It is not the transfer of these thirty millions, they say, which has done the mischief, but the manner of making the transfer! This (said Mr. B.) is a repetition of the old song about the removal of the deposits. It was not the removal, but the manner of the removal, which had done all the mischief in 1833. And when pressed to explain what was this mystical manner of acting which was so magically calamitous, the solution was in the destruction of confidence. This was the solution then; it is the solution now; for the president of the Bank of the United States expressly declares that the instant rescision of the Treasury order would restore confidence in twenty-four hours, and relief in as many days. This was the declaration during the whole panic of 1833; and its meaning then and now is the same: that the Bank of the United States and its affiliated institutions would cease scourging the country the instant that Congress would grant its president the victory and triumph which he demands over President Jackson! The six months' cry of the session of 1833-'34 was, that the restoration of the deposits, or the recharter of the bank, would relieve the distress in twenty-four hours, and that nothing else ever could relieve it. Now it happens that the test of time, and the letter of the president of the Bank of the United States, has shown that this cry of six months' duration was entirely erroneous; for the distress did cease, and unbounded prosperity has ensued; while the only condition on which this was to take place has never happened; the deposits are not restored; the bank is not rechartered; the distress did cease; unexampled prosperity has ensued, which is attempted to be interrupted again by those who interrupted it then.

Mr. B. said the deposit act was the offspring of the land bill, and became the substitute for it. That bill had passed the Senate before the deposit bill was brought in, and, so far as the Senate was concerned, had made a previous disposition of the same money. That bill was carried through the Senate by the votes of those who are considered as the tutelary deities of the merchants and bankers on this floor; yet the disposition which it proposed to make of what was called the proceeds of the sales of the public lands was ruinous to the banks and the merchants of the great Atlantic cities. It made a call for money, and a distribution of money, which must have driven every debtor to these banks to the immediate payment of every shilling which he owed in any deposit bank; and would have produced a pressure and consternation which would have pervaded the whole moneyed system, and the whole business community of the places where they were. This is the provision of the bill. It is the third section, in the form in which it passed the Senate, and went to the House of Representatives.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several sums of money received in the Treasury as the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the years eighteen hundred and thirty-three, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, and eighteen hundred and thirty-five, shall be paid and distributed as aforesaid, at the Treasury of the United States, one fourth part on the first day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and one fourth part at the end of each ninety days thereafter, until the whole is paid; and those which shall be received for the years eighteen hundred and thirty-six and eighteen hundred and thirty-seven shall also be paid at the Treasury half-yearly, on the first day of July and January, in each of those years, to such person or persons as the respective Legislatures of the said States shall authorize and direct to receive the same."

Now, (said Mr. B.,) let any banker or merchant of the great commercial cities count up the sums which would have been payable in the short period of nine months under this act. They would have been these: eighteen millions and three quarters of a million of dollars on the first day of July last; six millions on the first day of October last; eighteen millions and three quarters on the first day of January next; and six millions on the first day of April next; amounting, in the whole, to forty-nine and one half millions of dollars; for such was the amount of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the years mentioned up to 1836. But the section also included the proceeds of the sales for 1837, which were to be divided out on the first days of July, 1837, and January, 1838. Their amount cannot be known so as to be added. The Secretary of the Treasury, on the basis of hard money payments, estimates them at five millions of dollars; but if these resolutions pass, and the notes of all the banks in the Union become receivable for public lands, the whole national domain may be swept. Every acre may be changed into paper, and that paper be added to the mass of the unavailable funds now in the Treasury.

Mr. B. deemed it right to bring these facts to the recollection of the Senate, and to place them before the eyes of those who looked upon the authors of such measures as their peculiar protectors. That third section of the land bill would have been desolation to the great cities; it was opposed as such on this floor; yet it passed this Chamber, but hung in the House of Representatives until the deposit bill was passed here, and sent down to supersede it. That deposit bill, which proposes only thirty odd millions for abstraction from the great channels of commerce, is, in reality, crippling banks and merchants, and distressing the great cities. What, then, would it have been if forty-nine and a half millions had been taken from them in the short space of nine months? And what would have been its effect upon the Treasury of the United States? Bankruptcy! For it is now seen that there will be in the Treasury on the first of January next but about forty-one millions of dollars, and that inclusive of fifteen millions of unexpended balances, applicable to objects of great necessity, and not completed. Let these facts and these views be kept in mind, whenever the land bill and the deposit act are mentioned.

Mr. B. had a question to put to the defenders of the banks which affected to be crippled and half killed, and unable to lend a dollar, on account of this Treasury order. It was this: How comes it that these banks never felt a wound, or uttered a complaint, during the many years in which their paper was excluded from both branches of the revenue of the Federal Government, by the by-laws of the Bank of the United States? Mr. B. had read, for another purpose, the 24th article of the by-laws of this corporation, by which the notes of all the local banks of the Union were excluded from receivability in any revenue payment whatever, except the notes of the specie paying banks in the same city or place where the branch bank was situated. He would now read the 25th article of the same bank code, which would show that this exception in favor of the local banks in the same place with the branch was of no advantage to them, but the contrary, as it merely amounted to a collection of their notes for immediate convertibility into coin. The article is in these words:

"ARTICLE XXV. The offices of discount and deposit shall, at least once every week, settle with the State banks for their notes received in payment of the revenue, or for the engagements of individuals to the bank, so as to prevent the balance due to the office from swelling to an inconvenient amount."

Here (said Mr. B.) is the condition of the whole catalogue of State banks, during the days of the reign of the Bank of the United States. All excluded from revenue payments, both land and customs, except those in the twenty-five places where branch banks were situated, and the few thus excepted called upon for the weekly redemption of their notes. This, in fact, was an exclusion of their paper, and a receipt of their specie alone, and worse to them than a total exclusion; for the nominal reception would cease then to be taken out of the channels of circulation, brought to the branch to meet the revenue payments, and thence sent back to their own counters for redemption in coin. And this continued to be the case down to the day of the removal of the deposits. Yet these banks never affected to be unable to do business in this long state of total exclusion from all revenue payments by the power of the Bank of the United States. It is only when one half of the same thing is done by President Jackson that they pretend to be ruined. Mr. B. said it was time for the public to mark the conduct of banks, and to discriminate between those which maintained their course as moneyed institutions, and those which were nothing but shaving shops and political engines. Many banks had so acted as to prove that they were at the beck and nod of politicians, and subservient to the mischievous designs of the Bank of the United States. They were ready to close their doors upon borrowers at the approach of the elections, and to storm Congress with petitions in favor of any movement of the Bank of the United States. Who can forget their petitions at the veto session, and at the panic session, in which they stooped so low as to pray to have the Bank of the United States kept in existence to rule over them, and prevent them from issuing more notes than they could pay? Who can forget their refusal to receive the public deposits, when that refusal was necessary to help out the Bank of the United States in its attempts to embarrass the Government, and injure the country? These things, and many others, must be remembered, and marked; and the community and the Government must learn to discriminate between institutions which conduct themselves on business principles, and those which are at the service of politicians whenever a political effect is to be produced, and at the service of a revengeful institution whenever it suits her policy to have a panic in the country.

Mr. B. referred to the general state of the country to prove its general prosperity; he referred to the high prices paid for every thing to prove that money was not scarce, except to those whose engagements compelled them to repair to the banks; he referred to the rates of exchanges in the South and West to prove that the exchanges of the country were good wherever they were beyond the reach of the Bank of the United States; and he stated the contents of letters in his possession from presidents and cashiers of banks in Ohio, Mississippi, and Louisiana, to show that there was but one objection to the Treasury order, and that was, that it had not been issued early enough!

Having vindicated the Treasury order from the charges of illegality and unconstitutionality, and shown that it had not been ruinous to the country, Mr. B. said he would proceed to show the reasons for which it had issued, and the benefits which had resulted from it. President Jackson, it was known, in the exercise of his high constitutional duty to see the laws of the country faithfully executed, had directed the issuing of this order. He stood before the country as its responsible author. As such he had been denounced. As such he was charged with violating the laws and constitution, and destroying the prosperity of the country. As such he is calumniated in the Philadelphia letter, which calls this order "the revenge of the President upon Congress for passing the distribution bill." As such, another condemnation, for the gratification of discomfited politicians and a dethroned national bank president—another victory in the Senate chamber for those who have been defeated at the polls—is now sought against him in this attempt to rescind that order. Under such circumstances, it is not only right that he should find defenders, but that he should be heard also in his own defence. Mr. B. would therefore refer to the annual message delivered at the opening of this session of Congress, and point the attention of the Senate and the country to the whole of that profoundly wise, transcendently patriotic, and paternally beneficent, part of the message which relates to the general currency and to the national domain.

"I beg leave to call your attention to another subject intimately associated with the preceding one—the currency of the country.

"It is apparent, from the whole context of the constitution as well as the history of the times which gave birth to it, that it was the purpose of the convention to establish a currency consisting of the precious metals. These, from their peculiar properties, which rendered them the standard of value in all other countries, were adopted in this, as well to establish its commercial standard, in reference to foreign countries, by a permanent rule, as to exclude the use of a mutable medium of exchange, such as of certain agricultural commodities, recognised by the statutes of some States as a tender for debts, or the still more pernicious expedient of a paper currency. The last, from the experience of the evils of the issues of paper during the Revolution, had become so justly obnoxious as not only to suggest the clause in the constitution forbidding the emission of bills of credit by the States, but also to produce that vote in the convention which negatived the proposition to grant power to Congress to charter corporations; a proposition well understood at the time as intended to authorize the establishment of a national bank, which was to issue a currency of bank notes, on a capital to be created to some extent out of Government stocks. Although this proposition was refused by a direct vote of the convention, the object was afterwards in effect obtained by its ingenious advocates, through a strained construction of the constitution. The debts of the Revolution were funded, at prices which formed no equivalent compared with the nominal amount of the stock, and under circumstances which exposed the motives of some of those who participated in the passage of the act to distrust.

"The facts that the value of the stock was greatly enhanced by the creation of the bank; that it was well understood that such would be the case, and that some of the advocates of the measure were largely benefited by it, belong to the history of the times, and are well calculated to diminish the respect which might otherwise have been due to the action of the Congress which created the institution.

"On the establishment of a national bank, it became the interest of the creditors that gold should be superseded by the paper of the bank as a general currency. A value was soon attached to the gold coins, which made their exportation to foreign countries, as a mercantile commodity, more profitable than their retention and use at home as money. It followed as a matter of course, if not designed by those who established the bank, that the bank became, in effect, a substitute for the mint of the United States.

"Such was the origin of a national bank currency, and such the beginning of those difficulties which now appear in the excessive issues of the banks incorporated by the various States."

"The effects of an extension of bank credits and over-issues of bank paper have been strikingly illustrated in the sales of the public lands. From the returns made by the various registers and receivers in the early part of last summer, it was perceived that the receipts arising from the sales of the public lands were increasing to an unprecedented amount. In effect, however, these receipts amounted to nothing more than credits in banks. The banks lent out their notes to speculators; they were paid to the receivers, and immediately returned to the banks, to be lent out again and again, being mere instruments to transfer to speculators the most valuable public land, and pay the Government by a credit on the books of the banks. Those credits on the books of some of the Western banks, usually called deposits, were already greatly beyond their immediate means of payment, and were rapidly increasing. Indeed, each speculation furnished means for another; for no sooner had one individual or company paid in their notes, than they were immediately lent to another for a like purpose, and the banks were extending their business and their issues so largely as to alarm considerate men, and render it doubtful whether bank credits, if permitted to accumulate, would ultimately be of the least value to the Government. The spirit of expansion and speculation was not confined to the deposit banks, but pervaded the whole multitude of banks throughout the Union, and was giving rise to new institutions to aggravate the evil.

"The safety of the public funds, and the interests of the people, generally, required that these operations should be checked, and it became the duty of every branch of the General and State Government to adopt all legitimate and proper means to procure that salutary effect. Under this view of my duty, I directed the issuing of the order which will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury, requiring payment for the public lands sold to be made in specie, with an exception until the fifteenth of the present month in favor of actual settlers. This measure has produced many salutary consequences. It checked the career of the Western banks, and gave them additional strength in anticipation of the pressure which has since pervaded our Eastern as well as the European commercial cities. By preventing the extension of the credit system, it measurably cut off the means of speculation, and retarded its progress in monopolizing the most valuable of the public lands. It has tended to save the new States from a non-resident proprietorship, one of the greatest obstacles to the advancement of a new country, and the prosperity of an old one. It has tended to keep open the public lands for entry by emigrants, at Government prices, instead of their being compelled to purchase of speculators at double or triple prices, and it is conveying into the interior large sums of silver and gold, there to enter permanently into the currency of the country, and place it on a firmer foundation. It is confidently believed that the country will find in the motives which induced that order, and the happy consequences which will have ensued, much to commend and nothing to condemn."

Mr. B. said it would be observed by the Senate that the reasons for issuing the Treasury order are introduced by the President under the head of "currency," and not under the head of "public lands;" and that, in his whole manner of treating it, the currency is the object, and the lands the incident. The regulation of the currency is the great object; and as the lands, and not the custom-house, was the exciting cause of the swollen, bloated, and diseased state of the currency, the remedy was directed to the lands, and not to the customs. All this is visible in the passages read. It is also visible in the original Treasury order itself, where the discouragement of the ruinous extension of bank issues, the preservation of the soundness of the currency, and the safety of the Federal revenue, are distinctly and prominently set forth among the high inducements to its issue. Very rightly, then, did the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] express himself on Thursday last, in the few remarks which he then made; very rightly did he declare this to be a currency question, and not a land question! a financial measure of the greatest moment and extent, affecting every interest and the whole Union! and rightly did he claim for it that high consideration which is due to a measure, not of sectional, but of national concern. The gentleman is right. The Treasury order is a regulation of the national currency, issued under the constitutional obligation of the President to preserve and protect the currency of the Federal Government, and exercised according to the manner pointed out by the author of the joint resolution of 1816, and according to the manner, though not to the same degree, that the regulation of the currency was effected by the Bank of the United States during the whole period of its existence. The constitution recognises nothing for money but gold and silver. The President is the sworn protector, defender, and preserver of that constitution. To permit any part of its guarantees to be subverted and destroyed, is a dereliction of duty, or a defect of vigilance in him. The joint resolution of 1816 does not grant, but recognises and enforces, his constitutional duties and powers over the preservation of the constitutional currency. The author of that resolution, in the speech from which I have read extracts—a speech abounding with just sentiments—recognises all this authority, and proclaims all this duty of the President as attributes of the Executive Government, existing anteriorly to his resolution; a measure only rendered necessary because these powers and duties had been neglected. Listen to him: "There are some political evils which are seen as soon as they are dangerous, and which alarm at once as well the people as the Government. Wars and invasions, therefore, are not always the most certain destroyers of national prosperity. They come in no questionable shape. They announce their own approach, and the general safety is preserved by the general alarm. Not so with the evils of a debased coin, a depreciated paper currency, and a depressed and falling public credit. Not so with the plausible and insidious mischiefs of a paper money system. These insinuate themselves in the shape of facilities, accommodation, and relief. They hold out the most fallacious hope of an easier payment of debts and a lighter burden of taxation. It is easy for a portion of the people to imagine that Government may properly continue to receive depreciated paper because they have received it, and because it is more convenient to obtain than other paper or specie. But on these subjects it is that Government ought to exercise its own peculiar wisdom and caution. It is supposed to possess, on subjects of this nature, somewhat more of foresight than has fallen to the lot of individuals. It is bound to foresee the evil before every man feels it, and to take all measures to guard against it, although they may be measures attended with some difficulty, and not without some temporary inconvenience. The only power which the Government possesses of restraining the issues of the State banks is to refuse their notes in the receipts of the Treasury. This power it can exercise now, or at least can provide now for exercising it in reasonable time, because the currency of some parts of the country is yet sound, and the evil is not yet universal. But I have expressed my belief on more than one occasion, and I now repeat the opinion, that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the return of peace, to have returned to the legal and proper mode of collecting the revenue. This Government has a right, in all cases, to protect its own revenues, and to guard them against bad and depreciated paper. As to the opinion advanced by some that the object of the resolution cannot in any way be answered; that the revenues cannot be collected otherwise than they now are, in the paper of any and every banking association that chooses to issue paper, it cannot for a moment be admitted. The thing then is to be done; at any rate it is to be attempted. That it will be accomplished by the Treasury Department, without the interference of Congress, I have no belief. If from that source no reformation came when reformation was easy, it is not now to be expected. The great object is that our legal currency is to be preserved, and that we are not to embark on the ocean of paper money. I cannot say, indeed, that this resolution will certainly effect the desired end. It may fail. Its success, as is obvious, must essentially depend on the course pursued by the Treasury Department."

Mr. B. would add nothing by commentary to the power or appositeness of these quotations. They were up to the exigencies of the present occasion, fitted it as if made to order, and superseded the necessity of argument or illustration. One thing ought to be well observed, that this speech, going the whole length, not only of justifying the present Treasury order, but blaming the Treasury Department in 1816 for not having done the like, and expressing the fear that it might not do it in time to come, was delivered on the 26th day of April, 1816, four days before the passage of the joint resolution of that year! consequently, and as the whole speech proves, all the powers and duties claimed in that speech for the Treasury Department, and the Executive Government, over the regulation of the currency, the restoration of the constitutional money, and the exclusion of State bank paper from revenue payments, were independent of that resolution! were founded—1st, upon the constitution; 2d, the act of 1789, that the customs should be paid in gold and silver coin only; 3d, the act of May 10th, 1800—the fundamental act for the general sale of the public lands—and directing that all purchasers should make payment for the same in specie, or in evidences of the public debt of the United States! These were the foundations of the gentleman's argument; these the laws the violation of which he had in his eye; these the ground of his complaint against the existing administration; these the future ark of his financial hope. These are the laws, faithful expositors of the constitution, in aid of which, and to compel the speedy execution of which, the joint resolution of 1816 was conceived and passed. The author of the resolution said at the time that the success of the resolution depended upon the Treasury Department, and expressed his fear that it might fail of its object through the fault of that Department—a fear in which the gentleman's misgivings were prophetic, until the splendid and beneficent administration of General Jackson rose upon the political horizon, to bless and exalt his country; to command the admiration of the world, civilized and barbarian, and to realize the gentleman's own cherished and adored vision of 1816—the constitutional currency restored, and the bloated and pestilential carcasses of the paper system expelled from the doors of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. B. repeated the date of the speech from which he had read an extract; it was the 26th of April, 1816, four days before the passage of the joint resolution of that year. He now had another extract from another speech of the same gentleman, also delivered before that joint resolution was passed, and clearly indicative of his intention in bringing forward that measure, to compel, as soon as possible, the complete re-establishment of the currency of the constitution as the sole and exclusive currency of the Federal Government. It was a speech delivered in February, on the passage of the charter of the Bank of the United States, and in which the speaker took the great and true ground that the law and Treasury Department, and not the bank, ought to be the true regulator of currency. Mr. B. only read the parts which were applicable to the point in debate, namely, the legal currency of the United States, and the speedy and compulsory payment of the whole revenue in that currency.

Extract from Mr. Webster's speech on the Bank of the United States Charter Bill, February, 1816.

"No nation had a better currency than the United States. There was no nation which had guarded its currency with more care; for the framers of the constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were hard money men; they had felt, and therefore duly appreciated, the evils of a paper medium; they, therefore, sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin; this was a subject in regard to which Congress had run into no folly. * * *

Mr. W. declined occupying the time of the House to prove that there was a depreciation of the paper in circulation; the legal standard of value was gold and silver; the relation of paper to it proved its state, and the rate of its depreciation. Gold and silver currency, he said, was the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad; there could, in the present state of the world, be no other currency. In consequence of the immense paper issues having banished specie from circulation, the Government had been obliged, in direct violation of existing statutes, to receive the amount of their taxes in something which was not recognised by law as the money of the country, and which was, in fact, greatly depreciated. * * *

"As to the evils of the present state of things, Mr. W. admitted it in its fullest extent. If he was not mistaken, there were some millions in the Treasury of paper which were nearly worthless, and were now wholly useless to the Government, by which an actual loss of considerable amount must certainly be sustained by the Treasury. This was an evil which ought to be met at once, because it would grow greater by indulgence. In the end, the taxes must be paid in the legal money of the country, and the sooner that was brought about the better. * * *

If Congress were to pass forty statutes on the subject, he said they would not make the law more conclusive than it now was, that nothing should be received in payment of duties to the Government but specie; and yet no regard was paid to the imperative injunctions of the law in this respect. The whole strength of the Government, he was of opinion, ought to be put forth to compel the payment of the duties and taxes to the Government in the legal currency of the country."

Now (said Mr. B.) the Senate will doubtless be willing to hear what was said by the friends of the administration in 1816, to those powerful appeals from the gentleman who so strenuously plead the cause of the laws, the constitution, and hard money. He had looked over the speeches of that day, and found the whole of their answers compressed into a short paragraph by Mr. Sharpe, of Kentucky, a gentleman of genius and ability, and whose tragical death had since attracted so much public notice and commiseration.

"In reply to the argument of Mr. Webster, that the remedy for the evil was in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, by requiring payment of the dues to the Government in specie, Mr. S. said the gentleman had not demonstrated that there was specie enough in the country for the purposes of the payment of the revenue to the Treasury, nor that the banks have not the means ultimately to force the Government to take their paper in payments to the Treasury. The disposition was not wanting in the officer at the head of that Department to apply the remedy, if it was in his power."

This was the answer! a deplorable confession of the condition to which the Federal Treasury had been reduced by receiving State bank paper in payment of the federal revenues! That policy had begun under General Hamilton, and been followed up by other Secretaries, in violation of the laws and constitution, until nothing but inconvertible paper remained in the Treasury, and little else in the country. All their fine phrases about specie-paying banks, and paper equivalent to specie, and no paper but what the collectors and depositories of the revenue would receive as cash—all these holiday phrases had ended, as such schemes must forever end, in the eventual general use of paper, the eventual general banishment of specie, and the eventual general stoppage of banks, and universal depreciation of paper money. This was the only answer which could be given in 1816, and the only one that could be given until President Jackson's measures for restoring the constitutional currency shall have raised that currency to seventy-five millions of dollars. There is now specie enough in the country to make all revenue payments in gold and silver; and the purchasers of the public land, speculators and bank borrowers excepted, have found no difficulty in getting specie to make their payments. Land office returns prove this. The sum of $1,463,656 was paid into the land offices, in gold and silver, from the 15th of August, when the order took effect, down to the middle of November, to which the returns were made up. This was a million and a half for three months, being at the rate of about six millions per annum. This would buy near five millions of acres of land at the present minimum price; and five millions of acres of public lands, in addition to other sources of supply, is double as much as the progressive settlement of the country has ever required. Does the demand for this small sum—a sum which does not go out of the country, but enters immediately into general circulation through the Government payments—cannot such a demand be supplied out of the seventy-five millions in the country, especially when four and a half millions were exported to foreign parts this very year, not to return again? Of the seventy-five millions of specie in the country, the banks alone were computed by the Secretary of the Treasury to have forty-five millions in their vaults. Can they not spare a few millions for the service of the country, especially when the measures of President Jackson's administration have increased their supplies of the precious metals from twenty-five to forty-five millions in three years? Mr. B. would subjoin from the Treasury report the statement of specie in all the banks in the United States, as far as obtained at the Treasury Department, first premising that the report was not complete. The number of banks in the United States and their branches is near one thousand! Their names occupy twelve columns in Bicknell's Counterfeit Detector, with nearly eighty names in each column! The Treasury report does not include them all, but the main part, and their specie is reported thus:

January, 1834,	-	27,000,000
January, 1835,	-	43,000,000
January, 1836,	-	40,000,000
December, 1836,	-	45,000,000

Here is an increase of specie in their vaults, said Mr. B., of twenty millions in three years, and of five millions of dollars during the very year of the Treasury order's existence—a fact which, of itself, exposes and puts to shame the whole story of their distress and ruin, and inability to aid the community on account of this order, or to furnish the specie which it requires. The fact is conclusive: it stamps the whole contrivance on the part of the banks which have engaged in it, as a shameful and fraudulent imposition upon the public. It is enough of itself; but the custom-house books show that these banks would in reality have increased their specie to ten millions this year, had it not been for the sums exported to foreign countries. The exports of specie, up to near the end of November, were $4,435,815; of which $312,811 was in gold. But this is nothing, according to the Philadelphia letter. It is nothing; while the one third of that sum going into our land offices, and thence through Government payments to the people, is to create intense distress, derange the exchanges deprive the banks which affect to be injured by the Treasury order of all capacity to make loans to business men, and justify them in throwing borrowers into the hands of usurers, to be fined at the rate of 3 per cent. per month discount (equal to 4 per cent. interest) for the use of money.

But Mr. B. had another test to apply to the capacity of those banks to furnish the small amount of five millions of dollars per annum for the purchase of public lands. It was in the contrast exhibited by the one thousand banks of the United States with what is done by a single banker in the English county—he might almost say kingdom instead of county—for Lancashire, in point of wealth, is equal to the second rate kingdoms of Europe—in the English county of Lancashire, and where there are no local paper-issuing banks or bankers. He would give the sworn words of Samuel Jones Lloyd, Esq., a banker, examined before the committee of thirty-one members of the House of Commons in 1832; a committee of which Lord Althorpe was chairman, and such men as Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, Mr. Goulburn, Sir Henry Parnell, Mr. Baring, and more than two dozen scarcely their inferiors, were members, and on which such men as the Governor of the Bank of England, Mr. N. M. Rothschild, and a hundred distinguished bankers and merchants were witnesses. Mr. Lloyd, among other things, testified to the quantity of gold paid weekly by a single banking establishment, (his own,) for wages to working people in the city of Manchester, one out of the many great cities which Lancashire contains. This is the part of his evidence relating to this point:

"A great amount in gold is paid at Manchester, in wages. Witness's house issues about 25,000 sovereigns weekly. That issue was formerly in one pound notes. There is no local issue in Lancashire."

Here are three statements (said Mr. B.) which ought to be stereotyped on the head and heart of every friend to the constitutional currency of our America: 1. Twenty-five thousand sovereigns paid weekly by one banking-house, for wages to working people. 2. This amount formerly paid in one pound notes. 3. No local bank issuing paper now in Lancashire.

Confining his remarks to one only of these statements—the amount of weekly payments in gold—Mr. B. said the annual amount was one million three hundred thousand sovereigns, equal to six millions and a half of dollars! This was paid by a single banking house; and are we to believe that the 1,000 banks in the United States cannot furnish the same amount for the purchase of the public lands? And are we, after attempting to make them do it, to be clamored down by a combined cry from speculators, a part of the banks, and politicians, that the country was paralyzed and desolated by the experiment, and that all further attempt must instantly cease?

Mr. B. would make a short issue with all these complaining banks; they either have, or have not, their proportion of the forty-five millions of specie which they report is in their vaults. If they have it, there is no difficulty in furnishing specie for the land offices; if they have it not, then their returns are deceptive—their periodical exhibitions of specie are nothing but show money; and the sooner the people find out their hollowness and emptiness, the better for the whole community.

But, (continued Mr. B.,) let the amount of specie be what it may in the banks, the fact is, that there is about seventy-five millions in the country, and a goodly part of that is in the hands of the community. In October, 1833, when the deposits were removed, the whole amount of specie in the banks was returned at about twenty-five millions, and that in the hands of the community was computed at only four millions. The community is now computed to have twenty-eight millions, and the annual increase is thus reported by the Secretary of the Treasury:

Dates.	Specie in active circulation.
October, 1833	- $4,000,000
1st January, 1834,	- 12,000,000
1st January, 1835,	- 18,000,000
1st December, 1836,	- 28,000,000

Here, then, is a sum in the hands of the community, sufficient to supply the public land demand, on account of actual settlers, four times over. The rapidity with which gold and silver has increased since the commencement of the operations to restore the constitutional currency, should banish all doubt on the practicability of doing it. See what has been done in four years against the powerful opposition, the systematic resistance, and the scoffings and jeerings of a great political and moneyed party. Four years more may be equally successful, if these resolutions can be defeated, and, instead of seventy-five millions, one hundred and twenty millions, and nearly forty millions of it gold, may be in the country. But nobody expects this amount to come into the country, or what is in it now to remain, unless the Federal Government can continue its onward course in the reformation of the currency. If it relapses into a paper money currency, the whole community must relapse into it also; and the result must be, what it has been heretofore, universal banishment of the precious metals, the eventual stoppage of all the State banks, and a call for the re-establishment of the Bank of the United States, as the only safe regulator of the State currencies.

The increase of banks and paper money, and the necessity of restraining the issues of these corporations, as alleged in the President's message, was next adverted to by Mr. B. He referred to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which showed these results:

SENATE.]

Treasury Circular.

[Dec. 19, 1836.]

Dates.	Paper in active circulation.
Near 1st October, 1833,	- $80,000,000
1st January, 1834,	- 76,000,000
1st December, 1836,	- 120,000,000

Here is an increase of about forty millions of paper money in two years. But it is not the whole increase in that time. The computation is principally made from the returns of the old banks; while one hundred and six new ones, with capitals of sixty millions, had been created; and twelve millions and three quarters of increased capital to the old banks had been granted during the past winter; so that fifty millions of increase of paper was probably the amount when the Treasury order was issued, and the increase going on with a deplorable rapidity. The national domain was the object that was attracting it. The temptation was irresistible. A quire of paper, speckled over with figures, would transmute into 100,000 acres of land; a ream of paper into a million of acres. One thousand engines were at work, striking this paper; hosts of speculators, loaded with bales of it, were on their way to all the new States. It was evident the national domain was becoming a fund for the redemption of all this paper. It was all receivable in exchange for lands; and the holders of these bills seem to consider them as assignats, like those of the French national convention, convertible into the territory of the republic at the will of the possessor, and the faster the better. This was the state of things on the rise of Congress, and the two halls of that body had resounded with the denunciation of the ruinous aspect of this exchange of land for paper, four months before the adjournment took place. The President, acting under the constitution and laws of the country, applied the remedy which the crisis required, and which the laws and constitution authorized. He saved the national domain; he checked the expansion of the paper system; he saved the Treasury from a frightful accumulation of "unavailable funds;" and he prevented that catastrophe in the State banks to which the Bank of the United States is anxiously looking, systematically promoting and impatiently awaiting that catastrophe in the local banks which would again disgrace and discredit them, and bring forth the whole United States Bank party to exclaim, We told you so! we told you this would be the consequence of not renewing our charter! and now you all see it! and we demand the re-establishment of the national bank as the only means of regulating the State banks! President Jackson has prevented all this; and has shown that the constitutional currency can regulate the State banks; and for this he has drawn upon himself the denunciations of disappointed speculators, disappointed politicians, and disappointed bankers. He has prevented many and great evils, and, among others, the further depreciation of the currency. Fifty millions of additional paper, put out in two years, has enabled the banks to imprison forty-five millions of specie, and the whole one hundred and thirty millions of paper money afloat during the summer has depreciated the general currency; which is seen by the importation of wheat from Germany and the Black sea, by the importation of beef and pork from Ireland, hay from Scotland, and many other necessities of life from Europe; which is seen in the rise of price in every article which depends for sale on its depreciated currency; for articles whose price depends upon foreign markets, where the notes of our one thousand banks are not taken for money, as tobacco and cotton have not risen. The progress and the evils of this depreciation, which commenced before the Treasury order, which that order has checked, but which must recommence with its rescission, is powerfully sketched in that part of President Jackson's message which relates to the currency. He says:

"The progress of an expansion, or rather a depreciation of the currency, by excessive bank issues, is always attended by a loss to the laboring classes. This portion of the community has neither time nor opportunity to watch the ebbs and flows of the money market. Engaged from day to day in their useful toils, they do not perceive that, although their wages are nominally the same, or even somewhat higher, they are greatly reduced, in fact, by the rapid increase of a spurious currency, which, as it appears to make money abound, they are at first inclined to consider a blessing. It is not so with the speculator, by whom this operation is better understood, and is made to contribute to his advantage. It is not until the prices of the necessities of life become so dear that the laboring classes cannot supply their wants out of their wages, that the wages rise, and gradually reach a justly proportioned rate to that of the products of their labor. When thus, by the depreciation, in consequence of the quantity of paper in circulation, wages as well as prices become exorbitant, it is soon found that the whole effect of the adulteration is a tariff on our home industry for the benefit of the countries where gold and silver circulate and maintain uniformity and moderation in prices. It is then perceived that the enhancement of the price of land and labor produces a corresponding increase in the price of products, until these products do not sustain a competition with similar ones in other countries, and thus both manufacturing and agricultural productions cease to bear exportation from the country of this spurious currency, because they cannot be sold for cost. This is the process by which specie is banished by the paper of the banks. Their vaults are soon exhausted to pay for foreign commodities: the next step is a stoppage of specie payment—a total degradation of paper as a currency; unusual depression of prices, the ruin of debtors, and the accumulation of property in the hands of creditors and cautious capitalists."

This (said Mr. B.) is the progress and effect of a depreciated paper currency. The imprudence and the criminality of banks of issue are equally the sources of this depreciation; and the community is equally the victim of their misconduct, whether it results from accident, folly, or design. It is established in England that a sudden increase of one million sterling, by Bank of England issues, will, in many states of the moneyed system, produce a depreciation in the value of money which will be sensibly felt in the kingdom. What, then, is to be the effect of an increase of fifty millions of paper dollars, in two years, in this country? It must be what every person sees and feels it to be—a depreciation of at least one third of the value of paper money! so that all persons living on salaries, fixed incomes, and wages, are in the condition of having suffered a diminution of one third of their income. Living is becoming as dear in our young and prolific America as in the aged and crowded countries of Europe. Let no one delude himself with the belief that there is no depreciation while bank notes continue to be convertible into gold and silver; this would be a great error; for it is of the very nature of depreciating paper to carry down gold and silver with it, until things reach that point when prudent men begin to exact payments in hard money, or, which is the same thing, to carry home in silver at night the amount of every note received during the day. When things have reached that point, and about the time when all prudent men have taken care of themselves, the public mind begins to get uneasy. Some cause, no matter what, starts an alarm; and in a few weeks the explosion is universal. Such was the point to which we were rapidly tending in July last. President Jackson has arrested this depreciation, and saved the country from a dire calamity. His Treasury order has saved it. It has stopped the issues of a host of banks, and bound up the elements of desolation in their own caverns. The raging winds are now imprisoned: Boreas, Eurus, and Auster, are now confined. The fabulous conception of the father of poets is realized, not upon the ocean of waters, but upon the ocean of paper money. The elements of destruction are tied up; and wo to those who, imitating the rash conduct of the companions of Ulysses, shall untie the fated bag, and turn loose tempests, storms, and desolating fury upon the land.

Mr. B. said it would be unjust, after saying so much of the expansion of the paper currency, and the over-issues of the local banks, not to add, that the picture was not intended to be applicable to the whole of these banks; that he knew of many honorable exceptions, and there might be many more that he did not know of. His means of information were limited to the official returns of the deposit banks, now about ninety in number; and while, of these, he saw many whose paper dollars in circulation, to say nothing of their deposits, were five, ten, fifteen, to one for their specie dollars in their vaults, yet there were others where the proportion was the other way. The Merchants' Bank, Boston, had $284,000 specie, and $256,000 in circulation; the Bank of America, New York, had $1,490,000 in specie, and $572,000 notes out; the Manhattan, in the same place, had $690,000 specie, and $566,000 paper out; the Planters' Bank, Georgia, had $497,000 specie, $361,000 paper; and many others whose issues but slightly exceeded their specie in hand. It was due to these banks, and doubtless to many more, whose returns were not accessible to him, to except them from the censure and the complaint which lies against those whose unjustifiable issues have produced the expansion and depreciation of currency which is now visible to all.

Adverting to President Jackson's great design of increasing the specie in the country, Mr. B. said there was an indissoluble connexion between the state of the specie in a country and its prosperity or distress. They were cause and effect, and rose and fell together. On this point he had a table to produce, which must carry conviction to every mind which was open to the influence of facts and reasons. It was a table which covered the most disastrous and the most prosperous period of our time; and which required but the application of every one's own knowledge of events to lead to just and inevitable conclusions.

Here (said Mr. B.) is a period of sixteen years, divided into portions of four years each, by the administrations of different Presidents. The first showed a heavy export of specie, and the loss of near twelve millions of dollars; the second, a loss of about a million and a half; the third, a gain of about six millions; the fourth, a gain of near forty millions, and upwards of that amount, when the produce of our native gold mines were added. These were the results; and, without embarrassing his remarks with complicated details, he would take the periods of strongest contrast—the first and last four years of the sixteen. Every person would recollect the period of 1821, '22, '23, '24. It was the season of bank stoppages; of depreciated paper money; of stop laws, relief laws, tender laws, loan laws, property laws; the season of depressed prices of property and produce, of ruin to debtors, and harvests to money-holders and cautious capitalists. It was the time when a creditor who should receive from his debtor ten dollars in Kentucky paper, and gave five dollars in change, would have received nothing, and the debtor would have paid nothing. It was the time when two bills for the same article were made out in the West: one for silver, and one for paper, the latter being the former multiplied by two. Now, look to the table. This disastrous season will be seen to have been the period of least importation and greatest exportation of specie. Search the memory, and it will inform you that the Bank of the United States, then just recovered from its own crisis of 1819, and just strong enough to do mischief, was employed in eviscerating the whole interior country of its gold and silver, and collecting it on the seaboard, where it was exported to countries unafflicted with the pestilence of paper money. Look to the last period, the present time; and it will be seen that, dating from that era which should become national, and receive perennial honors in anniversary celebrations—the most glorious era of the removal of the deposits—dating from that era, and it will be seen that we have gained near forty millions of specie by importations, and that the gain exceeds forty millions, when the domestic supplies are added. The present period, then, is the season of the greatest increase of specie ever known; and such also is the national prosperity. Never before did the prosperity of any country equal the present time; never was there such exuberance of prosperity; and that, after making due allowance for what is fictitious, from the excess of paper and the effect of a depreciated currency. This excess and depreciation would be fatal, were it not for the seventy-five millions of specie in the country. But these threescore and fifteen millions are the safety of the land. They make the people independent of the banks; they make them independent of panics; they prepare them for the present panic, this starveling concern, now in a course of preparation by the authors of the old one. Thanks to the wisdom, the foresight, the energy, of President Jackson, he has prepared the country for this second panic; he has fortified it, and armed it for the contest. Seventy-five millions of specie puts paper at defiance, and enables the country to stand the shock of the encounter. No longer can banks set themselves up above law and above Government. No longer can they stop payment, and force their dishonored paper upon the country. The bank that would now attempt it would instantly be put to the test of insolvency, and subjected to the law of the land as well as to the law of public opinion. Her dishonored paper would be driven in upon her, and the last hard dollar extracted from her vaults. These being the fruits of President Jackson's great measure for restoring a specie currency, who can justify the opposite course which is now proposed? a course by which specie is to be dispensed with by the Federal Government, paper to take its place, specie again to become an article of merchandise for exportation to foreign countries, and the disastrous scenes of 1821, '22, '23, '24 again realized. The crisis had approached in July; paper was pouring into the Treasury, specie was departing for foreign climes; President Jackson checked the inundation of paper, and he compelled the departing specie to counter-march—to face West instead of East—to our land offices instead of foreign ports; and, in doing this, he has benefited his country, and drawn upon himself the denunciation of those who now attack him.

Mr. B. would conclude his observations on this part of the subject, with calling the attention of the Senate to the public imputation of wicked motives, attributed to President Jackson in the Kentucky speech and Philadelphia letter, from which extracts had been read. Christian charity forbids, and gentlemanly breeding avoids, the gratuitous imputation of malignant motives. There are cases in which delicacy recoils from a public and insulting reference from one man to another. But where was Christian charity, gentlemanly breeding, or delicacy of feeling, when such words as these were used in reference to President Jackson? "I have little doubt that the specie order was the revenge of the President upon Congress for passing the distribution law." Here, said Mr. B., is not only a personal outrage to the President, but an attempt to excite the resentment of Congress against him, and to mark him for the vengeance of all who are disposed to pervert the deposit act into a distribution law; and all this, too, upon the gratuitous imputation of a wicked motive for a measure just, wise, legal, and indispensably necessary within itself! Motives, continued Mr. B., are within the cognizance of the Searcher of all hearts. He can see them as they are; the mortal eye may mistake them. It is good, then, for frail humanity to be slow in charging a bad motive for even a questionable action; he had, therefore refrained from all reference to motives for the design of those coincident and twin productions from which he had made quotations—the Kentucky speech and the Philadelphia letter! He had not said that they were the revenge of disappointed ambition for a lost presidential chair, nor of disappointed avarice for a lost national bank charter. He had not even intimated that the marble palace in Chesnut street, and the shady groves of Ashland, might be conscious to the embraces from which this rescinding resolution has sprung; or that the imperative requisition upon this Congress to command the instant repeal of the Treasury order was founded in any scheme to obtain, from the representatives of the people, a triumph over that man to whom the people themselves have granted so many triumphs over the same pursuers. For himself, he had omitted all such intimations, and should drop all further notice of them now. Leaving, then, the actors and accessories to this proceeding, its origin and their motives, to the phasis under which they themselves have exhibited it, he should join President Jackson in the confident belief expressed by him in the concluding paragraph of that part of his message which relates to the issuance of the Treasury order, "that his country would find, in the motives which had induced it, and in the happy consequences which have ensued, much to commend, and nothing to condemn."

Mr. B. said he had stated in the commencement of his speech that two great objects were to be accomplished by this rescinding resolution: first, the condemnation of President Jackson for a violation of the laws and constitution, and the destruction of the public prosperity; and, secondly, the overthrow of the constitutional currency, and the imposition of the paper money of all the State Governments upon the Federal Government. He had spoken to the first of these objects, and, as he hoped, successfully vindicated the President from all the charges on which it rested; the second object was now to be attended to, and would be discussed with all the brevity and despatch which the magnitude of the subject permitted.

This design (said Mr. B.) to overthrow the hard money system of the constitution, and to enthrone the paper money system in its place, is as old as the constitution itself, and has been the leading policy of a great political party, from the foundation of that party, near fifty years ago, and under all its mutations of name, down to the present hour. Gold and silver, though not without a struggle for a national bank and a national paper currency, were made the currency of the Federal Government by the convention which created this Government. So fixed and jealous was the mind of the convention on this point, that even the power of coining gold and silver, which had been left to the States under the articles of confederation, was taken away from them by the new constitution. The members of that great convention were not only fixed upon having gold and silver for the currency of the new Government, but also determined upon its uniformity, so that the same piece should be the same thing in form, name, device, and value, throughout the Union. The exclusion of paper money was as carefully enforced by the constitution as the adoption of gold and silver was sedulously guarded. The words of the constitution, and the history of the times, and especially the forty-fourth number of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison, all prove this. The early legislation of Congress conformed to the words and spirit of the constitution, and adopted the plainest and strongest language to guard the currency which it had adopted. The two acts fundamental for the collection of the two great branches of the revenue—lands and customs, that of 1789 for the latter, and 1800 for the former—were express that gold and silver coin only should be received for the customs, and specie and evidences of the public debt only for the public lands. These two great acts, being faithful interpreters of the constitution, have never been openly attacked in either House of Congress. In all the changes which subsequent legislation has made in the laws, of which the hard money enactments are part, these clauses have been retained in the same, or equivalent expressions; so that a hard money currency still remains the constitutional and the statutory currency of the Federal Government. Temporary enactments in favor of Treasury notes and United States Bank notes have ceased; and the joint resolution of 1816 neither does nor can repeal a law. Resolutions, whether joint or several, are not the mode of national legislation. They are only declaratory of facts or principles, or expressive of the opinions and purposes of the House or Houses from which they emanate. The joint resolution differs from the single in nothing but in being the declaration, the opinion, or the purpose, of both Houses instead of one. This being the case, and the two fundamental enactments of 1789 and 1800 being still in force, as retained in subsequent alterations of the laws to which they belong, the question is, how comes it they have been treated as dead letters on the statute book, and paper money received in place of the hard money which they imperatively require?

The answer for this question (said Mr. B.) carries us up to the time of General Hamilton, to the first year of his administration of the Treasury Department, and to the foundation of the political school of which he was the head. As the Secretary of the Treasury, it became his duty to carry into effect the act of 1789, for the collection of the custom-house duties in gold and silver coin only. Instead of carrying the law into effect, he nullified it by construction. He interpreted "gold and silver coin only" to be the notes of specie-paying banks; and a deposit of bank notes, as cash, to be a deposit of specie. This was his construction, and the order which he issued to the collectors of the revenue corresponded with it. At the ensuing session of Congress, he justified this construction in an argumentative report; and a few extracts from this report will show how the plain meaning of a law can be turned upside down by construction, and will reveal the source of the first imposition of paper money upon the Federal Government, and the reasons for that imposition.

"This section [30th of the revenue act of 1789] provides for the receipt of the duties in gold and silver coin only. The Secretary has considered this provision as having for its object the exclusion of payments in the paper emissions of the particular States, and the securing the immediate or ultimate collection of the duties in specie, as intended to prohibit to individuals the right of paying in any thing except gold or silver coin; but not to hinder the Treasury from making such arrangements as its exigencies, the speedy command of the public resources, and the convenience of the community, might dictate; these arrangements being compatible with the eventual receipt of the duties in specie. * * * Such were the reflections of the Secretary with regard to the authority to permit bank notes to be taken in payment of the duties. The expediency of doing it appeared to him to be still less questionable. The extension of their circulation by the measure is calculated to increase both the ability and inclination of the banks to aid the Government. * * * Bank notes being a convenient species of money, whatever increases their circulation increases the quantity of current money. * * * But, convinced as the Secretary is of the usefulness of the regulation, yet, considering the nature of the clause upon which these remarks arise, he thought it his duty to bring the subject under the eye of the House. The measure is understood by all concerned to be temporary. Indeed, whenever a national bank shall be instituted, some new disposition of the thing will be a matter of course."

Such was the argument, and such was the object for departing from the act of 1789, and from the constitution, of which it was the faithful expositor. The effect was the gradual and general diffusion of a paper currency over the country, and a corresponding general and gradual disappearance and banishment of gold and silver; so that when the first national bank charter expired, in 1811, the Federal Government was left without a national currency, having neither the United States Bank notes nor gold, and but little silver in the country. Mr. Madison's administration was then driven to the deplorable necessity of using State bank paper for a national currency; and the result is too well known in the ten years' convulsions of the paper system which ensued. The effect of the whole was the speedy resort to another national bank. This bank came to its conclusion under the administration of President Jackson; and he, avoiding the error into which President Madison's administration had fallen in 1811, resolved to re-establish the constitutional currency, and especially to revive the circulation of gold, which had ceased for more than twenty years. The success of this great plan was truly flattering. The gold currency, in three years, had risen from nothing to about fifteen millions of dollars, and the silver currency had increased in the same brief space from less than thirty millions to about sixty millions, and both against the determined opposition of a powerful political and moneyed party. The success of the experiment was established, and it was clear that the party opposed to gold and silver could no longer effect any thing by direct opposition. A new mode of making head against it was then fallen upon, and that new mode was to expand the paper system until it burst, and thus to ruin the party in power by ruining the finances and the currency. The general receivability of local paper for public lands, made it easy to inundate the Treasury, through the land offices, with local bank paper; and the spirit of speculation, co-operating with this political design, turned an immense flood of paper upon the national domain. It was easy to see that this mass of paper, though credited to the Government on the books of the deposit banks as specie, was not cash, but only promises to pay cash; and that, in fact, it was destined to become a new and second accumulation of unavailable funds. A crisis in the federal finances was evidently approaching, and there was every reason to believe—the floors of the two Houses of Congress daily attested the fact—that swarms of speculators, loaded with paper money, were to alight upon the public lands immediately after the rise of Congress. It was probable that many tens of millions of paper would thus have been converted into land, and that the banks which issued it, being unable to redeem it, and the deposit banks which had improvidently credited it as cash, being unable to cash it, the whole would have sunk upon the hands of the Federal Government. The evil of such a state of things is too obvious to be depicted. Not only the Federal Government would have lost its land, and lost its revenues, but the whole community would have suffered. But here the energy and foresight of President Jackson was again victorious over the designs of enemies and the imprudence of friends. He determined to arrest the floods of paper which were ready to inundate the Treasury. The specie order was issued, and the country was saved. The wrath which the miscarriage of so many fine schemes occasioned burst forth upon the President's head; the speculator for the loss of his myriad of acres, the politician for the escape of the Government from the danger that menaced it; the local banks for the loss of the national domain to bank upon; and the Bank of the United States for the loss of its anticipated opportunity of proving that a national bank was indispensable to the safe collection of the federal revenues. To make distress in the country, and charge it upon the Treasury order, was now the resort of all the disappointed parties. The Kentucky speech, and the Philadelphia letter, were the signal guns for a new panic; and the old drama of 1833 was immediately put in rehearsal for performance on the Washington boards as soon as Congress met. In every respect this second panic was a servile copy of the former; the same plot, the same scenes, the same incidents, the same performers. No fertility of invention characterized any part of it; no touch of genius enlivened the dull copy with the novelty even of a single new conception or new phrase. Here we have it now, more like a starved wolf at the door, than a roaring lion; and lending its feeble aid to the cause of this rescinding resolution. That resolution is to open the doors of the Treasury again to the inundation of paper money, that the catastrophe averted last summer may be produced next spring; and the question now is, shall Congress give up the public lands to spoil, and the public Treasury to inconvertible paper, after President Jackson has saved the country from both evils? This is the point we are now at; and if any one wishes proof of the design to overthrow the constitutional currency and to impose paper money upon the Government, let him look at the universality of the abuse now lavished upon gold and silver, and the applause bestowed upon paper money, by all that great party now palpably discriminated by the distinctive features of the Hamiltonian school. Here is a specimen, taken from the Philadelphia letter, the force and beauty of which will be fully comprehended by the boatmen of the Mississippi river.

"But this miserable foolery about an exclusive metallic currency is quite as absurd as to discard the steamboats and go back to poling up the Mississippi."

This is the manner in which this great party speak of the currency of the constitution. "Miserable foolery"—as much behind paper money as a keel is behind a steam-boat. But why lose time to prove their hatred of gold and their adoration of paper? They would be ashamed to have it thought otherwise. They take care that nobody shall think otherwise by their ostentatious abuse, in season and out of season, of the gold currency; and by their ostentatious praise, without rhyme or reason, of paper money? It is incontestable, then, that the imposition of the paper system upon the Federal Government is the second great object of this resolution; and that for the avowed reasons mentioned by General Hamilton in his argument of 1790, in favor of substituting paper for gold and silver.

Mr. B. envied not the vocation of any men, or of any party, who employed themselves in the habitual vituperation of any part of the constitution of the country, and especially that part of it which was considered by its framers as among the most important and valuable. Gold and silver is the currency of the constitution. Those who attack that currency attack the constitution, and that in one of its most valuable parts, and the very part which most universally concerns the people. Every citizen is concerned in the currency, and to attack that money which the constitution guarantees, is to attack at once his rights and the sacred instrument by which he holds them. Mr. B. had shown the origin of this war of paper against gold; he had shown it to lie at the origin of the great political parties which, under whatsoever names, have existed for near fifty years in this country; and it was perfectly clear that, from the time of General Hamilton to the present day, a preference of paper to gold and silver has been the distinctive tenet of one party, and constitutes the essential and radical distinction between the two.

Mr. B. said it was incontestable that every nation must have a national currency. It must have such a currency not only in name but in fact; and nothing can answer for a national currency but that which combines two properties: first, uniformity of value all over the country; secondly, convenient portability. Silver possesses one of these qualities, but it lacks the other; gold possesses both, and the constitution of the United States guarantees its use. Gold is then the constitutional national currency of the United States, and Mr. B. held all attempts to substitute paper in its place to be unconstitutional and pernicious. Two national banks had been chartered to furnish a national paper currency; they have both been put down, after twenty years' trial of each, by the power of the people. When the first was put down, a fatal error was committed by those who did it in not restoring gold; and that error was doubled by falling back upon local State paper, and adopting it for the currency of the Federal Government. Profiting by that great error, those who put down the second national bank made it a part of their plan, and the part upon the success of which every thing was to depend, that gold, and not local bank paper, should become the national currency of the Union. This was the plan, and, in pursuance of it, many steps have been taken towards excluding local bank paper from the receipts and expenditures of the Federal Government, and introducing gold in its place. The largest and most essential of these steps was the Treasury order of July last; and now the present movement for the rescission of that order, and for the continuation of local paper in the receipts, and consequently in the expenditures, of the Federal Government, brings up the question, whether gold or local paper is to be made the national currency? It brings up the question, for what the Government receives as cash it must pay out as cash; and what the Government thus receives and pays out becomes the currency of the country also; for the people, single-handed, cannot make head against the action of the Government.

The effect of the present movement, then, is to overturn the plan of those who put down the Bank of the United States; and to substitute for the national gold currency, which they promised the country, the actual paper currencies of all the States and Territories of the Union. This is the effect of the movement; and the question now is, will the Senate put down gold—for gold can never live in such company—and adopt all these currencies? Passing by the constitutional objection, as too obvious to need enforcement, and too often invoked without effect, Mr. B. would endeavor to address himself practically to the sense of the Senate, by showing them the mass of the evil which it was proposed to assume. Here it is, said he, (holding up a copy of Bicknell's Counterfeit Detector.) Here it is; a little volume of 32 pages, the first six containing twelve columns of the names of banks, alphabetically arranged by States and Territories, (Missouri and Arkansas the only names not in the list,) and each column containing about eighty names. The remaining 26 pages are filled with the description of the illegitimate progeny of these banks; that is to say, with a frightful and sickening exhibition of forgeries. Here, then, is near one thousand banks—probably upwards of a thousand by this time—whose promissory notes are to be put on an equal footing with gold and silver at the land offices, custom-houses, and post offices, of the United States; and which, being on an equal footing, will soon have the upper hand, and have all the custom-houses, land offices, and post offices, to themselves; for gold and silver will never go where they go, and will never abide where they sojourn.

We are called upon (said Mr. B.) to adopt this wilderness of banks as furnishers of currency to the Federal Government, to accept their paper promises to pay gold and silver, in lieu of gold and silver; and thus to make them the coiners, not of money, but of paper, for the Federal Government, and to enable them to supersede the constitutional coinage of the United States. He did not enter into the question how far the States, each for itself, might authorize paper currency; that is not the question now, but whether the Federal Government shall adopt as its own all the paper currencies of all the States and Territories? This is what we are called upon to do; and by whom? Certainly there may be some very disinterested and very patriotic men so calling; but, more certainly, there are four deeply interested classes so calling, and visibly seen at the head of the movement. These classes were, 1. The speculators, who want bank loans and bank facilities, to enable them to outbid the settlers, and to monopolize the choicest lands. 2. The local banks, who want the national domain as a capital to bank upon, and to give credit and circulation to their notes in all the new States. 3. Politicians out of power, who foresee, in the reception of this local paper, the ruin of the finances; and in that ruin foresee, also, the downfall of those now in power, and the elevation of themselves. 4. The Bank of the United States, which foresees likewise, in the same ruin, its own resuscitation; and which, pending that event, has gone into abeyance under a State charter, to be ready for the occasion. These were the classes whose clamors against the Treasury order had stunned the public ear; these were the classes who denounced the President; these were the classes who demand the instant rescission of that order. As one of those who had contributed to put down the Bank of the United States, and who had promised a restoration of the gold currency, Mr. B. must be permitted to make head against this movement, which goes to re-establish that bank, and to suppress that golden currency.

Having stated the number of the banks of the United States, he would say a word as to their reputed capitals and circulation. The chartered capital was computed at near one thousand millions of dollars; the paid-up capital was stated at three hundred and twenty-five millions; the chartered right to issue paper money exceeded one thousand millions; and the actual circulation was computed at one hundred and thirty millions. Now, all the specie in the country is computed at seventy-five millions, and all in the banks at forty-five millions; so that the reputed paid-up capital is four times greater than all the specie in the country, and seven times greater than all the specie the banks possess. Mr. B. did not pretend that the banks should always have all their capital in their hands; but he did insist that it must be in the country, so that, when needed, it could be had. The reputed paid-up capital is not in the country, by a difference of four to one; so that the fact stands revealed that a great proportion of these banks are banking on stock notes and on each other's notes; and the stockholders not being liable, the foundations of a great number of these banks must be unsolid and delusive; entirely unsafe for the community to rely upon; and that it would be a cruel thing for the Federal Government, by increasing their credit, to extend the sphere of their circulation, and to enlarge the vortex of their mischief when the day comes to which all unsolid banks are daily liable.

Treasury Circular.

Mr. B. said that we had borrowed the paper system from England, and from the Adam Smith school, whose work on political economy had appeared about the close of the American Revolution, and created that passion for banking which has since prevailed in Great Britain and our America. He would show that the English representatives of that school are now convinced of their error, and are endeavoring to extricate the country from all banks of issue except that of the Bank of England, for the solvency of which the Government of Great Britain stands security to the whole amount of its capital. Repeating that we had borrowed the paper system from Great Britain, Mr. B. had two remarks to make upon it: first, that banking with us was on a far more unsafe footing than in Great Britain; secondly, that the banks of issue were found to be too unsafe to be longer tolerated there. He proceeded to show the foundations on which he made these assertions, and afterwards to make a practical application of his remarks to the question before the Senate.

First, that banking in the United States was on a more unsafe footing than in Great Britain. There was a fundamental difference, he said, between classes of banks. In Great Britain there were two classes: one of discount, deposit, and exchange; another of circulation. This latter class was the only one existing in the United States, and it was from it that all the public evils of banking flowed. Here, then, was a radical difference between the systems of banking in the two countries; the British system having the two species of banks, and the American system having but one, and that the dangerous one. Confining his remarks, then, to the class common to the two countries, (banks of issue,) he would show that this class is on a far more unsafe footing in the United States than in Great Britain. The Bank of England, he said, was backed by the Government of Great Britain for its debts and capital. The notes of the institution were a legal tender to the Government; and in a Government whose annual taxes are two hundred and fifty millions of dollars, the legal receivability of notes to this amount is a fund for the redemption of more notes than the Bank of England ever had in circulation. Her highest issue, during the suspension of specie payments and issue of one and two-pound notes, was twenty-nine millions and a half pounds sterling, say $146,000,000. Her issues since the resumption of specie payments and suppression of one and two-pound notes, has, in a period of six years, anterior to 1832, ranged from 18,000,000 to £23,000,000 sterling, being about 100,000,000 of dollars. The taxes to the Government, then, would absorb them, though at a loss to all holders who did not owe to the Government the amount of what they held. This was some security for the notes of the bank; but there was another and a greater security, and this lay in the direct responsibility of the Government for the whole amount of the capital of the bank. The capital of that bank consisted of successive loans to the Government, commencing in 1694 in a loan of £1,200,000 sterling, and continued by additional loans, at different periods, until it amounts to £14,686,000, and bearing an interest all the time at three per cent. per annum. This is now the capital of the bank, and the debt of the Government to the bank, and the amount of the Government's direct securityship for the liabilities of the institution. No such Government security as this has existed, or can exist, in our country; and even with it the Bank of England has twice suspended specie payments, and once for twenty years, besides inflicting the ordinary evils of banking upon the Government and the country.

Proceeding to what are called the country banks in England, Mr. B. showed that they were on a safer footing than the local banks of the United States. In the first place, the partners and stockholders were each liable, in his person and property, for the whole amount of the debts of the institution; and this liability continued in the case of joint-stock partnerships until three years after a partner had ceased to belong to the institution, for every thing done while he was a member of it. In the next place, the English banks issue no note under £5, which is both a check upon their circulation, and a diminution of the danger of losses to the community. In England, every note bore a Government stamp, and paid a tax, which was also some restraint on issues. The mode of payment was another, as silver was only a tender to the amount of forty shillings; so that country bank notes could only be paid in gold or bank of England notes, and these latter could only be paid in gold; so that, directly or indirectly, gold was the fund of redemption for the whole English circulation, which was a far greater check upon bank issues than silver. In the last place, forgeries could be punished and restrained in England, and can hardly be punished or restrained in the United States. The extent of our country, and the independence of the States and their judiciaries, interpose effectual barriers against the punishment of forgeries in one State upon the paper of other and distant States. These differences, continued Mr. B., show that banking is on a less dangerous footing in Great Britain than in the United States; and, now, what is the result of experience there? It is fifty years since the Adam Smith school established their perfect idea of a paper system, and brought into general use those banks of issue on which they lavished all the holiday phrases still in vogue in the United States: "Well regulated specie-paying banks—properly constructed specie-paying banks—duly restricted specie-paying banks—safe and solid specie-paying banks." It is fifty years since these phrases ruled the legislation of Great Britain; and what is the lesson which fifty years' experience has taught? Mr. B. would not answer this question from the writings of the anti-paper school, nor even from the bullion school of England; he would answer it from the Adam Smith school itself—from the writings of Mr. McCulloch, professor of political economy in the University of London, and the present head of the Adam Smith school, whose work he has recently edited, with a volume of notes, to show what has happened since the time of Dr. Smith, and what improvements the paper system required in England. Mr. B. read the title of one of his chapters, and some passages from the chapter itself. This is the title or index to the contents of the chapter:

"Quantity of Bank of England paper afloat at different periods; effects produced on the country banks by a contraction of the issues of the Bank of England; destruction of country bank paper in 1814, 1815, 1816, also in 1825 and 1826; measures proposed in 1826 for improving the state of the currency; remarks on those measures; proposals for taking security from country banks; advantages that would result from carrying this proposal into effect; objections to it examined and answered."

Mr. B. then read some passages from the chapter itself, regretting the necessity which limited him to few and brief extracts:

1. Panic of 1793.—"The extended transactions of the country required fresh facilities for carrying them on; and, in consequence, a bank was erected in every market town, and in almost every village. To force their paper into circulation was the object of all. The catastrophe which followed was such as might have been foreseen. The currency having become redundant, the exchanges took an unfavorable turn in the early part of 1792; and the Bank of England having been, in consequence, obliged to narrow her issues, a most violent revulsion took place in the end of that year and beginning of 1793. The failure of one or two great houses excited a panic, which proved fatal to myriads more. When this revulsion began, there were, it is supposed, about 350 country banks in England and Wales; of which about 100 were compelled to stop payment, and upwards of 50 more were totally destroyed, producing by their fall an extent of misery and bankruptcy that had been, until then, unknown in England."

2. Panic of 1813.—"Up to 1813 there were banks in almost all parts of England, forcing their paper into circulation at an enormous expense to themselves. The price of corn had risen to an extraordinary height in 1813, and fell in the beginning of 1814. This fall produced a want of confidence, and an alarm among the country bankers and their customers; and such a destruction of country paper took place as has not been paralleled, except only by the revulsion in 1825. By 1816, no fewer than 240 country banks had stopped payments, and 92 commissions of bankruptcy were issued by these establishments. The failures that then occurred were the more distressing as they chiefly affected the industrious and poorer classes, and frequently swallowed up, in an instant, the fruits of a long life of laborious exertion. Thousands upon thousands, who had considered themselves affluent, found they were destitute of all real property, and sunk, as if by enchantment, and without any fault of their own, into the abyss of poverty. The universality of the wretchedness and misery had never been equalled, perhaps, except by the breaking up of the Mississippi scheme in France."

3. Panic of 1825.—"Nations are slow and reluctant learners; and it seems as if additional experience had been necessary to convince the Parliament and people of England that there was any thing defective in a system which had, in two previous instances, deluged the country with bankruptcy; and which enables every individual, however poor and unprincipled, who chooses to open a money shop, to issue notes to serve as currency in the ordinary transactions of society! A rise of prices and a rage for speculation took place in 1824-'25. Many of the country bankers seemed to have no other object than to get themselves indebted to the public; and such was the vigor and success of their efforts to get their paper into circulation, that the amount of it afloat in 1825 was estimated to be near fifty per cent. greater than the amount afloat in 1823. The consequence of this extravagant and unprincipled conduct is well known. The currency became redundant, exchange began to decline, and a heavy drain for bullion compelled the Bank of England to lessen her issues. This was the signal for the repetition of the tragedy of 1793, but on a much larger and more magnificent scale, and with more destructive consequences. Sauve qui peut! Save himself who can! was the universal cry. And the destruction of country paper was so sudden and excessive that in less than six weeks above 70 banking establishments were swept off."

This (said Mr. B.) is Mr. McCulloch's account of the three per cent. system earthquakes which have taken place since the time of Adam Smith, maugre all his fine phrases about specie-paying banks, and bank notes equivalent to gold, and convertible into gold at the will of the holder. Three times in twenty-five years has the whole blown up! to say nothing of the crisis of 1797, and the numerous small panics and individual explosions which have filled up the intervals between the large ones. The result is a conviction that banks of issue must be suppressed, directly or indirectly, all over England. The mode proposed, is to require security from them in addition to their individual liability, and that not the personal security of men, but the real security of lands mortgaged or Government stock pledged. Here is an extract from McCulloch on this point:

"Whatever bank notes may be in law, they are practically, and in fact, a legal tender. The great mass of the people are totally without the power to refuse them. The currency of many extensive districts consists almost entirely of country notes; and such small farmers, tradesmen, or laborers, as should refuse to take them, would be obliged to migrate elsewhere. There cannot, therefore, as it appears to me, be the shadow of a doubt that this is a case in which Government is imperiously called upon to interfere. We have sustained incomparably more mischief from the issue of spurious paper than from that of base coin; and in order to obviate such mischief in future, and to give that security to the public which is so essential, we have, as was observed before, no alternative, but either to suppress country notes altogether, or to require security from the issuers." * * * "In the case of Bank of England notes, a guarantee is taken by the Government for the notes which the bank issues; and the whole capital of the bank must be lost before the holders of the notes can be sufferers. Why is not the same principle followed with respect to country banks? What objection can there be against requiring of those who take upon themselves the office of furnishing the country with a circulating medium, to deposit with Government an adequate security for the performance of their engagements? In the use of money every one is a trader; those whose habits and pursuits are little suited to explore the mechanism of trade, are obliged to make use of money, and are no way qualified to ascertain the solidity of the different banks whose paper is in circulation; accordingly, we find that men living on limited incomes, women, laborers, and mechanics of all descriptions, are often severe sufferers by the failure of the country banks, which have lately become frequent beyond example. Against this mischief the public should be protected by requiring of every country bank (that is to say, every bank except the Bank of England, for which the Government is security to the whole amount of its capital) to deposit with Government, or with commissioners appointed for that purpose, funded property, or other Government security, in some proportion to the amount of their issues. No establishment for the issue of notes could then exist, unless it had been set on foot by individuals possessed of adequate capital. And adventurers, speculating on the funds of others, and sharps, anxious to get themselves indebted to the public, would find that banking was no longer a field on which they could advantageously enter."

Mr. B. would economize time and words, and proceeded to the practical application of these extracts from the present head of the paper system school in England.

Dec. 19, 1836.]

Treasury Circular.

[SENATE.]

It is a surrender and proposed suppression of all banks of issue except the Bank of England, for which the British Government is the security and the responsible backer. This is what the original of our paper system, and a far safer system than ours, has come to in England! Given up and proscribed by the school that founded it, and that school more seriously engaged now in putting down their system than they were fifty years ago in founding it. And what is the state of things with us? Not only an appalling extension of the paper system through the annual bank incorporations of nearly thirty Legislatures, State and Territorial, but this attempt now made in the Senate of the United States to compel the adoption of all the State and Territorial paper systems, existing or to exist, by the Federal Government, and thus to make out of this multifarious mass a national paper currency. This is the effect; and, without disturbing the States in the use of this paper themselves, Mr. B. confined himself to the question before the Senate, namely, the adoption of the whole of it for the currency of the Federal Government. To this he had insuperable and inexorable objections, founded, first, upon the constitution of the United States, and, next, upon the unspeakable mischiefs of the scheme. On the constitutional point he would be brief, limiting himself to the words of the instrument, and to Mr. Madison's commentary.

The constitution says: Congress shall have power—

"To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures."

"To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States."

"No State shall coin money; emit bills of credit; make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

Mr. Madison, in No. 44 of the Federalist, says:

"The loss which America has sustained since the peace, from the pestilent effects of paper money on the necessary confidence between man and man; on the necessary confidence in the public councils; on the industry and morals of the people, and on the character of republican government, constitutes an enormous debt against the States, chargeable with this unadvised measure, which must long remain unsatisfied; or, rather, an accumulation of guilt, which can be expiated no otherwise than by a voluntary sacrifice on the altar of justice of the power which has been the instrument of it. In addition to these persuasive considerations, it may be observed that the same reasons which show the necessity of denying to the States the power of regulating coin, prove, with equal force, that they ought not to be at liberty to substitute a paper medium in the place of coin. * * * The power to make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts is withdrawn from the States, on the same principle with that of issuing a paper currency."

Resting the constitutional objection to this adoption of the State paper currencies for the currency of the Federal Government where the constitution and Mr. Madison had put it, and merely referring to the great revenue acts of 1789 and 1800, for the correct exposition of the constitution, in limiting the receipts for the customs and the lands to "gold and silver coin only," and "to specie or evidences of the public debt," Mr. B. would state the heads, and the heads only, of the objections to the expediency of the measure. Premising that what the Government received, as cash, would have to be paid out as cash, and that, if local paper was received at all, it would soon be received totally, and to the exclusion of specie, and that local paper would thus become the actual currency of the Government and the country, until relieved from it by a general explosion, Mr. B. went on to enumerate the practical evils of such an unconstitutional currency.

1. The destruction of the standard or measure of value. Paper money neither is, ever was, or ever can be, a standard of value. Its quantity varies at the will of man, or rather at the will of each of the thousand Neptunes who preside over the ocean of paper; and not only at their will, but without their will, in the mere imprudence or folly of those who direct paper issues, and the thousand causes which operate upon the expansion and contraction of banks. The standard, or measure of value, is at this moment materially altered in the United States. This is seen in the increased price of every article which depends for its price upon the domestic market; and it is proved by the stationary or reduced price of every article which depended for its price on foreign markets. Cotton and tobacco were in this latter class, and had not risen, but rather fallen; all articles of home use and consumption were in the former, and all had risen, some one half, some double. The precious metals, from their uniformity of production, difficulty of suddenly and violently changing the quantity and intrinsic value all over the world, can alone make a standard or measure of value. Our constitution has guaranteed that standard to us; and it is our sacred duty to preserve it. Mr. B. finished his remarks on this point with a quotation from Mr. McCulloch, preferring his authority to others, because he was of the paper system school, though now limiting his system to the Bank of England only:

"No doubt has ever been insinuated with respect to the expediency of the regulations by which all weights and measures of the same denomination are rendered equal. But money is not a commodity merely; it is also the standard or measure, adopted by society, by which to estimate and compare the value of every thing else that is bought and sold; and if it be, as it most undoubtedly is, the duty of Government to adopt every practicable means for rendering all foot-rules of the same length, and all bushels of the same capacity, it must be still more incumbent upon it to omit nothing to render money, or the measure of value, a measure which is, beyond all question, the most important of any used in society, uniform or steady in its value."

2. Usury. This, he said, was a direct effect of paper money. The more banks of issue, the higher the rate of interest. Common bank interest in the United States is seven per cent. or more, which is double the rate of interest in Holland, where there is no paper. But common interest is nothing compared to the usury which ensues great banking, and which becomes enormous when banks, from necessity or mischief, stop discounts, and throw borrowers upon money dealers. Three per cent. discount per month is then the order of things; and this may now be seen in Philadelphia, where the United States Bank, with its thirty-five millions capital, on becoming a State institution, was to fill the State with money, and reduce interest to five per cent. But that bank does lend to some borrowers at five per cent. or less. The correspondence of the commissioners employed in examining the state of the bank, preparatory to the settlement of the value of the United States stock, shows a mass of loans, to the amount of twenty-three millions of dollars, on extended or indefinite time, and at rates from 43, 5, 53, to 6 per cent. per annum. No doubt many of the three per cent. per month borrowers get their supplies from a part of these loans.

3. Panics, convulsions, and stoppages.—These (said Mr. B.) are inherent in the paper system. They take place in England in defiance of all power in the Government and the banks themselves to keep them down. There, no panics are perpetrated to scourge the country or to overset the Government, save and except the two political ones lately seen—Mr. O'Connor's, and the one during the interregnum of Lord Grey's administration. But here, panics are the regular work of banks and politicians, and are now looked for whenever an important election is depending, or Congress is to be excited.

4. The expense of the paper system.—This was probably greater at present than the expenses of the Federal Government, and the whole a tax upon the productive classes. The number of banks was about one thousand; each bank had its officers, and they their salaries; each had its stockholders, and they their profits. Then came losses for broken banks, counterfeits, and depreciated paper, and changes in the value of property from expansions and contractions of the currency. These expenses and losses were the price paid by the people for a paper currency, when they can get constitutional currency from the mints, without paying salaries, furnishing profits, or sustaining losses, if paper was checked and confined to large notes.

5. Stock gambling, forgeries, banishment of all gold and silver, were all great evils inherent in the paper system, and too obvious to need, or even endure, commentary. Mr. B., therefore, barely named them, and left every one's knowledge and memory to do the rest.

Mr. B. approached the conclusion of his remarks on this great subject. It was, indeed, a great subject, involving that momentous question, the national currency. The Treasury order was a measure of regulation upon the State banks, intended to save the finances and the currency, as well as the public lands. The bank of the United States regulated the State banks by the simple process of excluding their paper from the Federal receipts and expenditures; and this was effected by the 24th and 25th articles of the by-laws of the corporation already read. She excluded them to make room for her own notes; and this was the extent of her skill and of her merit in all this boasted regulation of local currencies of which we hear so much. The Federal Government has only to do the same, and the State bank issues are repelled upon their sources, and become comparatively harmless. It is receivability for federal dues; it is receivability at the land offices, custom-houses, and post offices, which gives them wings to fly over the continent, and enables them to pass, without regard to the credit or solvency of the bank from which they come. It is the Federal Government endorsement which does the mischief; and this endorsement, for all the purposes of false credit and want of responsibility, is given to the whole issue of every bank whose paper is made receivable for public dues. The experiment has been tried, and local paper has failed as a national currency, and out of that failure arose the second United States Bank. It will fail again, and again, and forever! There is no safety for the federal revenues but in the total exclusion of local paper, and that from every branch of the revenue—customs, lands, and post office. There is no safety for the national finances but in the constitutional medium of gold and silver. After forty years of wandering in the wilderness of paper money, we have approached the confines of the constitutional medium. Seventy-five millions of specie in the country, with the prospect of annual increase of ten or twelve millions for the next four years, three branch mints to commence next spring, and the complete restoration of the gold currency, announce the success of President Jackson's great measures for the reform of the currency, and vindicate the constitution from the libel of having prescribed an impracticable currency. The success is complete; and there is no way to thwart it, but to put down the Treasury order, and to reopen the public lands to the inundation of paper money. Of this, it is not to be dissembled, there is great danger. Four deeply interested classes are at work to do it—speculators, local banks, United States Bank, and politicians out of power. They may succeed, but he (Mr. B.) would not despair. The darkest hour of night is just before the break of day; and, through the gloom ahead, he saw the bright vision of the constitutional currency erect, radiant, and victorious. Through regulation or explosion success must eventually come. If reform measures go on, gold and silver will be gradually and temperately restored; if reform measures are stopped, then the paper system runs riot, and explodes from its own expansion. Then the Bank of the United States will exult in the catastrophe, and claim its own re-establishment, as the only adequate regulator of the local banks. Then it will be said the specie experiment has failed! But no; the contrary will be known, that the specie experiment has not failed, but it was put down by the voice and power of the interested classes, and must be put up again by the voice and power of the disinterested community.

Appendix to Mr. BENTON's speech on the rescinding resolution, containing proofs of several things stated in the speech.

I. That the banks themselves, by contractions and expansions of the currency, lead to fluctuations which affect the prices of produce and property, and beget panics.

1. Extract from the testimony of Joseph C. Dyer, Esq., director of the Bank of Manchester, taken before Lord Althorpe's committee:

"The Bank of England, the cause of fluctuations and panics."—"The bank has been the cause of the panics. Their manner of issuing and withdrawing the Bank of England paper produces those continued fluctuations, at short periods, which affect the prices in the market, and thereby affect trade. Those issues, sometimes in a single week, vary three or four millions. The bank may be necessitated to do so, but such a necessity is that of inflicting a great evil on the country. The returns of the weekly issues from the 28th of December, 1819, to the 4th of February, 1826, prove witness's statement.

"The reason why it is necessary to make an alteration in the banking system of Lancashire, is that the circulation by the Bank of England subjects the trade to fluctuations, and exercises a pernicious influence over the destinies of commerce. This expansion and contraction of the circulation induce similar effects to a ruinous extent. All the periods of panic may be attributed to that power exercised in secret, and of which the public can have no knowledge, until it has accomplished its results. It stimulates over-issues in the country, raises and lowers the value of money capriciously, and erects its own security on the insecurity of country bankers. Such a company, possessing such influence so exercised, is a dangerous company; and plans can be devised to procure a better circulation than the present, in which there is neither stability nor steadiness."

2. Extract from the preface to the digest of evidence taken before Lord Althorpe's committee in 1832:

"The records of past history have invariably designated a time of peace as one of prosperity and happiness. But, ever since the last war, the different great interests of this country have been in a continued state of fluctuation between the extremes of prosperity and adversity; though the latter has unfortunately predominated. * * * In the beginning of that year, (1825,) every class of the community was doing well, if not in a state of great prosperity. But a change took place in the currency, by the Bank of England contracting their issues. The general prosperity, without any other visible cause, immediately received a check; and as the bank continued to contract their issues, matters became worse, until they ended in the panic. By this a total derangement of the monetary system was occasioned, and every class of the community was thrown into a state of embarrassment, the injurious and depressing effects of which continued for some years, and this without any other apparent cause than the monetary derangement which had occurred." *

"An undue issue of four or five millions by the Bank [of England] would eventually make an extraordinary derangement in the value of all the property in the kingdom, and be productive of infinite mischief in a variety of ways."

3. Further extract from the testimony of J. C. Dyer, Esq.

"I think the banks, so far from having saved the country from the effects of those panics, have been the cause of those panics; and that they have been the cause of a constant succession of little panics, continually annoying the commerce of the country, by monthly and weekly fluctuations."

4. Extract from the testimony of Benjamin J. Smith, Esq., a director of the Bank of Manchester, before Lord Althorpe's committee:

"The supply of the circulation by the Bank of England subjects our trade to great and injurious fluctuations, owing to what is called a scarcity of money, arising from causes of which the public, who are deeply interested in that question, can have no knowledge. The objections to the existing system are, that the Bank of England has a secret and despotic influence and control over the destinies of our commerce, which we feel to be a most pernicious one."

II. No local banks of issue in the great county of Lancashire, including Liverpool and Manchester. Inland bills of exchange used in large dealings; gold in the common transactions.

1. Extract from the evidence of J. C. Dyer, Esq., a director of the Bank of Manchester, before Lord Althorpe's committee:

"The bankers in Manchester who can, do not, issue notes, in consequence of the strong feeling that prevails in Lancashire against local paper. There were two occasions when that feeling was publicly expressed; first, in 1834, and next when the Bank of Manchester was formed. Bankers who intended to issue notes abandoned their intention, from a conviction that they could not, under any such circumstances, derive any profit from the issue."

2. Extract from Mr. McCulloch's notes on Adam Smith's work:

"The principal distinction between notes and bills of exchange is, that every individual passing a bill of exchange has to endorse it, and by so doing makes himself responsible for its contents. Nothing can be more inaccurate than to represent bank notes and bills of exchange under the same point of view. The note is payable on the instant, without deduction--the bill not until some future period. The note may be passed to another, without incurring any risk or responsibility, while every endorser of the bill makes himself liable for the value of it. Bank notes form the currency of all classes; of those who are not engaged in business, of women, children, laborers, &c., who are all, as we have seen, without the power to refuse them, and without the means of forming any correct conclusion as to the solvency of the issuers. Bills of exchange, on the other hand, pass only, with very few exceptions, between persons engaged in business, and who are fully aware of the risk they run in taking them."

3. Further extract from McCulloch's notes:

"The effects produced by the employment of internal bills of exchange, have not certainly excited that attention, on the part of most of those who have speculated on the subject of currency, that might reasonably have been expected; but this seems to have arisen chiefly from their having been but very imperfectly aware of the vast magnitude of the transactions settled by their intervention, and of the extent to which they are employed. In the great manufacturing county of Lancashire, and in part of Yorkshire, a bill on London at three months is reckoned a money payment; and by far the largest proportion of the currency consists either of the bills of bankers drawn on their correspondents, or of those of the merchants and dealers scattered up and down the country. The following extracts from the evidence given before the committee of the House of Lords on Scotch and Irish currency, in the session of 1826, show the great extent to which internal bills are now employed. Mr. Gladstone, an eminent merchant of Liverpool, informed the committee that 'we sell our goods, not for payments in cash, such as are usual in other places, but generally at credits from ten days to three months' date; these bills we pay to our bankers, and receive from them bills or cash. We have a considerable portion of large Bank of England notes in circulation; these are generally used for the payment of duties, and also for the purpose of remittance; but the great mass of our circulation is in bills of exchange. Sovereigns and smaller bank notes are only required for such objects as charges of merchandise, with duties, freights, and other items.' Lewis Lloyd, Esq. 'The wages of workmen are paid in gold or Bank of England notes; the manufacturer is chiefly paid in bills of exchange. When a bill is drawn in favor of a manufacturer, he endorses it to the person to whom he pays it, and the person to whom he pays it pays it again to another; and it goes on often till it is covered with endorsements. Mr. Henry Burgess, a manufacturer at Leeds. 'The great mass of the circulating medium of Lancashire, as in all the manufacturing districts in the North, is bills of exchange: a part of the circulation is in gold and silver and Bank of England notes.'"

III. Suppression of all banks of issue in England, except the Bank of England, directly by law, or indirectly, by compelling them to give security for their issues.

1. Extract from Mr. McCulloch's notes on Adam Smith:

"It seems, therefore, to be indispensable, either that the country banks should be compelled, as has been previously proposed, to give full security for their issues, or that their paper should be suppressed altogether, and the paper of the Bank of England substituted in its place. * * * Now, it is obvious, and is indeed universally admitted, that the only measure that can be adopted for guarding completely against the misconduct as well as the bad faith of the country bankers is to compel them to give full security for the payment of their notes. This, and this alone, can afford a sufficient guarantee to the public that the country paper in circulation will be returned when presented for payment, and that it is really equivalent to gold."

"Every country banker, on applying for stamps, should be required and obliged, previously to obtaining them, to lodge in the hands of Government securities, in stocks or landed estates, fully equivalent to the amount of the stamps issued to him."

2. Extract from the testimony of Henry Burgess, Esq., secretary of the committee of country banks, representing seven eighths of the bankers in England, who have resolved to relinquish their circulation rather than give security for it:

"The only strong opinion to which the committee have come is, that if securities for their issues were demanded, they would relinquish their issues altogether. That resolution was embodied in a petition to Parliament. * would cease to issue notes, if called upon for securities, is, that it would be giving a preference to one class of creditors over another; besides, giving securities would be locking up their money in the funds, which money would be thus unavailable, and be also placed at risk. * * * So they would prefer to give up their circulation."

* * * The chief reason why country bankers

IV. Extract from the report of the commissioners appointed on the part of the United States to examine into the debts and affairs of the Bank of the United States, to ascertain the value of the stock, showing above twenty millions of loans at low interest for long terms, or indefinite terms, and explaining the reason why borrowers in Philadelphia are thrown upon brokers at two and three per cent. discount per month.

THE DEPOSITE BANKS.

Mr. WEBSTER offered the following resolutions, and asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to their immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to the Senate the latest statement made at or for the Treasury of the condition of the deposit banks; exhibiting, among other particulars, the names and places of all deposit banks appointed since the 23d June last; their capitals, and the amounts of public moneys actually transferred, or ordered to be transferred, to those banks, respectively.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to the Senate a detailed statement of all transfers of public moneys ordered since the 23d June last, for the purpose of executing the act of that date for regulating the deposits of the public money; showing the dates and amounts of such transfers; from what place to what place; from what bank to what bank, and the time allowed for such transfers, other than such as were made in execution of the aforesaid act.

Mr. WEBSTER said that the honorable member from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had, in his speech yesterday, read statements which had been obtained at the Treasury, for the purpose of showing that sundry banks had enlarged their issues since the publication of the Treasury order of the 11th of July. This information (said Mr. WEBSTER) is neither new nor surprising. That fact has been well understood. But what banks are these which have thus increased their loans? Are they the banks of the country generally, or the banks in the principal commercial cities, or a majority of them? No, sir. The gentleman's statement was confined to the deposit banks, or some of them. All those deposit banks were seventy or eighty perhaps in number, while it has been stated that the whole number of banks in the country is near a thousand. Now, as I understand the subject, one of the strongest grounds of complaint against the order of the 11th of July, and against the manner of executing the deposit law, is, that by those measures many of these deposit banks, in places where the wants of business did not call for more money, have had large and entirely unnecessary sums of money nevertheless thrown into them, drawn from places in which it was wanted, to the great prejudice of other banks, and of the commercial community generally. I understand this to be one of the prominent objections to the course which the Treasury has pursued. By the provisions of the deposit law, the deposit banks pay interest on sums deposited beyond a certain amount. If they receive money, therefore, beyond such amount, they are naturally tempted to put it out on loans, however little real occasion there may be for such loans; for otherwise the deposit would be a heavy charge to them.

An answer to these resolutions will give us light on this part of the case. It will probably be in the power of the Secretary to answer the first resolution without any delay. I hope we can have the answer to that so soon as to be before us before the conclusion of this debate. Nor do I suppose that any great time will be necessary to prepare an answer to the second resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT inquired of the mover whether the resolution was intended to ask for any more than the last statement rendered at the Treasury.

Mr. WEBSTER replied that he had no wish that the inquiry should go back and call for a voluminous amount of documents; all he wished was the last statement received.

Mr. WRIGHT made no objection; and the resolution was thereupon agreed to.

REDUCTION OF DUTIES.

Mr. NILES observed that, on a former sitting, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had taken the ground that the whole subject of revenue belonged to the Committee on Finance; but if that doctrine was a sound one, the Committee on Manufactures would be left almost without any appropriate duty. He apprehended, however, that the honorable Senator was mistaken in the principle he had laid down. The compromise act recognised the principle that a reduction was to be made on the tariff of duties: the principle existed in the statutes of the country. Whatever committee it might be who should undertake the very difficult and delicate duty of devising the mode and measure of a reduction of the revenue, would find that the chief difficulty in the way was not of a financial character, but had to do with the matter of protection, not of revenue. If the subject of reduction affected very exclusively the great interests of the country, ought it not to be sent to the Committee on Manufactures? In order to test the sense of the Senate, he would make the motion that so much of the President's message as related to the reduction and repeal of duties be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that the question was not open to a motion; the reference had been made. If the gentleman wished to move a reconsideration, he could not do so unless he had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. NILES had supposed it in order to refer the same subject to two different committees, who might view it under different aspects. However, to avoid difficulty, he would confine his motion to so much of the message as related to the repeal of duties only.

Mr. CALHOUN said that this was included in his motion as much as the other. Whatever went to reduce the revenue he meant to refer to the Committee on Finance, as appropriately belonging to that committee. And he must be permitted to say that no committee in that body could represent more fully all the great interests concerned in such a subject. The chairman was connected extensively with one branch of Manufactures; the Senator from New York with another; and the Senator from Louisiana represented the great sugar interest of the South; while he from Missouri represented that of lead. As to the difficulty of the task, none could be more sensible of it than himself; none had felt it more deeply. The reduction, thus far, had been effected only by exertions such as he should be sorry to repeat.

On motion of Mr. EWING, the subject was then laid on the table.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution introduced by Mr. EWING, of Ohio, rescinding the Treasury order of July 11, 1836, and prohibiting the Secretary of the Treasury from delegating the power to designate the kind of funds to be received in payment for the public lands.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, who had the floor, having moved the adjournment yesterday, yielded it to

Mr. BENTON, who read several extracts, to which he had referred in his speech of yesterday. Having concluded, he restored the floor to

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The opening of Mr. C's speech was in so low a tone as to be totally inaudible to our reporter. As soon as he was distinctly heard, he was observing that the Senate had been complained of by the Senator from Missouri, not only for having been tardy in its appropriations of money for the public service, at its last session, but for not having appropriated enough. The Senate had voted appropriations to the amount of thirty-eight millions, but this was complained of as scanty measure, and the Chamber had been gravely rebuked for not having done much more. Now, Mr. C. was very ready to take his share, and the share of any other gentleman who was tired of it, in the reproofs of the honorable Senator for an open opposition to a portion of this appropriation, and he should have considered himself fortunate had he and his friends been so far successful as to have defeated them. So far from regretting or being ashamed of the opposition he had made to this lavish expenditure of money, he took it to himself as a merit; so that, if the design of the honorable Senator, in his exhortation and reproof, had been to excite repentance, the homily had entirely failed.

But the more immediate subject before the Senate was the Treasury order, which it was proposed by his friend from Ohio to rescind, and to this he should endeavor to confine himself. The subject had been debated by the Senator from Missouri with all that zeal and ability which usually characterized the efforts of that gentleman. Nor had Mr. C. any difficulty in readily excusing even a more than ordinary measure of zeal in that Senator on this occasion; for he thought, from a variety of facts, pregnant with circumstantial evidence, that he could very clearly see the true and genuine paternity of the order in question. He could not but believe that its descent from the honorable Senator might be as correctly traced as could be done in any other case of genealogy.

On the 22d of April last, the honorable Senator had submitted a resolution that from and after the — day of — nothing but gold and silver should be received in payment for the public lands; and that the appropriate committee should report a bill to that effect. The subject was resumed on the following day, and by a vote of the Senate was laid upon the table. In that inglorious repose it had remained by general consent. It was permitted to sleep in silence, which amounted to the most unequivocal condemnation of the measure. This body then did condemn, as far as it could in such a mode, the very thing contained in this Treasury order; the author of the resolution being among the few, the very few, advocates who voted in its favor. But no sooner had Congress adjourned, than, on the 11th of July, the very measure, in regard to which the Senate had expressed its most decided opinion in the negative, was wrought up into the form of a Treasury order, surrounded, indeed, and embellished with sundry arguments directed against land speculators, and in favor of occupants or squatters. The very proposition which was rejected by Congress in April was enforced as a Treasury order in July. Who could have any difficulty in tracing the origin of the order to the rejected resolution? No sooner had the Senate condemned and rejected it, than it was instantly taken up in an executive department, and made to possess as complete effect as if the same thing had been done by the very law which the Senate refused to enact. Mr. C. would not, on this occasion, allude to another exertion of executive authority, the circumstances of which very strikingly resembled the present case; when Congress, just before its adjournment, had declared the public money to be safe in the keeping of the Bank of the United States, but had no sooner adjourned than that very money was seized upon by the executive authority, and transferred to the deposite banks. In both cases the executive authority had been made to supply the place of the legislative. The eloquent Senator from Missouri had, in one clause of his speech, invoked the genius of the constitution. Now, supposing that genius would come at the gentleman's bidding, would it pronounce a proceeding like this to be in conformity with that instrument? Were not the members of that and of the other House competent to decide on questions of the currency?—questions which deeply affected all their constituents, far and wide. Did it not belong to Congress to settle such questions? And did not the duty of the Executive consist in carrying into effect that which Congress in its wisdom might ordain? But here that which Congress disapproved and refused to enact is immediately carried into effect by the Executive, without any other legislative authority or sanction than the profound opinions of the Senator from Missouri. Mr. C. objected not only to the measure itself, but to the time and manner of its enforcement. Even were the thing itself not in violation of law and the constitution, still the time and the manner in which it was done were derogatory to the dignity, judgment, and authority of Congress. What was the time which had intervened between the rejection of the resolution and the enactment of the order? It was the brief space between the close of April and the 11th of July. What great change had occurred within that time to justify such a measure? Mr. C. would, therefore, be in favor of rescinding the order, were it on no other ground than that of vindicating the Senate from the disrespect that seemed to him to have been offered to it by that proceeding.

[SENATE.]

Treasury Circular.

But there were other more decided objections to a measure of this character, two of which he would distinctly specify. The first was, that it made an unlawful discrimination between different classes of American citizens; and, secondly, it made an equally unjust discrimination between debtors for the public lands and all other debtors to the Government. First, it made a personal distinction between citizens of the United States; gold and silver was demanded of all purchasers of the public domain, unless they were actual settlers of the land they wished to purchase, or bona fide residents of the State within which the lands lay. Here was a personal distinction, grounded merely on place of residence. A particular species of currency was exacted from the one class, while another less valued species was accepted from the other class. Could this be done? Was it consistent with equity? With equal rights of American citizens? The public domain was the common property of the whole people; and how did the resident of Illinois, or Ohio, or of Indiana, become possessed of higher rights in the purchase of it than you or I? Why was he entitled to easement in the manner of making his payments? Where was the law or the constitution giving him such a right? Where could it be found? Nowhere.

But it had been said that the discrimination was the same which had been made by various acts of Congress in favor of actual settlers; and Mr. C. would not contest that fact. But suppose it to be conceded that Congress did possess the right, and considered it good policy to make a discrimination in favor of settlers, by yielding them a priority in the purchase of the tracts they had cultivated, how far would this go in advancing the gentleman's conclusion? Because Congress had power to do this, did it follow that the Executive had power to do it? Who ever heard of the Executive setting up a claim of authority to fix the price of the public lands, or, what was equivalent, to determine in what species of currency the land should be paid for? In what sense could this be regarded as an executive power? It was his place to execute the laws, but it belonged to Congress to judge what the laws should be.

Mr. C. said it had been argued that the laws authorized the receivers at the land offices to receive nothing but gold and silver, and that this order only carried the law into effect. Such an argument did, indeed, admit the authority of the law; but how did it bear upon the order? If the law required payment in gold and silver for the public land, how could it be dispensed with, as it was, by the order, in regard to citizens residing within the States wherein the land lay? There was no dispensing power confided to the Executive to set aside the law, and no discretionary authority to make a difference between citizens equal before the law. The public lands were common property, which all had a right to buy on the equal terms prescribed by law, and the Secretary of the Treasury had no more right to assign different modes of payment to different classes of citizens, than he had to give more lands to one, and less to another, for the same money. In this view the order was altogether illegal.

But again: On what principle of justice was one class of debtors required to pay their debts in gold and silver, and another class in what was deemed by the Government less valuable? With accuracy enough for the purposes of the present argument, the revenue may be stated at forty millions of dollars; one half paid in the West, for the purchase of public lands; the other half in the East, for duties and imposts. What right had the Executive to declare that the Western half should be exacted in gold and silver, but that the Eastern half might be paid in bank paper? The arbitrary inequality and injustice of such a regulation would be clear to every understanding. Mr. C. could not be content under a discrimination so invidious and offensive. What must be the effect upon the West of continuing such an order in force? The money was collected by the land offices, and thence poured into the banks, but it was not expended in the West. The great objects of public expenditure, as every one knew, were on the Atlantic seaboard. It was there that the colossal palaces, under the name of custom-houses, were to be found. It was there that fortifications reared their formidable front, and bristled from point to point along the whole coast. It was there that all the great expenditures for the navy were to be made. If the money derived from the sale of the public lands were to be applied to the ordinary expenditures of the Government, then this mass of specie which was collected in the West was to be transported from year to year to the Atlantic States; and it could not be otherwise. The millions derived from the sale of the public lands could not be expended in the West, and therefore there would be a perpetual drain of specie out of the Western into the Eastern States. The people of the West could not be insensible to these results, or otherwise than justly indignant at a measure marked with invidious distinctions, which permitted their Eastern brethren to pay their debts to Government in the ordinary medium of business, but compelled them to pay in gold and silver.

When the knowledge of this order first reached the place of Mr. C's residence, the objections which he had stated had suggested themselves to his mind on the first perusal, but he had at that time no apprehension that the effects to be produced on the currency and business of the country were likely to be so extensive. If, as it appeared, the object of the order was the accumulation of specie in the banks, he doubted not that there would be a thousand ways devised to evade and defeat it. He thought that the same thousand dollars, by being made to travel backward and forward between the bank and the land office, might be made to purchase land enough to satisfy the desires of any number of buyers. Mr. C. spoke on this subject from information and conjecture, having had no personal experience. He had never attended a land sale in his life, and knew nothing of the arts employed; but it was reasonable to suppose that men who were much engaged in business of this kind would become expert in availing themselves of every advantage in conducting it. But he had also thought that, on this side of the mountains, it would be easier to evade the order than on the other; for there was a proviso which admitted a certificate of deposit in the Treasury to be received in the place of cash. This, he supposed, would obviate the transportation of specie to the West, and would require it only to be carried to Washington, in which there would be no great difficulty; but he had since understood that a mode had been devised still more convenient: the intended purchasers would obtain drafts on the Bank of the Metropolis. They would present these drafts at the counter, and the question was asked, do you want hard money? Yes, I want to buy land. The matter was easily managed. A certain amount of silver was put into a little keg, and this was put into a wheel-barrow and carried across the street to the Treasury, where the requisite certificate was granted of so much money deposited in the Treasury. The keg was then wheeled back to the bank, and this had been repeated until it became a matter of open ridicule among the subalterns of the Treasury. This little barrel had been rolled backward and forward from the bank to the Treasury and from the Treasury to the bank, a distance of not more than fifty yards, until, according to a calculation which had been made, it had travelled about 1,100 miles; and this was the boasted metallic circulation. This process did but exemplify, to a considerable extent, the operation of this Treasury order over the whole country. But, allowing for all these evasions, this order undoubtedly has and must continue to occasion large sums of gold and silver to be temporarily withdrawn from general circulation, and paid into the land offices. From these offices it is transferred to the deposit banks—is there subjected to the ordinary banking uses and purposes, and serves to strengthen and fatten these corporations, to the prejudice of the general circulation, and of those banks from which that gold and silver has been withdrawn. To compensate for these evils, and this derangement of the currency, what adequate good has been or can be produced by this order? I cannot perceive it—it appears visionary to me to suppose that it will add a single dollar to the amount of the specie of the United States.

But, sir, the direct operation of this order has not, probably, been more injurious, or perhaps so much so, as its indirect consequences in producing distrust and alarm. When the Treasury raises its mighty arm, the banks are shaken far and wide. The sudden call for gold and silver, made by this order, aided by some other causes, rendered the banks, to some extent, uneasy, and created apprehensions in the minds of the holders of their notes. The consequence was that these holders pressed the banks for payment; the banks pressed their debtors, and withheld their customary accommodations; and thus, sir, derangement and pressure were more severely and widely extended. Such, I know, has been the case in Kentucky to a considerable extent.

The Senator from Missouri had exhibited a table, the results of which he had pressed with a very triumphant air. Was it extraordinary that the deposit banks should be strengthened? The effect of the order went directly to sustain them. But it was at the expense of all the other banks of the country. Under this order all the specie was collected and carried into their vaults, an operation which went to disturb and embarrass the general circulation of the country, and to produce that pecuniary difficulty which was felt in all quarters of the Union. Mr. C. did not profess to be competent to judge how far the whole of this distress was attributable to the operation of the Treasury order, but of this at least he was very sure, through a great part of the Western country it was universally attributed to that cause. The Senator from Missouri supposed that the order had produced no part of this pressure. If not, he would ask what it had produced? Had it increased the specie in the country? Had it increased the specie in actual and general circulation? If it had done no evil, what good had it done? This, he believed, was as yet undiscovered. So far as it had operated at all, it had been to derange the state of the currency, and to give it a direction inverse to the course of business. The honorable Senator, however, could not see how moving money across a street could operate to affect the currency; and seemed to suppose that moving money from west to east, or from east to west, would have as little effect. Money, however, if left to itself, would always move according to the ordinary course of business transactions. This course might indeed be disturbed for a time, but it would be like forcing the needle away from the pole; you might turn it round and round as often as you pleased, but, left to itself, it would still settle at the north. Our great commercial cities were the natural repositories where money centred and settled. There it was wanted, and it was more valuable if left there than if carried into the interior. Any intelligent business man in the West would rather have money paid him for a debt in New York than at his own door. It was worth more to him. If, then, specie was forced, by Treasury tactics, to take a direction contrary to the natural course of business, and to move from east to west, the operation would be beneficial to none, injurious to all. It was not in the power of Government to keep it in a false direction or position. Specie was in exile whenever it was forced out of that place where business called for it. Such an operation did no real good. It was a forced movement, and was soon overcome by the natural course of things.

Mr. C. was well aware that men might be deluded and mystified on this subject, and that, while the delusion lasted, this Treasury order might be held up before the eyes of men as a splendid arrangement in finance; but it was only like the natural rainbow, which owed its very existence to the mist in which it had its being. The moment the atmosphere was clear, its bright colors vanished from the view. So it would be with this matter. The specie of the country must resume its natural course. Man might as well escape from the physical necessities of their nature, as from the laws which governed the movements of finance: and the man who professed to reverse or dispense with the one was no greater quack than he who made the same professions with regard to the other.

But it was said to be the distribution bill which had done all the mischief; and Mr. C. was ready to admit that the manner in which the Government had attempted to carry that law into effect might in part have furnished the basis for such a supposition. He had no doubt that the pecuniary evils of the country had been aggravated by the manner in which this had been done. On this subject, however, he confessed himself to be but a learner. He had no doubt that the Government might so have distributed the money as to avoid all injurious consequences, and might have so managed the operation that the transmission of these funds, instead of occasioning injury or inconvenience, might rather have increased the prosperity of the country; by falling in with the natural and legitimate course of business. But this had been passed by, and the Government had proceeded, like a porter or drayman, to carry the public money from one quarter of the country to the other. Thus, millions of specie had been carried from New York to Kentucky; but the people of Kentucky would have preferred that it should have remained in New York, for there they might have disposed of it at a premium of one or two per cent. This would have fallen in with the course of business, and have been beneficial to the country. But, as it was, the effect was the reverse.

But, sir, according to the honorable Senator from Missouri, all the evil which was not the effect of the distribution law was the effect of a panic, "a little starveling panic, no bigger than a church mouse;" a panic which was now over; which, contemptible as it was, had enjoyed the distinguished honor of dying by the hand of that Senator, and meeting its end, like Cæsar, in the Capitol. And was this all the comfort which the gentleman had to give under the pressures and distresses of the commercial interest? Mr. C. did not presume to set himself up as a competent judge of mercantile affairs. There were other gentlemen on that floor who far better understood the interest of that meritorious class of our fellow-citizens, and who would speak on the subject in due time. But if there was any truth in the representations universally given, there was an extreme pressure now felt in all our great cities, from Boston to New Orleans, the effect of which was rapidly spreading through the interior. What was the cause of this embarrassment? The gentleman said it was this little panic. Well, but what was the cause of the panic? Who made it? What caused it? Was it not the Treasury order? The Senator loved the order well, but not the panic; and all the remedy he could propose was to tell the sufferer it is but a panic, a contemptible little panic, a petty starveling panic; the country is sound, the country is safe. Sir, of what invaluable use has been that little word? It has furnished its full contribution to the beauty and the force of many a ponderous and patriotic argument of the Senator from Missouri. It has given point to many a sentence; it has helped to round off many a sonorous period. He has wielded it like some well-tryed and favorite weapon, and has displayed great skill in its use. It seems there have been three great panics, which the gentleman has noted like so many eras of the plague. Whatever may be the national misfortune, and how loudly soever it may call for a remedy, when legislative wisdom can furnish none other, it is a sufficient remedy to cry panic! panic! Sir, it is a senatorial specific, a ready panacea for all the evils of the body politic. Yes, sir, this is all. Your statesmanship goes no farther. Tell the people it is a panic, and let them understand that all the enemies of General Jackson's administration have united by common consent to get it up and keep it up. A legislator will thus feel that he has fully discharged his duty to the country and to his constituents when he has duly vociferated panic! panic! Two per cent. a month is given for money, and it is all panic, panic.

A justification for this illegal Treasury order is further attempted by telling us that there are in the country one thousand banks, and that it is the design of this resolution to fasten on the country an odious paper system, and to pay for the public domain in the rotten and worthless notes of one thousand banks. To this the honorable Senator is opposed. So are we all. But he seems to think that all are not opposed to it; and he has traced down, from the days of Hamilton, the existence of a great and formidable party which hates gold and silver; and if I correctly understand how I must take my place in this division of parties, I must be one of those who hate gold and silver. Now, permit me to assure the honorable Senator that I partake at least so much of mortal mould as that gold and silver coin are not among the objects of my antipathy. These "rascal counters" do not indeed engross my affections, but they are very far from being odious to me. No very serious defence or reply, however, would seem to be necessary to the strange and exaggerated accusation of hating gold and silver. If, as I suppose, the honorable gentleman intended to apply that accusation to his political opponents here, I would suggest to him that he would probably do them no disservice if he would please to make good his charge by convincing the public that they have no love for these precious metals. It would certainly place them in striking contrast with the party of the honorable Senator; and what he imputes as a crime might possibly be regarded as a recommendation. The love of gold and silver has so much prevailed as the vice of political parties, and been the cause of so much abuse and corruption in Governments, that probably the people of the United States might be tempted to make the experiment of administering their Government by a new set of agents or rulers taken from this newly discovered sect of money-hating politicians—the first party of that description, I think, which has yet appeared in the world. But, sir, however this may eventuate, I ought perhaps to admit, whatever be its merit or demerit, that the party of the honorable Senator do love gold and silver better than their opponents. That party has been long blessed with opportunities of manifesting this attachment, and it has not neglected them. Its long and strict monopoly of the public Treasury, with all its shining heaps, and the manner in which it has used that monopoly, sufficiently attest its affection for the precious metals. Indulgence, too, may have increased this passion; for it is exactly one of those cases where "increase of appetite doth grow by that it feeds on."

On the other hand, sir, the opponents of this party have been so long excluded from all these opportunities and indulgences, that they are supposed, it seems, to have lost the natural taste, and, as if in mockery, are denounced as "haters of gold and silver." I know of no better grounds on which the honorable Senator can rest his accusation, nor does any reply occur to me better suited to its ludicrous gravity.

But now, sir, seeing that the honorable Senator is of that party which loves so well the constitutional currency, let me ask him what his love will prompt him to do? This Treasury order, it seems, is not the ultimate scope and aim of his attempts. What is it he would wish for? Is it to destroy all banks? Is it to annihilate the entire paper system, and give us in place of it showers of gold and showers of silver? Why, sir, if the fiat of that gentleman could annihilate at a blow all the bank notes in the country, does he really believe that the business of this community could be carried on without them? Sir, to attempt to transact the affairs of the American community by a medium of gold and silver coin, would be little better than going back to the old Spartan expedient of bars of iron.

But from what does the Senator infer that the party to which he is opposed hate, or at least are opposed to, gold and silver? Is the party which advocated the Bank of the United States the party which is in love with the paper system? That is his argument. But what was one of the chief grounds on which they advocated that bank? Was it not that its influence went to maintain a solid currency, convertible into gold and silver? Was it not that, by means of its central situation and extensive control, it would check excesses of local banks? So far from being opposed to gold and silver, it was the object of that party to keep up a circulation both of hard money and good paper, and secure to the country the advantages of both. And now, can we advance an argument in this House on the subject of the currency, without coming under some reproach about the Bank of the United States? You have put down that institution, which actually accomplished all that this order professes to aim at, and now just what we predicted is daily coming to pass. State banks are springing up like mushrooms in all parts of the country, and that under the patronage of the Government, and according to its earnest wishes. And these constitute a part of the thousand banks which figure so largely in the speech of the honorable Senator. Is not this the very effect which we told you would follow the destruction of the Bank of the United States? If you are flooded with banks, and the paper of some of them is of doubtful credit, is it the fault of those who did their best to preserve that which would have kept down these spurious issues? What can be more unjust than to charge us with loving this state of things? But is it not even ludicrous to contrast what has actually happened with the predictions of the party opposed to us, and to which the Senator belongs? They told us that the State banks would give us a better currency. The executive messages, year after year, gave us the most solemn assurances that the State banks would fully supply the place of the Bank of the United States; that no distress would be the result, but that we should have a better currency. Behold the consummation of these prophecies. Do not the prophets stand in a position perfectly ludicrous? Are the notes of these thousand banks a better currency than the notes of the Bank of the United States? If they are, then why not receive them for the public lands? Did any man doubt the solvency of the Bank of the United States, or the goodness of its notes? You destroyed that bank. Your better currency is come in the place of it; we bring it to your own doors, and you spurn it. We offer it to you, and you reply, "What! convert the public lands into reams of spoiled and speckled paper, called money?" Thus scorned, thus hooted at, is that very currency which you told us was to be better than the notes of the United States Bank; and because we prophesied such a currency, and labored to prevent its coming upon the country, we are now to be called haters of gold and silver!

We too, sir, are opposed to converting the public lands into worthless bank notes. But we supposed that, dubious as the credit of many of these banks is justly considered, some of them are good, and that the notes of these should be received from the people, without running into the sudden and inconvenient extreme of rejecting every thing but gold and silver; a measure the more harsh in its operation and character, because of its being the unexpected act of an administration that, up to that very instant, had encouraged the circulation of these bank notes, by proclaiming it to be a "better currency" than that which had been furnished by the Bank of the United States.

But the Senator tells us that the object of this resolution is twofold. Its prime object is to disgrace General Jackson, and the second, which is little inferior in importance, is to overthrow the national currency. These are the two revolutionary consequences which the Senator supposes to be aimed at by my friend from Ohio. For myself, I can with great truth say that I am actuated in this matter only by my view of the good or bad policy of the Treasury order, disconnected entirely from all personal feeling toward General Jackson. I have no more personal feeling against him on this subject than

I have against you, sir. Would you consider it an impeachment on your integrity for a gentleman to differ from you as to the policy of a political measure? Surely not. Why, then, should the Senator suppose that a motion to rescind this Treasury order must be intended to dishonor General Jackson? Sir, I object wholly to this introduction of presidential influence into debate on this floor. Is it becoming in us to say one to another, you must do this or that, lest the President should feel himself degraded? Is this a fit weapon to be wielded in this House? The Senator from Missouri, from the intimacy he is supposed to enjoy with the President, may be considered as speaking with authority on such a subject. But may I, who am in some degree excluded from the presidential smiles, attempt to carry a measure through the Senate by threatening the presidential frown? May every little whipster wield this weapon over our heads? What is to be the influence of such threats? What is to be the end of such a system? What must its end be but to resolve all legislation into the will and wish of the Executive? The scope of such an argument would leave this Senate little more than a tame registry of presidential edicts. The Government may retain the shadowy forms of republican freedom, but it will become in fact a stern, substantial monarchy. The phrase "degrade the President" is to be used as so many cabalistic words: the moment they are uttered the Senate is to be silenced. The President thinks a certain measure right, therefore we must think it right. I read that Philip of Macedon had but one eye, and he covered the place of the other with a patch. His influence in Greece, which had long been increasing, at length reached that point that to court his favor the Grecian Senators appeared in their places with a patch over the left eye. [A laugh.] So I suppose it is to be with us. If the President on any occasion happens to do wrong, we are not to think or to speak on the subject, and must prefer to do injustice to ourselves, rather than run the risk of degrading the President.

I suppose I am to understand the Senator from Missouri, when he speaks of the "constitutional currency," to mean a currency of gold and silver. But the constitution says nothing on the matter, save that the States shall pass no law making any thing but gold and silver a legal tender. That is all it contains on the subject. But I will here tell that gentleman that I do to a great extent, agree with him in the picture he has drawn of a degraded paper currency, and I will very gladly contribute my mite to correct so great an evil. But I fear it is beyond our reach. The banks of which he complains hold their existence under State authority, and all our arguments amount to nothing more than mere idle speculation. You have no bank. You rejected that you had, and refused to make another. Is this Treasury order the mode in which you would correct the evils of excessive banking? Would you disorder and derange the whole currency of the country, in order that the banks may explode? For all the evils of the existing system that gentleman and his party are fully chargeable. They put down that institution which would have prevented the whole. They did it with the consequences plainly before their eyes—clearly shown, and distinctly foretold. They persevered, and those consequences have now come. From that act have grown up all these evils—evils which the Senator paints in glowing colors, but evils from all which I look forward in trembling hope to an ultimate deliverance. I entertain as great an apprehension of the danger of these thousand banks as he does; but it is a danger which the Treasury order will not remove. I am opposed to that measure, because it is not a competent remedy. Instead of mitigating, it aggravates the evil; and I therefore hope the resolution before us will receive the sanction of this body.

Public Deposites.

The gentleman is full of thanks to the President of the United States. Well, sir, I really have no idea that the President had in this matter any view or purpose hostile to the best interests of this country. I can readily imagine that his objects and his motives were of the most beneficent character. But, sir, where is the great occasion for this outpouring, this outbursting of gratitude; so earnest, so sublime, that it approaches to adulation, nay, to positive adoration? I hope I am not insensible to the obligations of gratitude; but I have no idea that we are forever to be looking up to the President as a sort of demi-god, who has showered down benefits upon us notwithstanding our ill deserts—benefits entirely supererogatory, and such as we had no right to expect or hope for. No, sir, I am willing to treat the President with due respect, and to acknowledge all his good deeds in such a manner as becomes an American citizen; further than this I am not disposed to go.

The Senator, (said Mr. C.,) in the peroration of his eloquent harangue, transported by the fervor of his victorious argument, regretted that there was not more talent and genius on the other side, over which he might prosecute still further conquests. He seems to lack something. Like the victorious Saracen, who carried the true faith through the world on the point of his sword, or like Alexander, who called for more worlds to conquer, the honorable Senator, after having exulted in triumph over all that had been brought against him, calls out for more talent and more genius over which to pursue his conquering course. It is not, probably, in my power, sir, to contribute what is thus called for to swell the gentleman's triumph; nor is it for me, sir, longer to keep the field when such champions are engaged.

When Mr. CRITTENDEN had concluded, and taken his seat,

Mr. BENTON explained that his remarks on the want of talent, argument, &c., were not intended to apply to the actors in the Senate, but to those out of it who, he supposed, had prepared the subject.

The question being announced from the Chair as being on ordering the resolution to a second reading,

Mr. EWING called for the yeas and nays on this question; which were accordingly ordered.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the credentials of the Hon. JUDAH DANA, elected a Senator from the State of Maine, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. ETHEN SHERBURN; after which, the oath to support the constitution of the United States was administered to Mr. DANA by the Vice President, and he took his seat.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

Mr. CALHOUN, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bill:

A bill to extend the provisions of certain sections therein named of the act of the 23d June, 1836, regulating the deposits of the money that may be in the Treasury on the 1st January, 1838.

Be it enacted, &c., That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1838, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, on the terms and according to the provisions of the 13th, 14th, and 15th sections of the act to regulate the deposits of the public money, approved the 23d day of June, 1836.

Mr. C., in introducing the bill, observed that he had not asked leave to introduce this bill without satisfying himself that there would be a large surplus of the public revenue remaining in the Treasury at the termination of the next year, after allowing for very liberal appropriations on all proper subjects of expenditure. From the calculations he had made, he was convinced that the amount of this surplus would not fall short of eight millions of dollars.

He was fully aware that the Secretary of the Treasury, in the report submitted by that officer to Congress, had taken a very different view; yet Mr. C. thought he hazarded little when he said that on this subject the Secretary was certainly mistaken. He knew, indeed, that formerly such an assertion from a member of Congress, in relation to the highest fiscal officer of the Government, would have been deemed adventurous; but so vague, so uncertain, so conjectural, and so very erroneous, had been the report from that Department for two or three years last past, that he could not be considered as risking much in taking such a position. That in this remark he did no injustice to the Secretary of the Treasury, (toward whom he cherished no personal hostility or unkind feeling whatsoever,) he would take the liberty of presenting to the Senate the estimates made by that officer for the present year, in December last, and comparing with it the actual result, as now ascertained from the Secretary's own report, made the present season. His estimate of the receipts from all sources, including the public lands and every other branch of the revenue, amounted to $19,750,000, whereas the report stated those receipts to have amounted to $47,691,898; presenting a difference in the estimate, for a single year, of $27,941,898. Thus the excess of the actual receipts had exceeded the estimate by more than one third of the whole amount of the estimate. Each of the great branches of the revenue, the customs and the public lands, exceeded the estimate by millions of dollars.

Again: the Secretary had estimated the balance at the end of the year, then within four weeks of its termination, at $18,047,598, whereas the report showed that the balance actually amounted to $26,749,803, being an error of $8,702,250 for that short period. How these errors arose, whether from negligence or inattention, or whether they were made purposely to subserve certain political views, it was not for him to say; but they were sufficient to show that he ran no very formidable hazard in venturing to say that the views of the Secretary in respect to what was yet future might be erroneous.

But further: the Secretary, in his report last year, had estimated the available means of the Treasury for the current year at $37,797,598; they were now ascertained to have been $74,441,701, exhibiting the small error of $46,644,104. We might search the fiscal records of all civilized nations, and would not find in the compass of history an error so monstrous. He stated this with no feelings of ill will toward the Secretary, but with emotions of shame and mortification for the honor of the country. How must errors like these appear in the eyes of foreign nations? How would they look to posterity?

But he was not yet done. The Secretary estimates the expenditures of the year at $23,103,444, whereas they turned out to be $31,435,032, making a difference of $8,331,588. He estimates the balance in the Treasury at the end of this year at $14,500,000. He now admits that it will equal $43,005,669, making an error of $28,505,669, and this notwithstanding he had made an under-estimate of the expenditure of more than eight millions, which, if added, as it ought to be, would make a mistake of nearly thirty-seven millions.

The Secretary, however, had profited by the errors of last year. The estimates in the present report were somewhat nearer to the truth, but were still far removed from it. And, indeed, so small was the amount in which he had profited, that he had risked an opinion that the expenditure would exceed the income, so that, of the sum which had been deposited with the States, a portion, amounting to between two and three millions, would have to be refunded. The Secretary held out language of this kind, when he acknowledged that the income of the year would be $24,000,000. Mr. C. said he would be glad to see the administration, with such an income, venture to call upon the States to pay back the moneys they had received. No administration would venture the call, except in the case of a foreign war, in which case these deposits would prove a timely and precious resource. With proper management, they would enable the Government to avoid the necessity, at the commencement of a war, of resorting to war taxes and loans. All those gentlemen, and he saw several of them around him, who were here at the commencement of the last war, would well remember the difficulty and embarrassment which attended the operation of raising the revenue from a peace to a war establishment.

Assuming, then, that there would be a surplus, the question presented itself as to what should be done with it. That question Mr. C. would not now attempt to argue. The discussion of it at this time would be premature and out of place. He proposed to himself a more limited object, which was to state the points connected with this subject, which he considered as established; and to point out what was the real issue at present. One point was perfectly established by the proceedings of the last session—that, when there was an unavoidable surplus, it ought not to be left in the Treasury, or in the deposit banks, but should be deposited with the States. It was not only the most safe, but the most just, that the States should have the use of the money in preference to the banks. This, in fact, was the great and leading principle which lay at the foundation of the act of last session—an act that would forever distinguish the 24th Congress—an act which will go down with honor to posterity, as it had obtained the almost unanimous approbation of the present day. The passage had inspired the country with new hopes. It had been beheld abroad as a matter of wonder, a phenomenon in the fiscal world, such as could have sprung out of no institutions but ours, and which went in a powerful and impressive manner to illustrate the genius of our Government.

He considered it not less fully established that there ought to be no surplus, if it could be avoided. The money belonged to those who made it, and Government had no right to exact it unless necessary. What, then, was the true question at issue? It was this: Can you reduce the revenue to the wants of the people?—he meant in a large political sense. Could the reduction be made without an injury that would more than counterveil the benefit? The President thought it could be done; and Mr. C. hoped he was correct in that opinion. If it be practicable, then, beyond all question, it was the proper and natural course to be adopted. It was under this impression that he had moved to refer this part of the President's message to the Committee on Finance. He not only considered that as the appropriate committee, but there were other reasons that governed him in making the reference. A majority of that committee were known to be hostile to the deposit bill, and would, therefore, do all in their power to avoid the possibility of having a surplus. If, then, that committee could not effect a reduction, then it might be safely assumed as impracticable. If they could agree on a reduction, the Senate no doubt would readily concur with them.

There was one point on which the committee need have no apprehension: that any reduction they might propose to make would be considered by the South as a breach of the compromise act. Her interest in that act is not against the reduction, but the increase of duties. If it be the pleasure of other sections to reduce, she will certainly not complain.

Mr. C. said he would take this occasion to define with exactness the position he occupied in regard to the compromise. He stood, personally, without pledge or plighted faith, as far as that act was concerned. He clearly foresaw, at the time that bill passed, that there would be a surplus of revenue in the Treasury. He knew that result to be unavoidable, unless by a reduction so sudden as to overthrow our manufacturing establishments—a catastrophe which he sincerely desired to avoid. Whatever might be thought to the contrary, he had always been the friend of those establishments. He thought at the time that the reduction provided for in the bill had not been made to take place as fast as it might have been. But the terms of the bill formed the only ground on which the opposing interests could agree; and he, as representing in part one of the Southern States, had accepted it, believing it, on the whole, to be the best arrangement which could be effected; yet he saw (it did not, indeed, require much of a prophetic spirit) that there were those who were then ready to collect the tariff at the point of the bayonet, rather than yield an inch, who, when the injurious effects of the surplus should be felt, would throw the responsibility on those who supported the bill. Seeing this, Mr. C. had determined that it should not be thrown upon him. He had, therefore, risen in his place, and, after calling on the stenographers to note his words, he had declared that he voted for that bill in the same manner, and no other, that he did for all other bills, and that he held himself no further personally pledged in its passage than in any other. Mr. C. was therefore at perfect liberty to select his position, which he would now state. We of the South had derived incalculable advantage from that act; and, as one belonging to that section, he claimed all those advantages to the very last letter. That act had reduced the income of the Government greatly. Few, he believed, were fully aware of the extent to which it had operated. It was a fact, which the documents would show, that the act of 1828 arrested at the custom-house one half in value of the amount of the imports. The imports at that time, deducting reshipments, were about sixty-five millions of dollars in value, out of which the Government collected about thirty-two millions in the gross. The imports of the last year, deducting reshipments, amounted to $120,000,000, which, if the tariff of 1828 had not been reduced, would have given an increase of $60,000,000, instead of something upwards of $21,000,000. He claimed not the whole difference for the compromise, but upwards of $20,000,000 may be fairly carried to its credit. Under this great reduction, we of the South began to revive. Our business began to thrive and to look up. But the compromise act had not yet fully discharged its functions. Its operation would continue until the revenue should be brought down till no duty should exceed 20 per cent. ad valorem, and the revenue be reduced to the actual wants of the Government. But, while he claimed for the South all these very important advantages, Mr. C. trusted he was too honest, as well as too proud, while he claimed those benefits on her part, to withhold whatever advantage the North may derive from the compromise. His position, then, on the question of reduction, was to follow, and not to lead; and such he believed to be the true position of the South. If it be the wish of other sections to reduce, she will cheerfully follow; but I trust she will be the last to disturb the present state of things.

Having thus clearly defined his own position, Mr. C. said he would venture a suggestion. If the manufacturing interests would listen to the voice of one who had never been their enemy, he would venture to advise them to a course which he should consider as wise on all sides.

It is well known, said Mr. C., that the compromise act makes a very great and sudden reduction in the years '41 and '42. He doubted the wisdom of this provision at the time; but those who represented the manufacturing interest thought it was safer and better to reduce more slowly at first and more rapidly at the termination of the term, in order to avoid the possibility of a shock at the commencement of the term. He thought experience had clearly shown that there could be no hazard in accelerating the rate of reduction now, in order to avoid the great and rapid descent of '41 and '42; and in this view it seemed to him that it would be wise to distribute the remaining reduction equally on the six remaining years of the act. It was, however, but a suggestion.

Mr. C. observed that, had not this been the short session of Congress, he should have postponed the introduction of the present bill, and awaited the action of the Committee on Finance. But it was possible that committee might find it impracticable to reduce the revenue, and as there were but about two months of the session left, if something were not effected in the mean time, a large surplus might be left in the Treasury, or rather in the deposit banks—left there to disturb and disorder the currency of the country; to cherish and foster a spirit of wild and boundless speculation, and to be wielded for electioneering purposes. A standing surplus in the deposit banks was almost universally condemned. The President himself had announced it in his message, and Mr. C. heartily agreed with him in every word he had said on that subject.

Before sending the bill to the Chair, he would take the liberty of expressing his hope that the subject would be discussed in the same spirit of moderation as had characterized the debates upon it last year. It was a noble example, and he hoped it would be followed. Let the subject be argued on great public grounds, and let all party spirit be sacrificed on this great question to the good of the country. Yet, he would say to the friends of the administration, that it was not from any fear, on party ground, that he uttered this sentiment; for he believed there was no subject which, in the hands of a skillful opposition, would be more fatal to power.

The bill was, by consent, read twice; when Mr. CALHOUN moved that it be made the order of the day for Monday next. He saw no necessity for its commitment.

Mr. CLAY was extremely unwilling to interrupt for a moment (and he would only interrupt for a moment) the progress of the debate expected to proceed to day. But, from the numerous indications which had been given of a purpose to disturb the compromise act, and from the direct allusion to the subject which had just been made, he felt himself called upon to say one word. Considering the circumstances under which that act passed, the manner through this body, the acclamation with which it ran through the House, the cordial reception with which it was greeted by every part and every interest in the country, he did not think that it ought to be lightly touched. In faith of adherence to the provisions of that act, large investments have been made, and under its beneficent operation every interest has prospered, the manufacturing not less than other great interests. The whole country has looked to the inviolability of the act: the messages of the President; the reports from the Secretary of the Treasury; the declarations of members of Congress, upon this floor and that of the other House, all heretofore have united in stamping upon it that character. Strictly speaking, he was aware that Congress possessed the power to repeal or modify the act; but in his opinion it could not be done, without something like a violation of the public faith. He had foreseen, at the period of the passage of the act, the probability of a large surplus beyond the wants of the Government, economically administered, and he had endeavored, simulaneously with the passage of the act, to provide for it by the introduction of the land bill. That bill had passed Congress, but unfortunately had encountered the veto of the President. If that bill had received his sanction, there would have been no surplus at the last session, none now, probably none hereafter, to divide and distract us; for it was from the proceeds of the public lands that the surplus arose. If the land bill which passed at the last session of the Senate had become a law, it would have distributed among the several States a larger sum than will be deposited in their treasuries under the deposit act.

Mr. C. said that he well knew that the preservation of the compromise act did not depend upon him. He well knew that its fate was in the hands of a majority of the Senate, as now constituted, and a majority of the House; and if they chose to repeal it, or to make any essential alteration in the measure of protection secured by that act, he could only deeply regret the reopening of wounds which had been so happily healed. He could co-operate in no such object, but should, for himself, steadily oppose any material change of the provisions of the act, and insist upon that efficacious and complete remedy for a surplus which is to be found in the land bill, or upon some other competent remedy, which would not unsettle all the great business of the country.

Mr. WALKER moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance; and, in supporting his motion, observed that he had been one of those who voted against what was now openly avowed to be a distribution bill. Since the money had been distributed, some of the largest States had already come forward and applied to Congress for the repeal of that section of the bill which provided for the refunding of the money by the States, when it should be needed by the General Government. He would remind the Senate that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who had been one of the authors and advocates of this measure, did expressly tell the Senate that it would be but a single operation; and when the Senate were warned that that bill would be only a precedent for the distribution policy in future, the distinguished Senator had assured them of the contrary, and had insisted that it was a single and solitary measure, intended only to meet a contingency. Yet, what was the Senate now asked to do? To create a surplus for the purpose of future distribution. Mr. W. really thought that such a proposition demanded examination by some committee, and he hoped that the Senate would not consent to take a leap in the dark. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina had presented, as one ground of his opposition to letting the public money remain in the deposit banks, a desire to prevent the public land from passing into the hands of speculators. But the gentleman's remedy had not met the evil. The distribution bill had not prevented the monopoly of the public lands by speculators, nor would it ever prevent it. If the gentleman did really desire to obviate that evil, let him join in recommending that part of the President's message which proposed to limit the sale of the public lands to actual settlers. Should this recommendation be adopted, there would remain no surplus to be distributed. For how was the surplus created? By referring to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it would be found that, in the first three quarters of the last year, twenty millions of dollars had been paid into the Treasury for the public lands, which was at the rate of about twenty-five millions a year. Yet, what portion of this amount was needed for actual settlers? Not more than $5,000,000; or, according to an estimate made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, not over $8,000,000. Thus there would be a reduction in the receipt of $16,000,000, being double the amount of the surplus predicted by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. Let him, then, adopt the President's recommendation, and the evil apprehended could not take place. But should the Senate pass the bill which had now been introduced, they would have passed the Rubicon, and the distribution policy would, in spite of all opposition, become the settled policy of the Government.

Mr. W. called upon the Senate and upon the country to remark that they were now invoked by the gentleman from South Carolina to create a surplus for the purpose of distribution.

Mr. CALHOUN, in reply, complained of having been entirely misstated by the Senator from Mississippi. He had not invoked the Senate to any such act, nor had he said any thing like it. But he had said that no administration could honestly plead any necessity for demanding back the deposits from the States, unless in the contingency of a foreign war. So far from having expressed a desire to create and distribute a surplus, he had, on the contrary, expressly declared that he should greatly prefer a reduction of the revenue, if it could be safely effected; and he had expressed his willingness to send the bill to a committee opposed to his own views, that, if possible, this might be effected. Yet the gentleman accused him of a design to create a surplus.

The gentleman had again said that one of the arguments urged by him in favor of the distribution bill had been, that the deposit of the public money in banks was a great instrument of fraud and speculation. This was a great mistake. He had said no such thing. The President, however, had undertaken to legislate on the subject, and had issued an order, which was much more like an act of Congress than an executive measure. The President deemed the evil so great, and the remedy so specific, that he had ventured on a great stretch of power to realize the object. Now, after what the President had said on this subject, any man who should vote to leave the public money in deposit banks stood openly convicted of being in favor of speculators.

Mr. C. hoped the Senator would not persist in his motion to refer the bill to a committee which he knew to be utterly opposed to it. Nothing could be more unparliamentary. He hoped the gentleman would at least indulge him with a special committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN, without expressing any opinion on the merits of the bill, was in favor of its commitment. The subject extended itself into so many ramifications, was so complex and so extensive, that no leading measure ought to be adopted in relation to it without its previously undergoing the careful investigation of a committee. There were two counter projects now before the Senate, which were essentially incompatible with each other. One had been reported by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] which proposed to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States on certain conditions; the other to deposit the surplus that might accrue, under the provisions of the bill of the last session. Both these plans, it was obvious, could not prevail; while the President had recommended the sale of the public domain to actual settlers only. On this matter Mr. B. expressed no opinion, but should be guided in a great measure by the wishes and opinions of gentlemen coming from the new States.

Should the President's recommendation be adopted, there would probably be no surplus. He should like to see a responsible report from the Committee on Finance. On the question whether there would or would not be a surplus on the 1st of January next he expressed no opinion.

While up, he would add one word on the subject of what was commonly called the compromise act. Never should he forget the impression made upon his own mind when the news of the passage of that act first reached him. He had then been in a foreign country. The enemies of liberty throughout the world were all looking to this country with anxious eyes, and with hopes highly raised, that this last experiment in favor of human freedom would prove to be a failure. The most exaggerated accounts of the division of opinion in this country, on the subject of the tariff, were spread throughout Europe, and the expectation appeared to be general that our Union would be dissolved, and the republic expire. In such circumstances, when he heard that a compromise had been effected, his bosom had been pervaded by a feeling such as he had never known before. Without being acquainted with the particulars of the bill, he was prepared to approve of it in advance. On further examination, however, he could not say whether he should have supported the bill or not, but the country had received it; the great manufacturing and agricultural interests had welcomed it, and to this moment relied upon it as, in some sense, the charter of their hopes. Other prevailing interests of the country shared in the feeling, and never would Mr. B. give his vote in favor of touching one of its provisions. That could not be done without extensively and injuriously affecting, not only the agricultural and manufacturing, but another great interest of his own State. He referred to the mining interest. On the whole, he hoped that they should have a report from a committee; and should it even be adverse to the bill, yet, such were the well-known zeal, perseverance, and talents, of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, that he would still find ways and means to bring the merits of his project fully before the minds of the Senate.

Mr. WALKER said that the Senator from South Carolina had appealed to him to indulge him with a special committee. But that gentleman would do well to remember that, when on a former occasion he (Mr. W.) had introduced a bill of great importance to Mississippi, and asked its reference to a select committee, that gentleman had opposed the motion, and had sent the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, which he well knew to be opposed to every one of its provisions. In insisting, therefore, on his original motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Finance, he had only followed an example which the gentleman had set him.

Mr. W. then went into some explanations to show that he had not misunderstood or misrepresented the objects of the Senator from South Carolina. If that gentleman should oppose the President's recommendation in regard to selling the public lands to actual settlers only, it would, in effect, be equivalent to voting to create a surplus. Mr. W. said he had no wish to alarm the manufacturing interest, toward which he entertained no hostility; but he would now tell that interest throughout this country, that if they wished to preserve the compromise bill, the mode was to prevent an exorbitant sale of the public lands. If this were permitted to continue, a surplus revenue could not be prevented without touching the compromise bill. Mr. W. had, on the last session, offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain and report to Congress what reduction in the tariff and in the price of the public lands would be necessary to bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government, but in such a manner as not to infringe on the compromise. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] had moved to lay that resolution on the table; not because he was particularly hostile to it, but because he wished to press some other subject which was before the Senate; and afterward there had been no opportunity to call it up. Mr. W. should not now depart from the spirit of that resolution. He had no wish to violate the compromise, but desired that the reduction should be in conformity with the 6th section of that bill, (which he read.)

SENATE.]

Public Deposites.

The Senate had been told by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] that the faith of the nation stood pledged to preserve that bill inviolate. But that bill declared, in the most express terms, that the reduction of the revenue was not to be made by depositing it with the States—that was no feature of the compromise—but by a reduction of duties. He had ascertained that the reduction which his plan would effect would amount to three millions of dollars. Deduct this from the eight millions derived from the sale of public lands to actual settlers, and it would leave five millions of dollars, being just the amount which the Senator from South Carolina had thought it was proper to retain as an unexpended balance in the Treasury. Mr. W. insisted on his motion for referring the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CALHOUN rejoined and explained, with a view to show that the case of which the gentleman from Mississippi complained was not parallel to the present, and still insisted on the propriety of allowing him a special committee. If, however, the Senate should resolve to send this bill to the Committee on Finance, he should not be at a loss to understand the movement. He had read the President's message attentively. It was an extraordinary document. He had read with no less care the report of the Secretary of the Treasury: that, too, was an extraordinary document. The perusal had suggested some suspicions to his mind; and should the present bill be sent to the Finance Committee, those suspicions would be fully confirmed. Such a measure would go far to convince him that the policy of the administration was agreed upon, and that it would be to make a demonstration on a reduction of the revenue, but, in fact, to leave that revenue in the deposit banks. The end of this session was not far off, and that would tell whether he were not correct in his opinion. He would now, in his turn, venture to become a prophet, and he would predict that, if the present motion succeeded, that very thing which the President in his message had most decidedly condemned would be the thing actually realized. Notwithstanding the President's opposition to the collecting of the surplus revenue, and all he had said on its tendency to promote speculation and corrupt the public morals, that was the thing which would be done. He was sorry he did not see the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] in his place. On that gentleman, peculiarly, lies the obligation to provide for the reduction of the revenue. Mr. C. well knew the difficulty of touching this subject. He had himself had a full and sound trial of that operation. He knew the efforts by which the existing reduction had been effected, and he felt very sure that the Senator from New York could not be sanguine in the expectation of effecting a reduction to any great amount. He had heard much said in private on that subject, and he could not but regret that the President, when alluding to it in his message, had not referred to the difficulties attending it. Mr. C. thought he saw how things were to go, and he thus openly announced what his conviction was. He believed nothing would be done to reduce the revenue; that the money would still be collected, and would be left, not where it ought to be found, in the treasuries of the States, but in the deposit banks.

If the Finance Committee would report an adequate reduction of the revenue, Mr. C. would consent to withdraw his bill. He should infinitely prefer a reduction to a distribution, provided the thing could be done. In the meanwhile the South claimed the execution of the compromise bill; it had not only closed a long and painful controversy, but had enabled them to make some feeble stand against the progress of executive influence. He concluded by moving for a special committee.

Mr. RIVES was in favor of referring the bill to the Committee on Finance, but as the Senator from South Carolina considered the denial of a special committee as involving some want of courtesy, he would state the considerations which led him to the conclusion that that would be the proper committee. The Senator himself had said, but yesterday, that the Committee on Finance was the committee to whom the entire subject of the reduction of the revenue specially belonged. The Senator had entered into a calculation to show that there would be a surplus in the Treasury at the commencement of the year, and on this he grounded his bill. The question, therefore, at the root of the whole matter was, whether there would be such a surplus. This was a question which obviously pertained to the Finance Committee. The gentleman, relieving himself from every thing like a pledge to abide by the provisions of the compromise act, expressed his strong preference of a reduction of the revenue to its distribution; but the question whether it could safely be reduced certainly was a question coming within the range of the appropriate duties of that committee. Mr. R. reverted to the history of the deposit bill, and expressed his satisfaction at the reflection that he had rendered it his hearty support. He did not now recede, in the slightest degree, from the ground he had then occupied. But the Senate was now in a different position; they were at the opening of a new session of Congress, and were enabled, from all the lights of past experience, to look ahead with something like certainty. If they foresaw the probability of a surplus of revenue, they were bound to guard against it by attempting a reduction. That, beyond question, was the true policy. Mr. R. adverted to the prophecy by Mr. C. that the policy of the administration was to be a false and deceitful demonstration on reduction, while none was to be made, and the money was to remain in the deposit banks. [Mr. CALHOUN shook his head at the words "false and deceitful."] Well, a demonstration, at all events, was to be made, and all that had been said by the President in his message against surplus revenue would turn out a delusion. [Mr. C. assented.] Yet the gentleman had, no longer ago than yesterday, expressed the highest satisfaction with the Finance Committee, and been lavish of his compliments on the gentlemen composing it, when the object was to refer this very measure of reduction to that committee. Did the gentleman mean nothing more than a demonstration? Had he not been in earnest? He hoped the gentleman had no such policy, nor could he suppose him to have.

Mr. CALHOUN repelled the charge of inconsistency. He had been in favor of sending the subject of a reduction of the revenue to the Committee on Finance, because he considered the subject as appropriate to their specific duties; but he was opposed to sending this bill to that committee, because they were known to be adverse to its object. In one case, he had gone on the great parliamentary principle that propositions were to be referred to committees favorable to the object proposed; and in the other case, he still had sent it to a committee at least not unfavorable to the measure. He was rejoiced to hear the honorable Senator from Virginia declare so explicitly that he did not repent the course he had taken in reference to the compromise bill; he was confident the gentleman never would have reason to repent the able and honorable course he had pursued on that memorable occasion; and he trusted the gentleman would agree in sentiment with those who were opposed to leaving the public money in the deposit banks. Mr. C. had given many evidences of his desire that a reduction should be made in the revenue; and had, on a former occasion, sent a bill to the Committee on Manufactures for that object, which afterwards had passed the Senate almost unanimously, and had been sent to the other House, after which it was never again heard of. He was not the man, however, to disturb the terms of the compromise, which had so happily been effected, unless it should be done by common consent. The South were prepared to assent to such a step, and if the North would also agree to it, there need be no difficulty in the case. The gentleman from Virginia seemed to suppose that, because it was the duty of the Finance Committee to consider the question whether there was likely to be a surplus revenue or not, therefore this bill ought to be sent to them. The argument was too wide: on the same principle, every proposition which related to the application of any portion of the public resources must be sent to that committee. It would swallow up almost all the business of the Senate. He concluded by demanding the yeas and nays on the question of commitment.

Mr. RIVES briefly rejoined. As the Senator from South Carolina was only conditionally in favor of the proposition in the bill, in the event that there would be a surplus, and that the revenue could not be reduced; and as the question whether it could be reduced belonged confessedly to the Committee on Finance, it involved no violation of the parliamentary principle to which the Senator had alluded, to send this bill to that committee. Mr. R. hoped he should not be understood as wishing wantonly to interfere with the provisions of the compromise bill; he was far from desiring any such thing. He held the compromise in great respect, as having effected a great national good in the settlement of an agitating and alarming question. But he was free to say that, if any mode could be devised of bringing down the revenue to the wants of the Government, without interfering with the enactments of that bill, he should be opposed to disturbing them in any way. But it was a fundamental duty of legislation to dispense with all unnecessary taxes, and reduce the burdens of the people as far as the necessities of Government would permit. If this could not be done without touching some parts of the compromise bill, it must be touched; but if it could, then that bill, in all its provisions, ought to be sacredly maintained.

The question of referring the bill to the Committee on Finance was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Niles, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, Knight, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wright—22.

The yeas and nays being equal, the Chair voted in the affirmative.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of Mr. Ewing's joint resolution, rescinding the Treasury order of July 11th, 1836, and prohibiting the Secretary of the Treasury to delegate the power to specify the kind of funds to be received in payment for the public lands. The question being on ordering the resolution to a second reading,

Mr. WEBSTER rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: the power of disposing of this important subject is in the hands of gentlemen, both here and elsewhere, who are not likely to be influenced by any opinions of mine. I have no motive, therefore, for addressing the Senate, but to discharge a public duty, and to fulfil the expectations of those who look to me for opinion, whether availing or unavailing, to whatever I believe to be illegal or injurious to the public interests. In both these respects, the Treasury order of the 11th of July appears to me objectionable. I think it not warranted by law, and I think it also practically prejudicial. I think it has contributed not a little to the pecuniary difficulties under which the whole country has been, and still is, laboring; and that its direct effect on one particular part of the country is still more decidedly and severely unfavorable.

The Treasury order, or Treasury circular, of the 11th of July last, is addressed by the Secretary to the receivers of public money, and to the deposit banks. It instructs these receivers and these banks, after the 15th day of August then next, to receive in payment of the public lands nothing except what is directed by existing laws, viz: gold and silver, and, in the proper cases, Virginia land scrip; provided that till the 15th of December then next, the same indulgence heretofore extended, as to the kind of money received, may be continued, for any quantity of land not exceeding 320 acres, to each purchaser who is an actual settler or bona fide resident in the State where the sales are made.

The exception in favor of Virginia scrip is founded on a particular act of Congress, and makes no part of the general question. It is not necessary; therefore, to refer farther to that exception. The substance of the general instructions is, that nothing but gold and silver shall be received in payment for public lands; provided, however, that actual settlers and bona fide residents in the States where the sales are made, may purchase in quantities not exceeding 320 acres each, and be allowed to pay as heretofore. But this provision was limited to the 15th day of December, which has now passed; so that, by virtue of this order, gold and silver are now required of all purchasers and for all quantities.

I am very glad that a resolution to rescind this order has been thus early introduced; and I am glad, too, since the resolution is to be opposed, that opposition comes early, in a bold, unequivocal, and decided form. The order, it seems, is to be defended as being both legal and useful. Let its defence, then, be made.

The honorable member from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] objects even to giving the resolution to rescind a second reading. He avails himself of his right, though it be not according to general practice, to arrest the progress of the measure at its first stage. This, at least, is open, bold, and manly warfare.

The honorable member, in his elaborate speech, founds his opposition to this resolution, and his support of the Treasury order, on those general principles respecting currency which he is known to entertain, and which he has maintained for many years. His opinions some of us regard as altogether ultra and impracticable; looking to a state of things not desirable in itself, even if it were practicable; and, if it were desirable, as being far beyond the power of this Government to bring about.

The honorable member has manifested much perseverance and abundant labor, most undoubtedly, in support of his opinions; he is understood, also to have had countenance from high places; and what new hopes of success the present moment holds out to him, I am not able to judge, but we shall probably soon see. It is precisely on these general and long-known opinions that he rests his support of the Treasury order. A question, therefore, is at once raised between the gentleman's principles and opinions on the subject of the currency, and the principles and opinions which have generally prevailed in the country, and which are, and have been, entirely opposite to his. That question is now about to be put to the vote of the Senate. In the progress and by the termination of this discussion, we shall learn whether the gentleman's sentiments are or are not to prevail, so far, at least, as the Senate is concerned. The country will rejoice, I am sure, to see some declaration of the opinions of Congress on a subject about which so much has been said, and which is so well calculated, by its perpetual agitation, to disquiet and disturb the confidence of society.

We are now fast approaching the day when one administration goes out of office, and another is to come in. The country has an interest in learning, as soon as possible, whether the new administration, while it receives the power and patronage, is to inherit, also, the topics and the projects of the past; whether it is to keep up the avowal of the same objects and the same schemes, especially in regard to the currency. The order of the Secretary is prospective, and, on the face of it, perpetual. Nothing in or about it gives it the least appearance of a temporary measure. On the contrary, its terms imply no limitation in point of duration, and the gradual manner in which it is to come into operation shows plainly an intention of making it the settled and permanent policy of Government. Indeed, it is but now beginning its complete existence. It is only five or six days since its full operation has commenced. Is it to stand as the law of the land and the rule of the Treasury, under the administration which is to ensue? And are those notions of an exclusive specie currency, and opposition to all banks, on which it is defended, to be espoused and maintained by the new administration, as they have been by its predecessor? These are questions, not of mere curiosity, but of the highest interest to the whole country.

In considering this order, the first thing naturally is, to look for the causes which led to it, or are assigned for its promulgation. And these, on the face of the order itself, are declared to be "complaints which have been made of frauds, speculations, and monopolies, in the purchase of the public lands, and the aid which is said to be given to effect these objects by excessive bank credits, and dangerous if not partial facilities through bank drafts and bank deposits," and the general evil influence likely to result to the public interest, and especially the safety of the great amount of money in the Treasury, and the sound condition of the currency of the country, from the further exchange of the national domain in this manner, and chiefly for bank credits and paper money."

This is the catalogue of evils to be cured by this order. In what these frauds consist, what are the monopolies complained of, or what is precisely intended by these injurious speculations, we are not informed. All is left on the general surmise of fraud, speculation, and monopoly. It is not avowed or intimated that the Government has sustained any loss, either by the receipt of bank notes which proved not to be equivalent to specie, or in any other way. And it is not a little remarkable that these evils, of fraud, speculation, and monopoly, should have become so enormous and so notorious, on the 11th of July, as to require this executive interference for their suppression, and yet that they should not have reached such a height as to make it proper to lay the subject before Congress, although Congress remained in session until within seven days of the date of the order. And what makes this circumstance still more remarkable, is the fact that, in his annual message at the commencement of the same session, the President had spoken of the rapid sales of the public lands as one of the most gratifying proofs of the general prosperity of the country, without suggesting that any danger whatever was to be apprehended from fraud, speculation, or monopoly. His words were: "Among the evidences of the increasing prosperity of the country, not the least gratifying is that afforded by the receipts from the sales of the public lands, which amount, in the present year, to the unexpected sum of eleven millions." From the time of the delivery of that message down to the date of the Treasury order, there had not been the least change, so far as I know, or so far as we are informed, in the manner of receiving payment for the public lands. Every thing stood on the 11th of July, 1836, as it had stood at the opening of the session, in December, 1835. How so different a view of things happened to be taken at the two periods, we may be able to learn, perhaps, in the further progress of this debate.

The order speaks of the "evil influence" likely to result from the further exchange of the public lands into "paper money." Now, this is the very language of the gentleman from Missouri. He habitually speaks of the notes of all banks, however solvent, and however promptly their notes may be redeemed in gold and silver, as "paper money." The Secretary has adopted the honorable member's phrases, and he speaks, too, of all the bank notes received at the land offices, although every one of them is redeemable in specie, on demand, but as so much "paper money."

In this respect, also, sir, I hope we may know more as we grow older, and be able to learn whether, in times to come, as in times recently passed, the justly obnoxious and odious character of "paper money" is to be applied to the issues of all the banks in all the States, with whatever punctuality they redeem their bills. This is quite new, as financial language. By paper money, in its obnoxious sense, I understand paper issued on credit alone, without capital, without funds assigned for its payment, resting only on the good faith and the future ability of those who issue it. Such was the paper money of our revolutionary times; and such, perhaps, may have been the true character of the paper of particular institutions since. But the notes of banks of competent capitals, limited in amount to a due proportion to such capitals, made payable on demand in gold and silver, and always so paid on demand, are paper money in no sense but one; that is to say, they are made of paper, and they circulate as money. And it may be proper enough for those who maintain that nothing should so circulate but gold and silver, to denominate such bank notes "paper money," since they regard them but as paper intruders into channels which should flow only with gold and silver. If this language of the order is authentic, and is to be so hereafter, and all bank notes are to be regarded and stigmatized as mere "paper money," the sooner the country knows it the better.

The member from Missouri charges those who wish to rescind the Treasury order with two objects: first, to degrade and disgrace the President, and, next, to overthrow the constitutional currency of the country.

For my own part, sir, I denounce nobody; I seek to degrade or disgrace nobody. Holding the order illegal and unwise, I shall certainly vote to rescind it; and, in the discharge of this duty, I hope I am not expected to shrink back, lest I should do something which might call in question the wisdom of the Secretary, or even of the President. And I hope that so much of independence as may be manifested by free discussion and an honest vote is not to cause denunciation from any quarter. If it should, let it come.

As to an attempt to overthrow the constitutional currency of the country, if I were now to enter into such a design, I should be beginning, at rather a late day, to wage war against the efforts of my whole political life. From my very first concern with public affairs, I have looked at the public currency as a matter of the highest interest, and hope I have given sufficient proofs of a disposition at all times to maintain it sound and secure, against all attacks and all dangers. When I first entered the other House of Congress, the currency was exceedingly deranged. Most of the banks had stopped payment, and the circulating medium had then become, indeed, paper money. So soon as a state of peace enabled us, I took some part in an effort, with others, to restore the currency to a better state; and success followed that effort.

But what is meant by the "constitutional currency," about which so much is said? What species, or forms of currency, does the constitution allow, and what does it forbid? It is plain enough that this depends on what we understand by currency. Currency, in a large, and perhaps, in a just sense, includes not only gold and silver and bank notes, but bills of exchange also. It may include all that adjusts exchanges, and settles balances, in the operations of trade and business. But if we understand by currency the legal money of the country, that which constitutes a lawful tender for debts, and is the statute measure of value, then, undoubtedly, nothing is included but gold and silver. Most unquestionably there is no legal tender, and there can be no legal tender, in this country, under the authority of this Government or any other, but gold and silver, either the coinage of our own mints, or foreign coins, at rates regulated by Congress. This is a constitutional principle, perfectly plain, and of the very highest importance. The States are expressly prohibited from making any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts; and, although no such express prohibition is applied to Congress, yet, as Congress has no power granted to it, in this respect, but to coin money, and to regulate the value of foreign coins, it clearly has no power to substitute paper, or any thing else, for coin, as a tender in payment of debts, and in discharge of contracts. Congress has exercised this power, fully, in both its branches. It has coined money, and still coins it; it has regulated the value of foreign coins, and still regulates their value. The legal tender, therefore, the constitutional standard of value, is established, and cannot be overthrown. To overthrow it, would shake the whole system.

But if the constitution knows only gold and silver as a legal tender, does it follow that the constitution cannot tolerate the voluntary circulation of bank notes, convertible into gold and silver at the will of the holder, as part of the actual money of the country? Is a man not only to be entitled to demand gold and silver for every debt, but is he, or should he be, obliged to demand it in all cases? Is it, or should Government make it, unlawful to receive pay in anything else? Such a notion is too absurd to be seriously treated. The constitutional tender is the thing to be preserved; it ought to be preserved sacredly, under all circumstances. The rest remains for judicious legislation by those who have competent authority.

I have already said that Congress has never supposed itself authorized to make any thing but coin a tender, in the payment of debts, between individual and individual; but it by no means follows from this, that it may not authorize the receipt of any thing but coin in payment of debts due to the United States.

These powers are distinct, and flow from different sources. The power of coinage is a general power; a portion of sovereignty, taken from the States and conferred on Congress, for the sake both of uniformity and greater security. It is to be exercised for the benefit of all the people, by establishing a legal tender and standard of value in all transactions.

But when Congress lays duties and taxes, or disposes of the public lands, it may direct payment to be made in whatever medium it pleases. The authority to lay taxes includes the power of deciding how they shall be paid; and the power granted by the constitution to dispose of the territory belonging to the United States carries with it, of course, the power of fixing not only the price, and the conditions, and time of payment, but also the medium of payment. Both in respect to duties and taxes, and payments for lands, it has been, accordingly, the constant practice of Congress, in its discretion, to provide for the receipt of sundry things, besides gold and silver. As early as 1797, the public stocks of the Government were made receivable for lands sold; the six per cents. at par, and other descriptions of stock in proportion. This policy had, probably, a double purpose in view—the one to sustain the price of the public stocks, and the other to hasten the sale and settlement of the lands. Other statutes have given the like receivable character to Mississippi stock, and to Virginia land scrip. So Treasury notes were made receivable for duties and taxes; and, indeed, if any such should now be found outstanding, I believe they constitute a lawful mode of payment, at the present moment, whether for duties and taxes or for lands.

But, in regard both to taxes and payments for lands, Congress has not left the subject without complete legal regulation. It has exercised its full power. The statutes have declared what should be received, from debtors and from purchasers, and have left no ground whatever for the interference of executive discretion or executive control. So far as I know, there has been no period when this subject was not subject to express legal provision. When the duty act and the tonnage act were passed, at the first session of the first Congress, an act was passed also, at the same session, containing a section which prescribed the coins, and fixed their values, in which those duties were to be paid. From that time to this, the medium for the payment of public debts and dues has been a matter of fixed legal right, and not a matter of executive discretion at all. The Secretary of the Treasury has had no more power over these laws than over other laws. He can no more change the legal mode of paying the duty than he can change the amount of the duty to be paid; or alter the legal means of paying for lands, with any more propriety than he can alter the price of the lands themselves. It would be strange, indeed, if this were not so. It would be ridiculous to say that we lived under a Government of laws, if an executive officer may say in what currency, or medium, a man shall pay his taxes and debts to Government, and may make one rule for one man, and another rule for another. We might as well admit that the Secretary had authority to remit or give in the debt of one, while he enforced payment on the other.

I desire, sir, even at the expense of some repetition, to fix the attention of the Senate to this proposition, that Congress, having by the constitution authority to dispose of the public territory, has passed laws for the complete exercise of that power; laws which not only have fixed the price of the public lands, the manner of sales, and the time of payment, but which have fixed also, with equal precision, the medium, or kinds of money, or of other things, which shall be received in payment. It has neglected no part of this important trust; it has delegated no part of it; it has left no ground, not an inch, for executive interposition.

The only question, therefore, is, what is the law, or what was the law, when the Secretary issued his order?

The Secretary considers that that which has been uniformly done for twenty years, that is to say, the receiving of payment for the public lands in the bills of specie-paying banks, is against law. He calls it an "indulgence," and this "indulgence" the order proposes to continue for a limited time, and in favor of a particular class of purchasers. If this were an indulgence, and against law, one might well ask, how has it happened that it should have continued so long, especially through recent years, marked by such a spirit of thorough and searching reform? It might be asked, too, if this be illegal, and an indulgence only, why continue it longer, and especially why continue it as to some, and refuse to continue it as to others?

But, sir, it is time to turn to the statute, and to see what the legal provision is. On the 30th of April, 1816, a resolution passed both Houses of Congress. It was in the common form of a joint resolution, and was approved by the President; and no one doubts, I suppose, that, for the purpose intended by it, it was as authentic and valid as a law in any other form. It provides that, "from and after the 20th day of February next, [1817,] no duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable in specie on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States."

This joint resolution authoritatively fixed the rights of parties paying, and the duties of officers receiving. So far as respects the notes of the Bank of the United States, it was altered by a law of the last session; but, in all other particulars, it is, as I suppose, in full force at the present moment; and as it expressly authorizes the receipt of such bank notes as are payable and paid on demand, I cannot understand how the receipt of such notes is a matter of "indulgence." We may as well say that to be allowed to pay in Treasury notes, or in foreign coins, or, indeed, in our own gold and silver, is an indulgence, since the act places all on the same ground.

The honorable member from Missouri has, indeed, himself furnished a complete answer to the Secretary's idea; that is to say, he defends the order on grounds not only differing from, but totally inconsistent with, those assumed by the Secretary. He does not consider the receipt of bank notes hitherto, or up to the time of issuing the order, as an indulgence, but as a lawful right while it lasted. How he proves this right to be now terminated, and terminated by force of the order, I shall consider presently. I only say now, that his argument entirely deprives the Secretary of the only ground assigned by him for the Treasury order.

The Secretary directs the receivers "to receive in payment of the public lands nothing except what is directed by the existing laws, viz: gold and silver, and, in the proper cases, Virginia land scrip." Gold and silver, then, and, in the proper cases, Virginia land scrip, are, in the opinion of the Secretary, all that is directed to be received by the existing laws. The receipt of bank notes he considers, therefore, but an indulgence, a thing against law, to be tolerated a little longer, as to some cases, and then to be finally suppressed.

Apparently not at all satisfied with this view of the Secretary, of the ground upon which his own order must stand, the member from Missouri not only abandons it altogether, but sets up another, wholly inconsistent with it. He admits the legality of payment in such bank notes up to the date of the order itself, but insists that the Secretary of the Treasury had a right of selection, and a right of rejection also; and that, although the various modes of payment provided by the resolution of 1816 were all good and lawful, till the Secretary should make some of them otherwise, yet that, by virtue of his power of selection or rejection, he might at any time strike one or more of them out of the list. And this power of selection or rejection he thinks he finds in the resolution of 1816 itself.

I incline to think, sir, that the Secretary will be as little satisfied with the footing on which his friend, the honorable member from Missouri, thus places his order, as that friend is with the Secretary's own ground. For my part, I think them both just half right; that is to say, both, in my humble judgment, are just so far right as they distrust and disclaim the reasoning of each other. Let me state, sir, as I understand it, the honorable member's argument. It is that the law of 1816 gives the Secretary a selection; that it provides four different modes, or media, of payment; that the Secretary is to collect the revenue in one, or several, or all these four modes, or media, at his discretion; that all are in the disjunctive, as I think he expressed it; and that the resolution or law is not mandatory or conclusive in favor of any one. According to the honorable member, therefore, if the Secretary had chosen to say that our own eagles and our own dollars should no longer be receivable, whether for customs, taxes, or public lands, he had a clear right to say so, and to stop their reception.

Before a construction of so extraordinary a character be fixed on the law of 1816, something like the appearance of argument, I think, might be expected in its favor. But what is there upon which to found such an implied power in the Secretary of the Treasury? Is there a syllable in the whole law which countenances any such idea for a single moment? There clearly is not. The law was intended to provide, and does provide, in what sorts of money or other means of payment those who owe debts to the Government shall pay those debts.

It enumerates four kinds of money or other means of payment; and can any thing be plainer than that he who has to pay may have his choice out of all four? All being equally lawful, the choice is with the payer, and not with the receiver. This would seem to be too plain either to be argued or to be denied. Other laws of the United States have made both gold and silver coins a tender in the payment of private debts. Did any man ever imagine that in that case the choice between the coins to be tendered was to lie with the party receiving? No one could ever be guilty of such an absurdity. And unless there be something in the law of 1816 itself, which either expressly, or by reasonable inference, confers a similar power on the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to public payments, is there, in the nature of things, any difference between the cases? Now, there is nothing, either in the law of 1816, or any other law, which confers any such power on the Secretary of the Treasury, either directly or indirectly, or which suggests, or intimates, any ground upon which such power might be implied. Indeed, the statement of the argument seems to me enough to confute it. It makes the law of 1816 not a rule, but the dissolution of all rule; not a law, but the abrogation of all existing laws. According to the argument, the Secretary of the Treasury had authority, not only to refuse the receipt of the Treasury notes, which had been issued upon the faith of statutes expressly making them receivable for debts and duties, and notes of the Bank of the United States, which were also made receivable by the law creating the bank, but to refuse also foreign coins, and the coinage of our own mint; putting thus the legislation of Congress for five-and-twenty years at the unrestrained and absolute discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. It appears to me quite impossible that any gentleman, on reflection, can undertake to support such a construction.

But the gentleman relies on a supposed practice, to maintain his interpretation of the law. What practice? Has any Secretary ever refused to receive the notes of specie-paying banks, either at the custom-house or the land offices, for a single hour? Never. Has any Secretary presumed to strike foreign coin, or Treasury notes, or our own coin, out of the list of receivables? Such an idea certainly never entered into the head of any Secretary. The gentleman argues that the Treasury has made discriminations; but what discriminations? I suppose the whole truth to be simply this: that, admitting at all times the right of the party paying to pay in notes of specie-paying banks, the collectors and receivers have not been held bound to receive notes of distant banks of which they knew nothing, and could not judge, therefore, whether their notes came within the law. Those collectors and receivers were bound to receive the bills of specie-paying banks; but, as that duty arose from the fact that the notes tendered were the notes of specie-paying banks, that fact, if not notorious or already known to them, must be made known, with reasonable certainty, before the duty to receive them became imperative. I suppose there may have been Treasury orders, regulating the conduct of collectors and receivers in this particular. Any orders which went further than this would go beyond the law.

The honorable member quotes one of the by-laws of the late Bank of the United States; but what has that to do with the subject? Does the honorable member think that the by-laws of the late bank were laws to the people of the United States? The bank was under no obligation to receive any notes on deposit except its own. It might, therefore, make just such an arrangement with the Treasury as it saw fit, if it saw fit to make any. But neither the Treasury, nor the bank, nor both together, could do away with the written letter of an act of Congress; nor did either undertake so to do.

But, sir, what have been the gentleman's own opinions on this subject heretofore? Has he always been of opinion that the Secretary enjoyed this power of selection, as he now calls it, under the law of 1816? Has he heretofore looked upon the various provisions of that law only as so many moveable and shifting parts, to be thrown into gear and out of gear by the mere touch of the Secretary's hand? Certainly, sir, he has not thought so; certainly he has looked upon that law as fixed, definite, and beyond executive power, as clearly as other laws; as a statute, to be repealed or modified only by another statute. No longer ago than the 23d day of last April, the honorable member introduced a resolution into the Senate, in the following words:

"Resolved, That, from and after the — day of —, in the year 1836, nothing but gold and silver coin ought to be received in payment for public lands; and that the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to report a bill accordingly."

And now, sir, I ask why the honorable member moved here for a bill and a law, if the whole matter was, in his opinion, within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury?

The Senate did not adopt this resolution. A day or two after its introduction, and when some little discussion had been had upon it, a motion to lay it on the table prevailed, hardly opposed, I think, except by the gentleman's own vote. A few weeks after this disposition had been made of this resolution, the session came to a close, and, seven days after the close of the session, the Treasury order made its appearance.

But this is not all. There is higher authority than even that of the honorable member. Looking to the expiration of the charter of the Bank of the United States, the President, in his annual message in December last, said it was incumbent on Congress to discontinue, by law, the receipt of the bills of that bank in payment of the public revenue. Now, as the charter was to expire on the 3d of March, there was nothing to make its bills receivable after that period, except the law of 1816. To strike the provisions respecting notes of the bank out of that law, another law was indeed necessary, according to my understanding; but I do not conceive how it should be thought necessary, upon the construction of the honorable member. Both Houses being of opinion, however, that the thing could not be done without law, an act was passed for that purpose, and was approved by the President. Here, then, sir, is the gentleman's own authority, the authority of the President, and the authority of both Houses of Congress, for saying that nothing contained in the law of 1816 can be thrust out of it by any other power than the power of a subsequent statute.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the Treasury order of the 11th of July is against the plain words and meaning of the law of 1816; against the whole practice of the Government under that law; against the honorable gentleman's own opinion, as expressed in his resolution of the 23d of April; and not reconcilable with the necessity which was supposed to exist for the passage of the act of last session.

On this occasion, I have heard of no attempt to justify the order on the ground of any other law or act but the act of 1816. When the order was published, however, it was accompanied with an exposition, apparently half-official, which looked to the land laws as the Secretary's source of power, and which took no notice at all of the law of 1816. The land law referred to was the act of 1820; but it turns out, upon examination, that there is nothing at all in that law to support the order, or give it any countenance whatever. The only clause in it which could be supposed to have the slightest reference to the subject is in the proviso in the 4th section. That section provides for the sale of such lands as, having been once sold on credit, should revert or become forfeited to the United States through failure of payment; and the proviso declares that no such lands shall be again sold on any other terms than those of "cash payment." These words, "cash payment," have been seized upon, as if they had wrought an entire change in the important provisions of the law of 1816, and already established an exclusive specie payment for lands. The idea is too futile for serious refutation. In the first place, the whole section applies only to forfeited lands; but the truth is, the term "cash payment" means only payment down, in contradistinction to credit, which had formerly been allowed; just as the words in the tariff act of July, 1832, mean payment down, instead of payment secured by bonds, when it says that the duties on certain articles shall be paid in "cash."

As to the second section of the land law of 1820, which was set forth with great formality in the exposition to which I have referred, as furnishing authority for the Secretary's order, there is not a word in it having any such tendency; not a syllable which has any application to the matter. That section simply declares that, after the first day of July in that year, every purchaser of land at public sale shall, on the day of purchase, make a complete payment therefor; and the purchaser at private sale shall produce a receipt for the amount of the purchase-money on any tract, before he shall enter the same at the land office. This is all. It does not say how the purchaser shall make complete payment, nor in what currency the purchase-money shall be received. It is quite evident, therefore, that that section lends the order no support whatever.

The defence of the order, then, stands thus: The Secretary founds it upon the idea that nothing but gold and silver was ever lawfully receivable, and that the receipt of bank bills has been all along an "indulgence" against law. For this opinion he gives no reasons.

The honorable member from Missouri rejects this doctrine; he admits the receipt of bank notes to have been lawful until made unlawful by the order itself; and insists that the Secretary's power of stopping their further receipt arises under the law of 1816, and is an authority derived from it. But, then, the long and half-official exposition which accompanied the publication of the order has no faith in the law of 1816 as a source of power, but makes a parade of a totally and perfectly inapplicable section, out of the land law of 1820. Grounds of defence so totally inconsistent cannot all be sound, but they may be all unsound; and whether they be so or not, is a question which I would willingly leave to the decision of any man of good sense and honest judgment. I take leave of this part of the case for the present. I may pause at least, I hope, until those who defend the order shall be better agreed on what ground to place it.

Mr. President, the subject of the currency is so important, so delicate, and, in my judgment, surrounded, at the present moment, with so much both of difficulty and of danger, that I am desirous, before making the few observations which I intend on the existing condition of things and its causes, to avoid all misapprehension, by a general statement of my opinions respecting that subject.

I am certainly of opinion, then, that gold and silver, at rates fixed by Congress, constitute the legal standard of value in this country; and that neither Congress nor any State has authority to establish any other standard, or to displace this. But I am also of opinion that an exclusive circulation of gold and silver is a thing absolutely impracticable; and, if practicable, not at all to be desired; inasmuch as its effect would be to abolish credit, to repress the enterprise, and diminish the earnings of the industrious classes; and to produce, faster and sooner than any thing else in this country can produce, a moneyed aristocracy.

I am of opinion that a mixed currency, partly coin and partly bank notes, the notes not issued in excess, and always convertible into specie at the will of the holder, is, in the present state of society, the best practical currency—always remembering, however, that bills of exchange perform a great part of the duty of currency, and, therefore, that the state of domestic exchanges is always a matter of high importance and great actual bearing on commercial business.

I admit that a currency partly composed of bank notes has always a liability, and often a tendency, to excess; and that it requires the constant care and oversight of Government.

I am of opinion, even, that the convertibility of bank notes into gold and silver, although it be a necessary guard, is not an absolute security against occasional excess of paper issues.

I believe, even, that the confining of discounts to such notes and bills as represent real transactions of purchase and sale, or to real business paper, as it is called, though generally a sufficient check, is not always so; because I believe there is sometimes such a thing as over-trading or over-production.

What, then, it will be asked, is a sufficient check? I can only repeat what I have before said, that it is a subject which requires the constant care, watchfulness, and superintendence of Government. But our misfortune is, that we have withdrawn all care and all superintendence from the whole subject. We have surrendered the whole matter to eight-and-twenty States and Territories. With the power of coinage and the power and duty of regulating commerce, both external and internal, this Government has little more control over the mass of money which circulates in the country, than a foreign Government. Upon the expiration of the charter of the Bank of the United States, new banks were created by the States. Sixty or eighty millions of banking capital have thus been added to the mass since 1832. All this it was easy to foresee: it was all foreseen, and all foretold. The wonder only is, that the evil has not already become greater than it is; and it would have been greater, and we should have had such an excess as would perhaps have depreciated the currency, had it not been for the extraordinary prosperity of the country. No very great excess, I believe, has as yet in fact happened, or rather no very great excess does now exist. There are sufficient evidences, I think, of this.

In the first place, the amount of specie in the country is far greater than was ever known before, and it is not exported. In the next place, as all the banks as yet maintain their credit, and all pay specie on demand, the whole circulation is, in effect, equivalent to a specie circulation; and the state of the foreign exchanges shows that the value of our money, in the mass, is not depreciated, since it may be transferred without any loss into the currency of other countries. Our money, therefore, is as good as the money of other countries. If it had fallen below the value of money abroad, the rates of exchange would instantly show that fact. There has been, therefore, as yet, or at least there exists at present, no considerable depreciation of money. If, then, it be asked, what keeps up the value of money in this vast and sudden expansion and increase of it, I have already given the answer which appears to me to be the true one. It is kept up by an equally vast and sudden increase in the property of the country, and in the value of that property, intrinsic as well as marketable. None of us, I think, have estimated this increase high enough, and for that reason we have all been looking for an earlier fall in prices. It seems obvious to me that an augmentation in the value of property, far exceeding all former experience in any country, even our own, has taken place in the United States within the last few years. The public lands may furnish one instance of this rapid increase. It was estimated last session, by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] that the demands of actual settlers for land for settlement were eight millions of acres per annum, on an average of some years. These eight millions, if taken up at the Government prices at private entry, would cost $10,000,000. Now, partly by cultivation, but more by the continued rush of emigration, both from Europe and the Atlantic coast, the value of these ten millions in a very few years springs up to forty millions; that is to say, lands taken up at one dollar and a quarter an acre, soon become worth five dollars an acre for actual cultivation, and in intrinsic value. And it is to be remembered that these lands are alienable and saleable, with as little of form and ceremony, almost, as if they were goods and chattels. Now, if we make an estimate, not merely on the eight millions of acres required for actual settlement, but on the whole quantity selected and taken up annually, we shall see something of the addition to the whole amount of property which accrues annually from the public lands. A rise has taken place, too, though less striking, in the value of other lands in the country; and property, in goods, merchandise, products, and other forms, is rapidly augmented, also, both in quantity and value, by the industry and skill of the people, and the extension and most successful use of machinery.

Another most important element in the general estimate of the progress of wealth in the country, is the wonderful annual increase of the cotton crops, and the prices which the article bears. Last year's crop reached, probably, to eighty millions of dollars. Now, most of the cotton produced in the United States is sold, once, at least, in the country, and much of it many times. The bills drawn against it when shipped, either for Europe or the Atlantic ports, are usually cashed at the place of drawing, commonly, no doubt, by means of bank notes or bank credits.

I put all these cases but as instances showing the increased value of property and amount of business in the country, and accounting, therefore, for an expansion of the circulation, without supposing great excess; since it is obvious that the circulating money of a country naturally bears a proportion to the whole mass of property, and to the number and amount of business transactions.

But there is another cause of a less favorable character, which may have had its effect already; or if not, is very likely to have it hereafter, in augmenting the circulation of bank notes: I mean the obstruction and embarrassment of the domestic exchanges. In a proper and natural state of affairs, the place of currency, or money, is filled to a great extent by bills of exchange; and this continues to be the case, so long as the rates of exchange remain low and steady. Nobody, for example, will send bank notes or specie from New York to New Orleans, if he can buy a good bill at par, or near par.

But when exchange becomes disturbed, when rates rise and fluctuate, bills cease to be able to perform this function, and then bank notes begin to be sent about from place to place, in quantities to supply the place of bills of exchange, in payment of debts and balances. All such, and all other derangements and distractions in the free course of domestic exchanges, necessarily produce an unnatural and considerable increase of the circulation. So far as our circulation has been or may be augmented by this cause, so far both the cause and the effect are to be deplored. In my opinion, we have certainly reason to fear this excess hereafter. What is to prevent it? Is it possible that so many State banks, so far apart, so unknown to each other, with no common objects, no common principles of discount, and no general regulation whatever, should act so much in concert, and upon system, as to maintain the currency of the country steady, without either unjust expansion or unnecessary contraction? I believe it is not possible. I believe many of those who insist so much on hard-money circulation believe this also; and that they press their impracticable hard-money notions, from a consciousness that the discontinuance of a national institution has brought the country into a condition in which it is threatened with issues of irredeemable paper.

Our present evil, however, is of a different kind. It is, indeed, somewhat novel and anomalous. With high general prosperity, good crops, generally speaking, an abundance of the precious metals, and a favorable state of foreign exchanges, men of business have yet felt for some months an unprecedented scarcity of money. That is the state of things; its cause, in my opinion, is expressed in a few words: it is the derangement of internal intercourse and internal exchange. Our difficulty is not exhaustion, but obstruction. Every body has means enough, but nobody can use his means. All the usual channels of commercial dealing are blocked up. The manufacturers of the North cannot obtain from the South the proceeds of the sales of their articles; the South finds money scarce, too, in the midst of its abundant exports.

In a country so extensive and so busy, every merchant's means become more or less dispersed, and exist in various places in the shape of debts. Exchange is the instrument, the wand, by which he reaches forth to these means, wherever they are, and uses them for his immediate and daily purposes. But this instrument is now broken. He can no longer touch with it his distant debt, and make that debt present money. He seeks, therefore, for expedients; borrows money, if he can, till times change; pays enormous rates of interest to maintain credit; thinks things, when at the worst, must soon change; looks for reaction, and sacrifices to capitalists, to brokers, and money-lenders, the hard earnings of years, rather than fail to fulfil his commercial engagements. It is a happy and blessed hour, this, for greedy capital and grasping brokerage; an excruciating one for honest industry. The very rich grow every day richer; the laborious and industrious, every day poorer. Meantime, the highways of commercial dealing and exchanges grow more and more dangerous, or are all breaking up. Specie, always most useful as the basis of a circulation, when most in repose, gets upon the move. Any time the last four months it might have happened, and many times doubtless it has happened, that steamboats from New York, carrying specie to Boston, have passed in the Sound steamboats from Boston carrying specie to New York. Boating and carting money, backward and forward, becomes the order of the day; and there are those who, the more they hear of specie hauled and transported about from place to place, in masses, the more they flatter themselves with the idea that the country is returning rapidly to a safe and happy specie circulation!

There may be other minor causes. They are not worth enumerating. The great and immediate origin of evil is disturbance in the exchange; and, in my opinion this disturbance has been caused by the agency of the Government itself. The fifty millions in the Treasury have been agitated by unnecessary transfers. As a large portion of this sum was to be deposited with the States at the beginning of next year, the Secretary seems to have thought it necessary to cut up, divide, and remove assigned portions of it before the time came. It is this idea of removal that has wrought the mischief. In consequence of this, money has been taken from places of active commercial business, where it was much needed, and all used, and carried to places where it was not needed, and could not be used.

The agricultural State of Indiana, for example, is full of specie; the highly commercial and manufacturing State of Massachusetts is severely drained. In the mean time, the money in Indiana cannot be used. It is waiting for the new year. The moment the Treasury grasp is let loose from it, it will tend again to the great marts of business; that is to say, the restoration of the natural state of things will begin to correct the evil of arbitrary and artificial financial arrangements. The money will go back to the places where it is wanted. It will seek its level, and its place of usefulness. In my opinion, the proper execution of the deposit law did not make it at all necessary for the Treasury to order these previous local changes. The law itself is not answerable for the inconvenience which has resulted. When the time came, the States, all of them, would have been very glad to receive the money where it was. They wanted but an order for it. They desired no carting. Can any thing be more preposterous than to transfer specie from New York to Nashville, when to a man in Nashville specie in New York is two per cent. more valuable than if he had it in his own house? There is always a tendency in specie, not actually in the pockets of the people, towards the great marts and places of exchange. Those who want it, want it there. There the great transactions of commerce are performed, and there the means of those transactions naturally exist, simply because there they are required. Now, what reason was there for disturbing the revenue, thus lying where it had been collected, and thus mingled with the commerce of the country? Why laboriously drag it off, far from its place of useful action, to places where it was not wanted, and could do no good, and there hold it under the key of the Treasury?

This anticipation of the operation of the deposit law, this attempt at local distribution, this arbitrary system of transfer, which seems to forget, at once, the necessities of commerce, and the real uses of money, I regard as the direct and prime cause of the pressure felt by the community. But the Treasury order came powerfully in aid of this. This order checked the use of bank notes in the West, and made another loud call for specie. The specie, therefore, is transferred to the West, to pay for lands; being received for lands, it becomes public revenue, is brought to the East for expenditure, and passes, on its way, other quantities going West, to buy lands also, and in the same way to return again to the East. Now, sir, how does all this improve the currency? What fraud does it prevent? what speculation does it arrest? what monopoly does it suppress? I am very much mistaken if all this does not embarrass the small purchaser of land much more than the large one. He who has fifty or a hundred thousand dollars to lay out, may collect his specie, not without some charge, it is true, but without a very heavy charge. But if there be a man, with a hundred or two dollars, waiting to take up a small parcel for actual settlement, and his money be in bank notes, and the bank, perhaps, at a great distance, what has he to do? He must send far to exchange a little money; or else he must submit to any brokerage which he may find established in the neighborhood of the land office. Upon the local operation of this order, however, I say the less, as on that point Western gentlemen are better informed and better judges.

I am willing to hope, sir, and, indeed, I do hope and believe, that when the first payment or deposit under the act of last session shall have been made, and the States shall have found some use and employment for the money, and when this unnatural transfer system shall cease, money will seek its natural channels, and commercial business resume, in some measure, its accustomed habits. But this Treasury order will be a disturbing agent, every hour it is suffered to exist. Indeed, it cannot be allowed to exist long. It is not possible that the West can submit to a measure at once so injurious and so partial. Hard money at the land office, and bank notes at the custom-house, must make men open their eyes after a while, whatever degree of political confidence weighs down their lids. I look upon it, therefore, as certain, that the order will not be permitted long to remain in force.

If I am now asked, sir, whether, supposing this order to be rescinded, and the deposit law executed, and the transfers discontinued, affairs will return to their former state, I answer, with all candor, that though I look, in those events, for a great improvement, I do not expect to see the domestic exchanges and the currency return entirely to their former state. I do not believe there is any agency at work, at present, competent to bring about this desirable end. In other words, I do not believe that the deposit banks, however well administered, can fully supply the place of a national institution; and I am very much mistaken if intelligent men connected with those institutions themselves believe any such thing. I find that, in 1828, 1829, 1830, 1831, and 1832, exchange at New York, on the Southern and Southwestern cities, averaged three fourths of one per cent. discount, or thereabouts. Now, I doubt whether the most sanguine of those connected with the deposit banks expect to be able, through their means, to bring back exchanges to that state, or any thing like it.

The deposit banks are separate and distinct institutions, many of them strangers to each other, without full confidence in each other, and all acting without uniformity of purpose. Their objects are distinct, their capitals distinct, their interests distinct. If one of them has connexion with some others, it yet has no unbroken chain of connexion. They have nothing which runs through the whole circle of the exchanges, as that circle is drawn through the great commercial cities of the Union. They can only act in the business of exchange to the extent of funds, or not much beyond it, actually existing. A national institution, with branches or agencies at different points, may deal in exchanges between these points in amounts to meet the convenience of the public, without reference to the fact of the existence of local funds. One institution, therefore, with branches, has facilities which never can be possessed by different institutions, however honorably or ably conducted.

For myself, I am of the same opinion as formerly, that for the administration of the finances of the country, for the facility of internal exchanges, and for the due control and regulation of the actual currency, a national institution, under proper guards and limits, is by far the best means within our reach. And I am, as I always have been, of opinion, that Congress, having the power of regulating commerce, and the power over the coinage, has power, also, which it is bound to exercise, by lawful means, over that currency in which the revenue is to be collected, and which is to carry on that commerce, external and internal, which is thus committed to its regulation and protection. All the duties of this Government are, in my judgment, not fulfilled, while it leaves these great interests, thus confided to its own care, to the discretion of others, or to the results of chance. But I will not go further into these subjects at the present time.

Mr. President, I am indifferent to the form in which the Treasury order may be done away. Gentlemen may please themselves in the mode. I shall be satisfied with the substance. Believing it to be both illegal and injurious, I shall vote to rescind, to revoke, to abolish, to supersede, to do any thing which may have the effect of terminating its existence.

Before Mr. WEBSTER concluded his speech, as given entire above,

[Mr. BENTON laid the following on the table, in the way of notice: Motion (to be made hereafter) to invest the committee to which the resolution (of Mr. EWING) shall be sent, with authority to inquire into the effect and operation of the Treasury order of July 11th, upon the business of the country, and the banking institutions of the States, and into the conduct of banks in relation to that order, and into their attempts (if any) to withdraw specie from circulation, and to embarrass the exchanges and business of the country. The committee to summon witnesses before them, if any such are near at hand, and to conduct their inquiries at a distance by interrogatories.]

The Senate then adjourned.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. EWING's resolution to rescind the Treasury order of July 11th, 1836, and to prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from delegating his power to specify what kind of funds shall be received in payment for the public lands.

Mr. WEBSTER concluded his remarks, as given entire above. When Mr. WEBSTER had concluded his speech,

Mr. NILES rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I had intended to submit some remarks on the resolution before the Senate, and may as well do it at this time as any other. In the course of the debate there have been several topics drawn into consideration, not necessarily embraced in the question to be decided, yet somewhat connected with the general subject. Some of these I shall have occasion to allude to as I proceed; but will here notice one preliminary observation of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] That Senator took occasion to say that the vote on this resolution would form a test question; that those who vote against the resolution will be understood as being favorable to the ultra, and, as he regarded them, extreme opinions of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] regarding the currency and the public revenue, and observed that it might be fortunate the public is to be thus early apprized of what is to be the policy of the majority, and of the coming administration, on those important subjects. He had heard the remark with some surprise, not thinking it called for or justified by the occasion. Without stopping to inquire what are the opinions of the Senator from Missouri, or what they are considered to be by the gentleman from Massachusetts, he must be permitted to say that no such conclusions could justly follow the decision of the question before the Senate.

There were reasons, he thought weighty reasons, which would justify Senators in voting against this resolution, without committing themselves in any sense, or in any degree, in regard to the great questions of currency and revenue, to which the Senator had referred. Without reference to what might be his opinion as to the true policy of the Government in the collection of the revenue, whether from the public lands or the customs, he was prepared to vote against this resolution. To pass this resolution, would be to censure and condemn an act of the Executive as being wrong, ab initio, or at the time of its adoption. Whether the rule prescribed in the Treasury order be a wise and just one, for the settled action of the Government, is a question entirely distinct from that, whether it may have been expedient and proper at the time it was adopted. He was satisfied that the Treasury order could be justified, viewed as a temporary measure only, intended to remedy evils of great magnitude, arising from the extraordinary circumstances connected with the sales of the public lands; and he was not sure that this was not the true light in which it ought to be considered. It was the duty of the Executive to watch over the public revenue, and see that it was secure. Was there no hazard from the extensive and gambling speculations in the public lands paid for only in bank bills, which were handed over by the receivers to the deposite banks and placed to the credit of the United States? A large portion of the purchases were paid for in bills of the deposite banks, which, after going into the hands of the receivers, were returned and loaned out again, to go through the same operation. This was virtually reviving the old credit system, as the United States received nothing but credit for the lands. If there was no hazard to the revenue from these practices, and from the magnitude and extent of the sales made upon this kind of credit, then gentlemen over the way had altered their opinions very much within the last six months. During the last session of Congress, we were repeatedly, and almost daily, told by those who now oppose the Treasury order, that the funds of the Government in the Western deposite banks were insecure, and that nothing but credit was received for the public lands. Can gentlemen have forgotten their often-repeated declarations on this subject? If so, they must be blessed with short memories. Again and again did Senators refer to the small amount of specie in those banks, and an impression was attempted to be made, that their specie funds were the only solid security for the large sums due the United States.

The order was calculated to correct, and, to a considerable extent, no doubt, has corrected, this evil. It insured something valuable for the lands, and that something valuable was transferred to the deposite banks, and formed a more solid basis for the Government credits.

The order was also calculated to check speculation in the public lands, which, in itself, was an evil of no small magnitude, transferring the best part of the national domain into the hands of heartless speculators, to the great injury of actual settlers, and the detriment of the whole country. Public opinion was rising up against it, and required that something should be done to arrest an evil of so extensive and serious a nature. What other or better measure could have been adopted, until Congress should convene, which might adopt such further legislation in regard to the sales of the lands as the public interests may require?

Sir, (said Mr. N.,) there is another reason why I cannot vote for the resolution before the Senate. A new rule has been adopted in regard to the sale of the public lands, that has been in operation for a time, and which has a tendency to check speculation. I would not repeal that rule, and open again the floodgates of speculation; certainly not until I know whether Congress will pass any act regulating the sale of the public lands. It is, I think, the duty of Congress to do this; the interest of the country requires it; public sentiment demands it; and it is strongly recommended by the President. If Congress suffer the session to pass off, without attempting to regulate the sale of the public lands so as to check speculation, they will neglect their duty to the country. Believing that there will be additional legislation on the subject, which may supersede the Treasury order, he was not at this time prepared to disturb it. Changes in any extensive business are always attended with some inconvenience, and should be avoided as much as possible. When it shall be settled that Congress will not alter the system, it may become necessary to decide whether the rule prescribed in the order shall be maintained, or the old practice restored; and if we do any thing on this subject, our action should be more comprehensive; it should embrace the whole subject, and be settled by law what currency shall be received for the payment of the revenues, not only from the lands, but from customs and all other dues. The doubt and uncertainty which hangs over this subject ought to be removed.

For these reasons, therefore, he should vote against rescinding the Treasury order, even if he was satisfied that the rule it prescribes was not one which it would be expedient and just to establish as a settled policy.

In this view of the subject, he had thrown out of the case the legal objection which has been raised against the Treasury order.

Mr. President, there are two general grounds of objection that have been urged against the order which the resolution on your table proposes to rescind, which I will proceed to consider. The first objection is, that it is illegal; the second, that its operation is partial, unjust, and injurious to the country, and has been the principal cause of the embarrassments and pressure for money which have been so extensively experienced.

It has also been claimed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Ewing,] that the order is unconstitutional, that it conflicts with that provision of the constitution which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the rights and immunities of the citizens of the several States." This, however, is a very small point, so small that the Senator seemed to find it difficult to stand upon it; it was quite too small for him to waste the time of the Senate about, and he should therefore pass it over.

Is the Treasury order contrary to law? If it is, it ought to be rescinded, without regard to other considerations.

Congress is empowered to lay taxes, and to authorize and regulate the sale of the public lands; and, in doing this, it can no doubt direct the kind of money or currency which shall be received in payment. But if it neglect to do this, it becomes the duty of the Executive, who is charged with executing the law, to receive payment for taxes and lands in the legal currency of the United States. What that legal currency is, there can be no dispute, so that the only question which can arise is, whether there is any law which authorizes the payment of the revenue and debts due the United States, in any other currency, or in any other way. It is claimed that the joint resolution of 1816 requires the Secretary of the Treasury to collect the taxes and debts due the United States in a currency different from the legal currency of the country. That resolution provides "that the Secretary of the Treasury be required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the twentieth day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States."

Treasury Circular.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in a labored legal argument, has attempted to prove that this resolution creates a peculiar currency in regard to all branches of the public revenue, and all debts due the United States. He not only maintains that the resolution imposes an obligation on the Secretary to receive the notes of all banks that redeem their bills in specie at their counters, but also that it enlarges the rights of payers, that it confers on the debtors of the United States the legal right to pay their debts in paper currency; that is, in the notes of specie-paying banks. He went so far as to assert, and stake his reputation as a lawyer on the question, that a receiver, who should refuse to receive the notes of specie-paying banks, and which were known to him to be such, would render himself liable to an action by the party injured. He admits that the fact that the notes are issued by banks which pay their bills in specie, must be made known to the receiver; so that, upon this construction of the resolution, the receivability of paper is to depend on a fact, and that fact is to be decided by a subordinate officer of the Government. The argument of the gentleman, however, was too elaborate, too refined, to receive his assent. He had never believed that profound legal science was very necessary in construing a plain statute law; nor did he believe that men of eminent professional skill were always the safest expounders of written laws, whether statutes or constitutional provisions. Cicero said, in his day, that the lawyers had spoiled many excellent institutions by their refinements; and we all know that, in our own times, by their forced and strained constructions, they have mystified and perverted many plain and good laws, and bewildered the clearest minds. Whether we look to the language or the manifest object and purpose of the resolution of 1816, he thought there could be no difficulty in understanding it. We are told by legal writers, that, in giving a construction to statutes, it is necessary to ascertain the general object of the law, the evils and mischiefs that existed, and which the act was designed to remove; and more especially is this said to be necessary when the language of an act is doubtful or ambiguous.

What was the object of the resolution of 1816, and what were the evils it was intended to remedy? It is said that its object was to enlarge the rights of the debtors of the United States, and to enable them to pay their debts in a more convenient and easy manner. But does this appear on the face of the resolution? Is it inferrible from its title? And if we look to the state of the Treasury and the condition of the revenue at the time the resolution was adopted, we cannot fail to discover the evils which this resolution was intended to remedy. Instead of its object being to enlarge the rights of the debtors of the Government, it was designed to restrict them, and did restrict them. What was the condition of your Treasury at that period, and how was the revenue collected? There was then in the Treasury more than one million of dollars in the bills of broken banks; and the public revenue had been collected in the notes of banks which did not redeem them in specie; a large portion of the banks in the Union, which had suspended specie payments during the war, had not resumed them. This resolution expressly limited the Secretary so far as not to permit him to receive any bills of banks which did not redeem them with specie. He is expressly prohibited from receiving the notes of non-specie-paying banks; and it was left optional with him to collect the public revenue either in the lawful currency of the United States, or in Treasury notes, or in the notes of specie-paying banks. So far, a discretion was still left with the Secretary; but the discretion he had exercised of taking bills of banks which did not pay their notes in specie, was taken from him. These bills were received by the Bank of the United States only as special deposits, and the loss was thrown upon the Treasury.

This resolution was only an instruction to the Secretary of the Treasury; it has neither the form nor the language of a public act. The title shows clearly that the object of Congress was solely to secure the Treasury, and guard it against a loss from bad money. It is entitled "A resolution relative to the more effectual collection of the public revenue." Can a mere instruction to the Secretary of the Treasury, as the fiscal agent of the Government, change the rights or obligations of the debtors of the United States? Suppose a creditor should instruct his agent to receive payment for a debt in some other than the legal currency, or to take less than the sum due, or to receive payment in some kind of property, would this confer on the debtor the legal right to pay his debt, and discharge his liability, in either of the ways specified? On a suit by the creditor, could he avail himself of such instructions to vary the nature of his liability?

The construction here contended for had always been given to the resolution of 1816; and the Senator from Massachusetts had, on former occasions, regarded it in the same light, as had been shown by the extracts read from his speech and report by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Benton.] It was a very extraordinary position attempted to be maintained, that for twenty years there had been a public law in force in the United States, conferring on paper money, or bank bills, the legal character of gold and silver, so far as regards the payment of the revenue and all debts due the United States, and that the country has been unapprized of the existence of such law. An act to legalize paper money, and make it a lawful tender for all debts to the United States, is one of great importance, and would have been likely to have excited general interest and attention.

The sixteenth section of the act chartering the Bank of the United States provides that the deposits of the moneys of the United States shall be made in that bank and its branches. But the bank had refused to receive the bills of certain banks, notwithstanding they were redeemed in specie, and had been justified by Congress in so doing, in a report to that effect, drawn up by the Senator himself. But if the resolution of 1816 gave to the bills of State banks all the character of gold and silver, so far as regards dues to the Government, then such bills were the "money of the United States," and the bank was bound by its charter to receive them on deposit.

The Senator from Massachusetts referred to the fact, that the President last session sent a message to Congress, recommending the repeal of the fourteenth section of the charter of the Bank of the United States, which required that the notes of that bank should be received in all payments to the United States. He could not perceive what inference could be drawn from this fact, favorable to the gentleman's purpose; but it appeared to him that the necessary inference was directly the contrary. The bills of the Bank of the United States were made receivable by the Government, by a distinct provision in its charter; and the President wished that section repealed, which would place them on the same footing as other bank bills. But if the Senator is correct in his argument, it would have been of no use to repeal the fourteenth section of the bank charter, as the United States would still have been obliged to receive the bills of that bank, under the resolution of 1816. Moreover, the fourteenth section was never of any importance to the Bank of the United States, if, as is contended, the resolution of 1816 gave to the bills of all specie-paying banks the character of receivability for debts payable to the United States. The bills of the State banks, so far as regarded the Government, stood on the same footing as those of the Bank of the United States; although it has always been claimed that the privilege conferred by the fourteenth section formed a part of the consideration for which the corporation had paid a bonus of a million and a half of dollars.

Mr. President, if there is any doubt in regard to the legal import and effect of the resolution of 1816, still there can be no question as to the kind of currency which is receivable for the sales of the public lands. The fourth section of the act of 1820, which superseded the credit system, and required that sales should be made for cash payments, settles that question. The proviso to the fourth section is, "that no such lands shall be sold at any public sale hereby authorized, for a less price than one dollar and twenty-five cents, nor on any other terms than cash payments." This section, it is true, is confined to lands forfeited to the United States; but its spirit and language are in perfect accordance with the other sections of the act. The clause "cash payments," must be understood in its ordinary acceptance, in which sense it does not mean Treasury notes, nor the notes of banks, but money, which is a legal tender by the laws of the United States. In the ordinary acceptance, "cash" signifies money, or that currency which is a lawful tender for debts. Any other construction would be to trifle with language, and an insult to common sense.

Mr. N. said that, without consuming more time on that point, he was satisfied that the objection to the Treasury order, on the ground of its illegality, was entirely unfounded.

Mr. N. said he would now proceed to submit a few remarks on the other division of the subject. Has the Treasury order operated unjustly and injuriously to the interest of the country? Has it caused the embarrassments and pressure for money which have prevailed so extensively and disastrously throughout the country, and particularly in the large commercial cities? All these evils have been charged upon it, as the results of the derangement it has occasioned in the business and monetary concerns of the country. In regard to the discrimination or exception from its operation in behalf of actual settlers, and the citizens of the States in which the lands were sold, as that exception had now ceased, he would not spend any time upon it.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] asked, with an air of triumph, what had been the good effects of the order? Whilst its evils have been so manifest, and of such great magnitude, we have a right, said he, to call on its advocates to point out its benefits. Mr. N. said that, in his preliminary remarks, he referred to what appeared to have been some of the beneficial effects of the order, and he would not repeat them. They were such, too, he believed, as were contemplated by the Executive at the time the order was adopted. But as those who supported the resolution before the Senate took the affirmative of the issue, he might, perhaps, with more propriety, call on them to point out the evil consequences of the order. This they have attempted to do, but he thought with no very great success. It has been boldly asserted, that the Treasury order had deranged the currency, and occasioned the existing difficulties and pressure in regard to money, which he admitted to be very severe. This, sir, (said Mr. N.) is no new complaint against the present administration. It is the old story, which has been so often repeated within the last few years, that its authors on the present occasion can lay no claims to originality. On his way to this city, during a short detention in New York, he had a conversation with a merchant, who complained not only of the times, but of the Government. It was, however, only a repetition of the old story, of tampering with the currency!—war upon the currency! When will the Government cease tampering with the currency? These complaints come with an ill grace from bankers, brokers, and merchants, who are strenuous supporters of that inflated system of paper money and credit, whose inherent defects are the source of the very evils which they denounce. Mr. N. said that when he heard complaints like these, he was forcibly reminded of an anecdote of Doctor Franklin, who, when in Europe, was a member of a learned society, which had a regulation, that on certain occasions each member was to suggest some problem in physical science, and each one present was to give an explanation impromptu. The Doctor, who was fond of starting game for philosophers, as he called it, proposed this question: "How it was to be accounted for, that a barrel of fish would contain more salt than the barrel without the fish?" The explanations given by learned savans, although extremely ingenious, did not appear to be entirely satisfactory. At last all eyes were turned towards the Doctor, who, it was supposed, could give a satisfactory solution of a problem he had suggested. "Gentlemen," said he, "in the first place, the fact is not so." So in regard to the complaints of merchants and politicians, so often repeated, of tampering with the currency, it is a sufficient answer to say, the fact is not so. These charges are without foundation, even if we consider currency in the very comprehensive sense in which it appears to be regarded by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who, if he correctly understood him, appears to consider currency as comprehending not only bank bills, but bills of exchange, and every description of paper which was used to facilitate the transactions of commerce. This appeared to him to be altogether too comprehensive a view of the subject of currency, even in a commercial sense. It appeared to be confounding currency and credit, which he had supposed were essentially distinct. In the small book which every Senator has on his table, (containing the constitution of the United States,) is a much better definition; he there found, that "Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." Here we find what is the legal and constitutional currency of the United States. Gold and silver, either the coinage of the United States or foreign coin, the value of which has been fixed and regulated by a law of Congress, constitute the only currency known to the constitution.

But, in a commercial sense, or in the common acceptance, whatever circulates as money, and is received as such, in the ordinary transactions of society, may be considered as a part of the currency of the country; and in this view of the subject, bank bills form a part of our currency. But if we admit the bills of our banks to be a component part of the currency of the country, still the complaints, of which we have heard so much for some years past, are without any just foundation. What are the acts of this administration, which have been denounced as tampering with the currency, and making war on the currency? The first of them is the veto of the President of the bill for rechartering the Bank of the United States. This may have been a bold measure, but great evils require powerful remedies; and it was confirmed and fully sustained by the people, and afterwards by Congress, which refused to give the bank another charter. If this measure had succeeded in destroying the Bank of the United States, it might be considered, in some measure, as interfering with the currency of the country, if it can be made out that the bills of that bank possessed any essential qualities as money, or currency, which do not appertain to the bills of the State banks. But he did not consider that the bills of that bank possessed any material advantages, as money, over those of the State banks; for such were its regulations, that the different branches, so far as respects the redemption of their bills, were so many independent banks. It was not necessary, however, to consider this question, because the bank had not ceased to exist. No, unfortunately for the country, the "monster" still lives; and, according to the declarations of its president, at the very time of its resuscitation, under a charter obtained from one of the States, it inherits a circulation of twenty-two millions, and a credit throughout the world. We have the word of its president that the bank still possesses its essential ability to do good, and, in the opinion of many, it has lost none of its powers of mischief. Whether for good or for evil, then, the bank still exists, and the country has the benefit, if such it is, of that paper currency which it can supply.

The next act which has been condemned as an act of war upon the currency, is the Treasury order for removing the public deposits in 1833. This, as is well known, occasioned great excitement; the measure was denounced; in this hall and elsewhere, as illegal, unconstitutional, and an alarming usurpation, calculated to derange the currency, destroy public and private credit, and prostrate the entire business of the country. Now the excitement has gone by, and the angry waves subsided, and the measure already become, in some sense, a matter of history, we can look back upon it dispassionately and calmly. And what was this alarming act of usurpation, this war upon the currency and credit of the country, which was to paralyze all the great interests of the nation? He did not speak with any reference to its legality or constitutionality, but solely with regard to its effect on the currency and credit. Why, sir, (said Mr. N.,) this measure consisted simply of an order from the Secretary of the Treasury changing the place of deposit of the public revenue, at a time when the money in the Treasury amounted to but about nine millions of dollars. The measure related only to the money of the United States; it had no application whatever to the currency of the country, whether metallic or paper; it had no operation upon commerce, or duties, or importations. This act, which was said to derange the currency and destroy credit, was nothing more than the control and management of the funds belonging to the people of the United States, in no way interfering with the transactions of commerce, or currency, or credit. Cannot the Government take care of their own funds, and manage them as they think best, without being charged with making war on the currency? without an outcry from bankers, brokers, and merchants, that their business is injured, and the whole country exposed to ruin? Must the Secretary of the Treasury consult the bankers before he can decide on any measure in relation to the public funds? If an act, having no bearing on commerce, in no way directly affecting any of the interests of the country, and which merely changed the places of deposit of the public revenues, could have occasioned the serious consequences which were charged upon it—the derangement of the currency, prostration of credit, the wide-spread embarrassments and distress which prevailed—the case would afford the strongest, the most irresistible, argument against the whole paper credit system. If these consequences did follow from so small a cause, it proves the miserable, wretched condition of your paper currency, which the Senator from Massachusetts seems to consider as preferable to gold and silver.

Unsable and bad as he considered the paper currency of the country, he would make no such charge against it; he did not believe it could be deranged, and the whole country involved in difficulty and distress, by so trifling a cause. No, sir, there was at that period a war upon the currency; but it did not come from the Executive, or this Government, but from the Bank of the United States, and other banks which from fear or favor co-operated with it in its measures intended to distress the country, and create a panic. That war on the currency and on the country came from the great mammoth of the paper system, which possessed more power over the currency than this Government; which could make paper money plenty or scarce at its pleasure. At this day, he believed no one could be found who would maintain that the embarrassments and distress which prevailed during almost the entire year of 1834, were occasioned by the change which was made in the management of the public revenue.

Mr. N. said he now came to consider the last measure which had been condemned as a tampering with the currency—the Treasury order of the 11th July, requiring cash payments for the public lands. It is claimed that the money pressure which has prevailed for months past, and which still continues, has been occasioned by this new regulation as to the sales of the public lands. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] did not seem to advance this opinion with confidence; he said there was a complication of causes; that this order, with other causes, had occasioned the existing difficulties; but when he came to point out the other causes, they did not appear to be very numerous or complicated, and all of them centered in the executive department of the Government. The complication of causes appeared to consist of but two; the Treasury order, and the execution of the deposit act, or the apprehension of the manner in which that act was to be executed. That the deposit act had contributed to increase the money pressure, Mr. N. did not doubt; but what properly belonged to the act, ought not to be charged to the execution, or the apprehended execution. He reluctantly gave his support to that act, although sensible at the time that it would increase, rather than relieve, the pressure for money, which prevailed. But it had not been shown that any censure was justly chargeable upon the Secretary for the execution of the law. It was impossible but that the act should occasion some temporary inconvenience in the monetary concerns of the country. It disposes of a large sum of money, nearly forty millions, upon principles altogether foreign to the commercial principles which control and regulate the moneyed capital of the country. Population is not the principle upon which commerce distributes money.

Mr. N. said that, in relation to the Treasury order, he would not deny that in some small degree it may have increased the difficulties which exist. It had increased the demand for specie, and that was the principal object of the measure, to obtain something of real value for the public lands. Its operation has been to replenish the deposit banks in the West with specie funds, and to draw them from the banks at the East, which has to some extent, diminished the ability of the latter to make loans. But a contraction of the paper currency had long before commenced; and that contraction must necessarily produce a curtailment in the loans and discounts of banks. The Treasury order only co-operated with other causes in producing results which were inevitable. To regard the Treasury order as the efficient cause of the present crisis would be like an attempt to find one's way by a taper, and close his eyes to the sun, which was enlightening the world. The real cause of the existing pressure is much broader and deeper than the Treasury order; it is a cause which is inherent in the banking system, and in that paper currency which we have just heard commended as preferable to gold and silver. There are laws which act upon and control the paper system of currency, supplied by banks, which are as immutable as those that govern the physical universe. One of these laws is, that a sudden expansion of the currency, even to an inconsiderable amount, gives an undue stimulus to enterprise, that occasions over-trading and speculation, which will continue to increase, until they are checked by a reaction in the money market, when a contraction of the currency ensues, by the banks being obliged to curtail their discounts. This occasions a scarcity of money.

But it seems to be denied that there has been any dangerous or essential enlargement of the paper currency. The Senator from Massachusetts admits that there has been a great augmentation of banking capital within the last two or three years, but attributes it to the rapid and unparalleled advance in the value of real estate and other property. It appeared to him this was taking the effect for the cause. What has occasioned the rapid rise in the price of real estate and other property? Is it not the flood of paper money with which the country has been inundated for the last few years, and the wide-spread and extravagant speculations to which it has given rise? If this was not the cause, he would like to know what it was. Has there not been an alarming increase of bank capital, and, of course, bank circulation, the last few years? The bank capital of the State banks was estimated by Mr. Gallatin, in 1830, at ninety-five millions of dollars, and the bank circulation at thirty-nine millions. The annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, a year ago, contained returns from nearly all the State banks; according to which, the capital of the State banks, on the 1st January, 1835, amounted to about ninety-six millions, their circulation to about eighty-six millions. Since that period, the increase of bank capital has been astonishingly rapid. It is thought to have exceeded one hundred millions, and the circulation to have been increased fifty millions. But in addition to this, the Bank of the United States has been rechartered the year past, with a capital of thirty-five millions, and has the possession of seven millions belonging to the United States; making a capital of forty-two millions. During the past year, there has also been a sum of from thirty to forty millions of dollars of the public revenue in the deposit banks, which has been used for banking purposes, and constituted a part of their capital. The whole addition to the banking capital of the country, since January, 1835, must considerably exceed one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, and the addition to the circulation fifty millions.

In his report, the present session, the Secretary estimates the circulation of bank paper, on the first of the present month, at one hundred and twenty millions; but thinks that in July it considerably exceeded that sum. Mr. N. thought this estimate below the truth, because it was found that the issues of banks would bear a certain proportion to their capitals. If it was true, as was supposed by Adam Smith, who wrote at a time when the subject of banking was very imperfectly understood, that no more paper money could be circulated than would supply the specie which it forced out of circulation, the creation of banking capital would not add to the paper currency. But that principle is incorrect; the paper issues of banks are found to depend mainly on the capital which shall be employed in banking operations. What proportion the circulation will bear to the banking capital was not clearly established, but it would not vary far from thirty per cent. If gentlemen will look into the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, just laid on our tables, they will find that the deposit banks, with a capital of seventy-seven millions, have a circulation of forty-one millions, or more than fifty per cent. These banks, it is true, possess large sums in deposit, so that their circulation is, no doubt, considerably larger, in proportion to their capital, than the general average.

Sir, (said Mr. N.,) are we to be told, in the face of these strong facts, that there has been no undue enlargement of the paper currency and the credit system the last two years? Are we to believe that this increase has been occasioned by the general rise in the value of property? Has property advanced nearly fifty per cent. in two years? And if such was the fact, what reason can be assigned for such an unprecedented advance in the value of property in so short a period, except the superabundance of the paper currency?

That the flood of paper money, and the great extension of bank credits, were the original and efficient cause of the embarrassments and difficulties which had prevailed for nearly one year, was clear beyond any reasonable doubt. Even a very small addition to the currency excites to over-trading and speculation, and an advance of prices. This has been found to be invariably the case in England, and in this country since the establishment of the Bank of the United States. All periods of excitement and speculation, in both countries, have been preceded by an increase of money or credit, or both. The year 1835 and the first half of the year 1836, have been distinguished for speculation in stocks, real estate, and every kind of property, and for the unprecedented multiplication of joint stock companies, for almost every conceivable object. A reaction has ensued, and there is now great distress in that country for money, as well as in this. This spirit of speculation and gambling is there attributed to an expansion of the paper currency, although the increase of paper appears to be trifling compared to what has taken place in this country. In 1833, there were but thirty-four joint stock banks in England, and in July, 1836, they had increased to seventy-seven. Their issues in 1834 were £1,783,600, and in 1836, £3,094,025, being an increase of less than a million and a half. In the mean time, the private banks had not increased, but to a small amount had contracted their issues. So small an addition to the paper currency as this is considered as the cause of the rage of speculation and gambling which has prevailed, and of the distress that has followed.

Mr. N. said that, in support and corroboration of these views, he would ask the Secretary to read some short extracts from two recent writers in that country, which he had copied:

"In 1819, the Bank of England and the country banks curtailed their issues about 15 per cent., and consols fell about 14 per cent.; in 1820, the country banks curtailed 32 per cent.; in 1821, 28 per cent. A fall of prices and scarcity of money followed; and 1819, '20, and '21, were years of great distress in England. One of the great evils from the great fluctuation in the amount of the currency, is the spirit of gambling which it engenders. It is the sudden abundance of money, which is the main-spring of all gambling transactions in our funds, and in articles of general consumption; and the rise in prices is forced by speculative buying and selling, considerably beyond the actual increase of the currency. It is to this cause alone, and under every circumstance which, as a nation, we can be placed, that I attribute the whole of the speculations, now and heretofore, that have appeared to begin in prosperity, and to end in the distress and ruin of thousands.

"The speculative rise probably exceeds the addition to the squares added. If 2 per cent. is added, prices will rise 8; if 8, 32 per cent. If, on the other hand, there is a contraction of 8 per cent. it will be attended with a fall of public credit and confidence in buying and selling. These are the evils, and they are evils of great magnitude, that attend the use of the paper currency. There is a range of contraction and expansion in the use of paper, that does not belong to a metallic currency, and which, perhaps, does more than counterbalance all the advantages to a nation from the use of paper."

"In a country so opulent as this, and so rapidly increasing in wealth and population, the too great ardor of speculation, and the miscalculation of producers, must necessarily sometimes occasion over-trading, and consequently gluts and depresses of the market. But were the currency in a perfectly sound state, the excitement arising from such causes would almost necessarily be confined to one or a very few businesses, and would be very far indeed from being either general or universal. In point of fact, all periods of general excitement, or periods marked by a general tendency to speculation, and by a general rise of prices, have, both in this and other countries, been uniformly distinguished by some extraordinary facilities in obtaining supplies of money or of credit, or of both. We are bold to say, that no single instance to the contrary can be pointed out in the history of industry in modern times."

Mr. N. said that the opinions of these two enlightened writers, in pointing out the evils of a paper currency, contained a satisfactory explanation of the true origin of the pecuniary difficulties which now exist in this country. There was no Treasury order in England, no tampering with the currency, so far as the Government was concerned, yet the same evils had been experienced there.

A paper currency was, from the very nature of it, unstable, and subject to constant fluctuations. Such had been its character in England, and in this country particularly. Since the establishment of the late Bank of the United States, it had been more unstable. Those who suppose that reactions and periods of distress were only occasional, and the result of extraordinary causes, were entirely mistaken. They are evils inherent in the system, and inseparable from it. Whoever will look back to the period of the establishment of the Bank of the United States, will find that such has been the case in this country. These severe and universal distress which prevailed throughout the Union in 1819 and '20, will long be remembered. In 1822, money again became scarce, and in 1823 there was great distress in the United States, as well as in England, where the pressure was universal and desolating in its consequences. So great was the calamity, that it was found necessary to take away, in part, the monopoly of the Bank of England, and authorize the establishment of joint stock banks, as a means of relief. In 1826, money was scarce in New York; and in the winter of 1827-'8, in the Middle and Eastern States. In 1829, many banks failed, and there was great distress among the manufacturers in the Eastern States. In the latter part of 1832, money again became scarce; and nearly the entire year of 1834 was distinguished, not only for a pressure, but for a panic, unexampled in this country. The evils of this period are too fresh in the memory of every one, to render it necessary to enlarge upon them.

In confirmation of these facts and views, he would beg leave to read a letter which has been published; it is from no visionary theorist, or anti-bank man, but from a responsible officer, the cashier of the Branch of the United States Bank in Baltimore, in 1830, and was addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury. It bears date February 15, 1830.

"Looking back to the peace, a short period, fresh in the memory of every man, the wretched state of the currency for the two succeeding years cannot be overlooked. The disasters of 1819, which seriously affected the circumstances, property, and industry, of every district in the United States, will long be recollected. A sudden and pressing scarcity of money prevailed in 1822; numerous and very extensive failures took place in New York, Savannah, Charleston, and New Orleans, in 1825. There was a great convulsion among banks and other moneyed institutions, in 1826. The scarcity of money among traders in that State and eastward, in the winter of 1827-'8, was distressing and alarming. Failures of banks in North Carolina and Rhode Island, and amongst the manufacturers of New England and this State, (Maryland,) characterized the last year, (1829); and intelligence is just received of the refusal of some of the principal banks of Georgia to redeem their notes with specie—a lamentable and rapid succession of evil and untoward events, prejudicial to the progress of productive industry, and causing a baleful extension of embarrassment, insolvency, litigation, and dishonesty, alike subversive of social happiness and morals. Every intelligent mind must express regret and astonishment at the recurrence of these disasters in tranquil times and bountiful seasons, amongst an enlightened, industrious, and enterprising people, comparatively free from taxation, unrestrained in their pursuits, possessing abundance of fertile lands and valuable minerals, with capital and capacity to improve, and an ardent disposition to avail ourselves of these great bounties.

"Calamities of an injurious and demoralizing nature, occurring with singular frequency amidst a profusion of the elements of wealth, are well calculated to inspire and enforce the conviction, that there is something radically erroneous in our monetary system, were it not that the judgment hesitates to yield assent, when grave, enlightened and patriotic Senators have deliberately announced to the public, in a recent report, that our system of money is in the main excellent, and that, in most of its great principles, no innovation can be made to advantage."

Mr. N. said that the letter which he had just read contained more truth and honesty than all the communications which had ever appeared from the head of that banking institution, of which the writer of this letter was an officer. It presented a faithful but melancholy picture of the operations of our banking and credit system.

With such facts as these, and the experience of the last twenty years before us, he thought it was trifling with common sense to talk about the Treasury order being the cause of the existing difficulties. Sir, (said Mr. N.,) the cause of these evils lies deeper and broader; it exists in your paper currency and banking system. The order has, no doubt, in some small degree, contributed to increase the pressure; and this is also true of the deposit act. They have served to bring on the crisis a little sooner than it might otherwise have come, but the disease was upon us, and must have its course.

If we were to look to any secondary causes, that of a wild spirit of speculation stands pre-eminent, and particularly speculation in public lands. But speculation is stimulated by our system of currency and credit. The immense purchases of the public lands during the last two years have filled your Treasury to overflowing; more than forty millions had been received from the sales of the public domain. This immense capital had been withdrawn from its accustomed employment. This, of itself, was sufficient to derange the whole business of the country.

The period of distress to which he had particularly referred, was also distinguished by speculations in the public lands. They commenced in 1818; the sales that year exceeded seven millions of dollars; in 1819, they were more than seventeen millions, and the first two quarters of 1820 amounted to the enormous sum of twenty-seven millions. In July the law went into operation, requiring cash payments; and so entirely did the sales depend on credit, that they were almost entirely suspended, and the last half of that year amounted to only about four hundred thousand dollars; and, for the four succeeding, did not average one million a year. Speculations in the public lands again commenced in 1834, when the sales amounted to about eight millions; in 1835, to fifteen millions, and the present year to more than twenty-four millions, including the sales of the Chickasaw lands, which do not go into the Treasury. That a reaction should follow this reckless spirit of speculation was inevitable.

Mr. N. said he thought that the attempt to charge the embarrassments and pressure for money upon the Treasury order had entirely failed. He believed the order to be legal, and was satisfied that it had had but little agency in causing the existing crisis. Still it was, in his mind, a question whether the principle of that order ought to be maintained. He considered it as a temporary measure, well calculated to remedy existing evils of the most alarming magnitude. But he was not prepared to say that it would do as a permanent regulation. The strongest reason for its adoption was to guard against the flood of paper money which was flowing with a swelling tide into the deposit banks from the sales of the public lands. This evil he hoped would be corrected by legislation before Congress adjourned, which, so far as that object was concerned, would supersede the Treasury order. But still the question is before us, and may have to be decided, in what currency shall the public revenue be collected? This was a question of great delicacy and magnitude. Great as he considered the evils of our paper system of money and credit, he did not see how this Government could provide a remedy. It certainly could not do it by any direct legislation; it had no power over the State banks, or their issues. The only power it could exercise upon the paper currency of the State banks was indirectly in the collection and disbursement of the revenue; and this was no small power, especially at a time like the present, when the revenues amounted to more than forty millions. A large portion of the whole currency of the country passes through your Treasury annually.

Mr. N. said he was not prepared to say to what extent this power could safely be exercised. He was satisfied, however, that it would not do at this time to collect the revenue in specie, exclusively. Congress had, no doubt, a right to do this; but, in the collection of so large an amount of revenue, we must have some regard to the business of the country, and to the ordinary currency used in commercial and other transactions. It is evident that we might adopt a rule which would occasion great inconvenience, and perhaps injustice, because the large sums of money received into the Treasury cannot well be collected in a currency not in general use. Whatever principle is adopted as a permanent regulation, ought to be uniform, and applicable to the customs as well as the lands. That, in the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, it will be proper to attempt to remedy some of the evils of the paper system, he had no doubt. We may, by our regulations, do something to increase the use and circulation of specie, and discountenance bills of small denominations. With regard to this important object, Congress had, perhaps, done all that it could by direct legislation. It has superseded the act of 1819, and legalized foreign coin; it has raised the standard of gold coin; it has established additional mints and greatly increased the annual coinage, and particularly that of gold, which has already become a new and important part of our metallic currency. The amount of specie in the country is greatly increased the last three years, for which this administration is entitled to great credit.

Mr. N. said that he could not assent to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, who, if he understood him, contended that it was the right and the duty of Congress to regulate the whole currency of the country. By this, he understood the Senator to mean, that Congress had the power to regulate the paper issues of the State banks. If he did not refer to this description of currency, it was difficult for him to conceive to what his remarks were intended to apply. But whilst we were so emphatically informed that this was the duty of Congress, we were not told how it was to be done. In what way can Congress regulate the paper currency supplied by the State banks? The gentleman did not inform us: he seemed to have a studied caution and reserve on this point, and thereby hangs a tale. Mr. N. thought, however, there was no secret in the case. The views of the Senator have been heretofore disclosed. Sir, said Mr. N., the Senator would regulate the paper currency of the States by a paper currency of the Federal Government; he would regulate the banking institutions of the States by the agency of a Bank of the United States. This was the secret. A national bank is to be the regulating power. But the country thought the remedy worse than the disease; they had twice tried it, and knew what sort of a regulation it was. He was speaking of a national bank in a mere financial point of view, without any reference to constitutional or political objections; and, in this aspect of the question, he did not hesitate to say that the proposition of establishing a national bank, as a means of restraining and regulating the State banks, was the most preposterous one ever submitted to a deliberative body, and the boldest attempt ever yet made to practise on the gullibility of the people. That such an institution possessed, and would necessarily exercise, great power over the State banks, he was not disposed to deny; but the question was, whether that power would be exercised for good or for evil. The question is not whether it is a regulator, but whether it is a safe regulator; whether it tends to keep the paper currency of the country more stable, or to render it more fluctuating. He appealed to the experience of the country in the last twenty years to settle that question. When the great national bank throws out its money plentifully, the State banks do the same; they are invited to this course, and it is their interest to pursue it. When it curtails its discounts and its issues, the State banks are compelled to do the same; so that the result of this mode of regulating the paper currency of the country, through the agency of a national bank, is, to place in the hands of a few individuals the power to make money plenty or scarce at their pleasure. The currency of the country is made to depend on the interest, the caprice, or the passions, of one or more individuals. This is a power greater than that possessed by your Executive; and its terrible effects were experienced during the memorable year of the panic.

Mr. N. said that the present high prices of provisions and the necessities of life were supposed to be inconsistent with the existing scarcity of money. There was nothing, however, extraordinary in this state of things; it was the case in 1819. The reaction was felt first upon stocks, and those kinds of property which had a more intimate connexion with the money market; whilst the products of labor were less easily or immediately affected. When the prices of the necessities of life are once raised, by an undue expansion of currency and credit, and consequent speculation, it takes a long time, often years, to bring them down. Labor is the last thing that is raised in price; but when it is, all the products of labor will of course be advanced, and may remain high for years; but the reaction which is going on must bring them down to their proper value.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. EWING] has given a very novel explanation of the present high prices of breadstuffs. He says that this country will no longer export wheat or flour; that there is but a small belt of three or four degrees of latitude suitable for grain; and that, from the establishment of manufactures, the demand at home is greatly increased; so that hereafter we can do no more than supply the domestic demand. We are told, also, that Europe is a great grain country. But the Senator seems to overlook the great and important fact of the difference in the population of the two continents. The whole population of the United States is less than that of the British isles, which for several years have supplied the entire breadstuff for their whole population. At the time of the union, in 1750, England and Scotland had a population of seven millions and a half, and the agriculture of the country produced barely a supply of grain equal to the consumption; and since that time the population had more than doubled, yet the last two or three years no wheat had been imported. The production, by the improvement of agriculture, had increased considerably above one hundred per cent. and to what extent it might be increased remained to be known. Comparing this country to England, he did not doubt that its resources for grain, when properly developed, would be found sufficient to sustain a population of two hundred millions. The Senator's own State, and one adjoining, could produce grain sufficient for the present population of the whole Union.

Mr. N. said he would conclude what he had to say, by noticing one observation of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING.] That Senator did not seem to be satisfied with condemning the Treasury order as unconstitutional and illegal, and as the cause of the distress which has prevailed, but he seemed to think it necessary to assail the motives of its authors. He more than insinuated that the measure did not originate with the President or the Secretary of the Treasury. He seemed to allude to a power behind the throne, greater than the throne itself; but with whom that power existed, we were not informed. He expected every moment to hear that it was the "Kitchen Cabinet;" but the Senator had not expressly alluded to that famous council, which once exercised such potent influence over public affairs.

He thought that common justice required that the motives of the President should have been spared. This, however, had not been done. The Senator appeared to think that there was some wicked motive in the Treasury order; that the object of its authors was not what it imported, or what had been assigned. He says, the real object was to create embarrassment and distress throughout the country, and to charge the same to the operation of the deposite act of last session, and thereby render that measure unpopular with the people. This was the deep-laid plot which the Senator has discovered. Mr. N. said he would only say, in reply, that if any such purpose had any influence on the issuing of the Treasury order, it was the silliest scheme that ever originated from the fatuity of man. It could not be supposed that the act of last session was to be repealed, and, of course, there could be no other object but to render the principle of distribution unpopular. Sir, said Mr. N., the opponents of that principle do not desire the aid of any stratagem or artifice; they will not even take advantage of embarrassments and difficulties which the execution of that law has occasioned. These were temporary evils; they were foreseen at the time. He was one, and perhaps the last, who had come into the support of that measure; but he did it with the full belief that its immediate effect would be to increase the existing difficulties. In supporting the act, he did not consider that he sanctioned the principle of distribution. Had the Senate then been told, as it had now, by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that in passing that act they would establish the principle of distributing surpluses from year to year, the bill could not have passed the Senate. Deeply and forcibly as many of us felt the condition of your Treasury; unwilling as we were that forty millions of the public money should remain, for several years at least, in the deposite banks, to be used as a capital, multiplying all the evils of our inflated paper system; anxiously and deeply as we were impressed with these evils, we should not entertain even a thought of relieving the country from them by sanctioning the principle of distribution. No, (said Mr. N.) that principle has not yet received the sanction of this body; but, it seems, it is to be pressed upon us the present session; and he trusted the opponents of the measure would be prepared to meet it, here and elsewhere, before the tribunal of public sentiment, where all questions affecting the great interests of the country and the safety of our institutions must ultimately come, and where the decision is not only final, but always safe, and usually correct. The opponents of this scheme want no extrinsic circumstances, or even temporary considerations, to bear on the question; all they ask is, to meet the principle in free, open, and fair discussion, upon its own intrinsic merits. If it is a sound and safe principle, in accordance with the constitution, consistent with the rights of the States, and conducive to the general prosperity, it will doubtless be sustained; but if it shall appear to be in conflict with the spirit of the constitution, fraught with mischief, tending to corruption, and dangerous to the rights and independence of the States, it could not stand, either here or before the popular tribunal of the country.

Mr. N. said he had concluded what he had to say, and had detained the Senate much longer than he intended.

Mr. RIVES said he thought the observations just made by his friend from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] showed conclusively that there were insuperable objections to the adoption of the resolution proposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] for rescinding the Treasury order of 11th July last. In the first place, the form of the proceeding was altogether unusual and inappropriate. It proposed to rescind an executive act. But the business of Congress was not to invalidate or to confirm executive acts, but to pass laws; or in other words, establish rules operating in future, to which executive action would thereafter conform. The action of the legislative authority ought to be original, independent, and prospective, and to bear on its face no reference to the acts of any other department.

Indeed, it is difficult to conceive what reason there can be for giving the particular form proposed to the action of Congress in this case, unless it be to imply a censure on the act to be rescinded. But however unprepared I may be at present, said Mr. R., to make the provisions of the Treasury circular the permanent policy of the Government, I will not concur in any proceeding which shall cast a censure on the Executive for issuing it. Whatever may have been, or may still be, its actual operation, (and on this point the diversity of testimony and opinion among those far better informed than I have any means of being, is so great as to render any judgment I might be able to form of but little weight,) of one thing I am well persuaded, that the motives which induced the Chief Magistrate to direct it to be issued were of the most honorable and patriotic character. I must say, also, that notwithstanding the ability and talent displayed on this, as on all other occasions, by the learned gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] he has not, in my humble judgment, succeeded in establishing any want of legality in the measure adopted by the Executive. Whatever rule, therefore, Congress may deem it necessary and expedient to establish for the future collection of the public revenue, I shall, for one, be opposed to any mode of action on the subject, which shall imply a censure for the past.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] has, in my judgment, presented the executive order of July last in its true light, as a temporary and occasional act, growing out of an extraordinary state of things then existing. It was designed to meet that state of things, and may have been wise and salutary as a temporary act, to operate until the meeting of Congress, while its continuance as a permanent legislative rule would be inexpedient. The President himself evidently regards it in this light. In his message, at the commencement of the session, he submits the whole subject for the consideration of Congress; and while he recommends to them earnestly the adoption of some measure for limiting the sales of the public lands, he attaches but little importance to the future requisition of specie in payment for them. Now, sir, I beg leave to say, in advance, that any practicable and equal measure, which shall be digested by the gentlemen of the West, to prevent the great evil of a monopoly of the public domain in the hands of speculators, shall meet with my hearty concurrence. A bill for that purpose is already before us, and, without having examined, or being prepared to express an opinion of its details, I hope it will receive the prompt consideration and action of Congress.

But to return to the Treasury order. The President has done what he deemed his duty, under the peculiar and extraordinary circumstances of the emergency. We are now called upon to do ours, in establishing some definite and permanent rule for the future collection of the revenue. An indispensable characteristic of any permanent system must be its uniformity. The genius of our constitution demands equality in the laws, and especially in the fiscal operations of the Government. It does not allow, as a permanent regulation, that specie shall be required in payment of one branch of the revenue, while bank notes are received for another—that one rule of collection shall prevail in the West, and another in the East. Whatever medium of payment, therefore, Congress shall prescribe for one portion of the public dues, ought to be extended to every other.

Shall that medium, in public receipts and disbursement, be specie exclusively? Even if this should be the ultimate policy of the Government, the country is, in my opinion, not yet ripe for its adoption. Specie must first diffuse itself more generally through the ordinary business of society, the common channels of circulation must be better filled with the metallic currency, before the Government can, with justice to the public debtor, sternly demand payment of its dues in gold and silver exclusively. The only effectual means by which a larger circulation of gold and silver in the general trade and business of the community can be obtained, is the suppression of bank notes of the smaller denominations. This is that practical reform of the currency which has been held steadily in view by the present administration and its friends; and in preparing for which, much has already been accomplished in the important steps of putting down the Bank of the United States; correcting by law the under-valuation of the gold coins; in the largely increased coinage and importation of both gold and silver; in the salutary influence exerted by the Treasury, through the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, over the leading State banks; and in the enlightened policy adopted by a majority of the States, in beginning a suppression of the smaller notes. It can be carried fully into execution only by a continued co-operation of the General and State Governments, on the same sound and practical views. Like every other great reform, it must be gradual and progressive. In unduly precipitating the process, there will be danger of inauspicious reactions; and in the view of the great body of the community, whose material interests are always liable to be bruised and shocked by sudden and violent changes, the remedy might unfortunately come to be looked upon as worse than the disease.

While, therefore, I would steadily persevere in the wise policy of enlarging the specie circulation of the country, (the first efficient commencement of which has been made under the present administration,) I would carefully abstain from compromising the success of so important a reform by any premature or precipitate experiment, which might endanger reaction. The present occasion may, with great propriety, be embraced, to make another safe advance in the prosecution of that reform, by laying a restriction on the receipt, in public collections, of the notes of all banks issuing bills under certain denominations. The joint resolution of 1816 ought to be remodelled, and adapted to the present condition of things. Some of its provisions have become obsolete. Of the four media of payment, in the collection of the public dues, recognised by it, two no longer exist, to wit: Treasury notes, and notes of the Bank of the United States, as a national currency. Of the remaining two, specie and the notes of specie-paying banks, the latter ought in my opinion to be subjected to additional restrictions, especially such as may have a tendency to promote the great practical reform of a suppression of the small notes. But, while the notes of specie-paying banks are treated by all the world, in private transactions, as equivalent to specie, I do not think the Government would be justified in refusing them in public collections altogether, until gold and silver shall, by the previous suppression of small notes, have taken the place more generally of a paper currency.

What has appeared to me best to be done, under existing circumstances, is a revision and modification of the joint resolution of 1816, adapting it to the present condition of things, and providing that all sums of money accruing to the United States, whether from customs, public lands, or otherwise, shall be received only in gold and silver, or in notes of banks paid on demand in gold and silver, but with the following restriction as to such notes, with a view to encourage the disuse and suppression of the smaller bank issues, and thereby enlarge the specie circulation; that is, from the passage of the law, no notes to be received in public collections of any bank, though a specie-paying bank, which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars, and the like prohibition to be gradually extended, (allowing due time for the change,) first to the paper of banks issuing bills of a less denomination than ten dollars; and, finally, to that of banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars. I would add also this farther limitation: that not even the notes of specie-paying banks of the above descriptions should be received, unless they were such as the banks in which they were to be deposited, should agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash; obtaining thus a double guarantee for the soundness and safety of the public collections, and making the whole transaction, to every practical purpose, equivalent to a payment in specie.

SENATE.]

Heirs of Colonel Philip Johnston.

A measure of this kind would, in my opinion, best satisfy the exigencies of all the public interests involved, whether of the revenue, the currency, or the general business of the community, and would conform to the sense of the country at large. I have drawn up, Mr. President, a resolution, founded upon and embodying these views; but I am embarrassed by a question of order, in placing it regularly before the Senate at the present moment. I will, however, take the liberty of reading it to the Senate, and will cheerfully conform to any suggestions which may be made as to the best manner of disposing it.

The call of the ayes and noes on the second reading of Mr. EWING's resolution was then withdrawn, and it was passed to a third reading by general consent, in order to admit a motion to amend: and it being then allowable to offer an amendment, Mr. RIVES moved to amend it by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting in lieu of it his own resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That hereafter all sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, whether for customs, public lands, taxes, debts, or otherwise, shall be collected and paid only in the legal currency of the United States, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes: that is, from and after the passage of this resolution, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars shall be received in payment of the public dues; from and after the first day of July, 1839, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars shall be receivable; and, from and after the 1st of July, 1841, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars; but the public debtors shall have the option of paying either in the said legal currency, or in the notes of banks of the description above mentioned, in good credit: provided, however, that no notes shall be taken in payment by the collectors or receivers, which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not be willing to pass to the credit of the United States as cash.

The amendment was ordered to be printed; and then, On motion of Mr. HUBBARD,
The Senate adjourned till Monday.

HEIRS OF COLONEL PHILIP JOHNSTON.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of Maria Scudder, Martha A. Lloyd, and Elizabeth Johnston, the children and heirs of Colonel Philip Johnston, for compensation for his revolutionary services.

Mr. W. remarked: On presenting this petition, I feel that I should not discharge the duty which I have undertaken for the respectable petitioners, nor do justice to the State which I have the honor in part to represent, if I did not avail myself of the occasion to make known to you the merits and services of one of her most gallant and patriotic sons. Colonel Philip Johnston, the father of the petitioners, was among the first of her sons which the devoted patriotism of New Jersey offered on the altar of American independence. Never, sir, was there a more pure and noble sacrifice made on that altar.

At the declaration of independence, Philip Johnston was a lieutenant colonel in the New Jersey militia; he had been appointed to that rank by an ordinance of the Provincial Congress of New Jersey, passed on the 14th of June, 1776, providing to raise, by voluntary enlistment, 3,300 militia, to reinforce the army at New York. This ordinance was passed in pursuance of the resolution of the Continental Congress of the 3d of the same month.

On the 1st of August following he was promoted to the colonelcy of his regiment in the brigade under General Heard, destined to form part of the flying camp, then assembling, for the defence of New York. It was then well known that the enemy, with a powerful fleet, and a well-disciplined and appointed army, was menacing New York. This was, indeed, "the time that tried men's souls." The timid sought safety in retirement, and the wavering were dismayed.

At this moment the earnest and soul-stirring appeals of the Father of his Country to the patriotism and bravery of Americans, roused the patriotic spirit of the sons of New Jersey:

"And from the sods of grove and glen,
Rose ranks of iron-hearted men,
To battle to the death."

The reputation of Colonel Johnston for patriotism, bravery, and talents, enabled him speedily to enlist his regiment, and at its head he marched to defend his "bleeding and enfeebled country." He was then in the vigor of manhood, in the possession of a moderate competency, and the prospects of the future bright before him. These, and all the endearments of the domestic circle, a young and beloved wife, and three daughters of tender years, he left at the call of his country.

The morning of the 27th of August, 1776, found Colonel Johnston at the head of his gallant regiment, on the battle-ground of Long Island, resolved, in the language of his illustrious commander-in-chief, "to conquer or to die." He fought near the side, and under the eye of his immediate commander, General Sullivan. It was a post of danger as well as of honor, and demanded both courage and conduct. Never did any officer more gallantly fulfil the expectations of his country, or more gloriously earn a title to the blessings and praises of his countrymen. He fell at the head of his regiment by a wound in his breast, and bravely struggling to turn the fortunes of that disastrous day. He died for his country, and under its banner, fighting for the general defence, and to secure the blessings of freedom for his whole country.

Yes, sir, he died in the cause and service of America, for the liberty and rights of all, and left to his countrymen an inestimable legacy, the example of his pure patriotism, his devoted courage, his chivalrous gallantry, and his glorious death. Who can calculate the extent, the influence, and the value, of that example upon the fortunes of our country at that gloomy and trying period, when even "hope was sinking in dismay?" Well, sir, may New Jersey glory in the example of such a son. It marshalled the way to those "heroic deeds" which have immortalized our revolutionary sires.

"'Tis to the virtues of such men man owes
His portion in the good that Heaven bestows;
And when recording History displays
Feats of renown, though wrought in ancient days,
Tells of a few stout hearts who fought and died,
Where duty placed them, by their country's side;
The man that is not moved by what he reads,
That takes not fire at their heroic deeds,
Unworthy of the blessings of the brave,
Is base in kind, and born to be a slave."

Sir, no monument has been erected, by the gratitude of his country, to the memory of Colonel Johnston; no recorded honors thicken around his tomb; no history displays his "feats of renown;" for, unfortunately for his memory, the revolutionary history of New Jersey is yet to be written. His fame rests in the memory of his few surviving gallant companions in arms, or happily may be faintly recorded among the memorials of frail and decaying memory in the Pension Office. One memorial of the "heroic deeds" of Colonel Johnston, gathered from the only whig newspaper of the day, that circulated in New Jersey, blotted with the tears of his widowed wife and fatherless daughters, has been treasured up by their affection, and is annexed to their petition. With your permission, Mr. President, I will read it:

"We hear that, in the late action on Long Island, Colonel Philip Johnston, of New Jersey, behaved with remarkable intrepidity and fortitude. By the well-directed fire from his battalion, the enemy was several times repulsed, and lanes were made through them, until he received a ball in his breast, which put an end to the life of as brave an officer as ever commanded a battalion. General Sullivan, who was close to him when he fell, says that no man could behave with more firmness during the whole action. As he sacrificed his life in defence of the invaded rights of his country, his memory must be dear to every American who is not insensible to the sufferings of his injured country, and as long as the same uncorrupted spirit of liberty which led him to the field shall continue to actuate the sons of freemen in America."

Mr. President, the tree of American liberty was nourished by the blood of such heroes.

But, Mr. President, when the husband and the father, at the call of his country, steps from the circle of domestic endearments, a patriot and a hero, it is the safety and protection of his wife and children that nerves his arm and animates his exertions in the hour of battle; and if he falls, his last prayer is for his country, and his last earthly consolation is, that his death commits them to its gratitude and protection. This obligation, which springs from the grave of heroism, is sanctioned by the purest and noblest feelings of our nature, and the highest dictates of policy, and creates a debt which descends upon all who inherit the blessings thus acquired. If, sir, the claim of the petitioners had no other foundation than this, it would, in my humble judgment, be irresistible. But it does not rest on this alone; it is supported by the pledged, and, I am sorry to say, the unredeemed, faith of their country. To say nothing, sir, at present, of the pledge fairly to be implied from the addresses of General Washington calling the militia to arms, and animating them to battle, that the country would provide for their wives and children, this pledge was distinctly made to Colonel Johnston and his companions in arms. On the 3d of June, 1776, Congress resolved that 13,800 militia should be employed to reinforce the army at New York, and that New Jersey be requested to furnish 3,300 of their militia to complete that number, to be engaged until the 1st of December, unless sooner discharged by order of Congress. This was to form the flying camp destined for the defence of New York. On the 5th of June, 1776, Congress resolved that the flying camp be placed under the command of such continental general officer as the commander-in-chief should direct. That the militia, when in service, be regularly paid and victualled, in the same manner as the continental troops. General Mercer was appointed to the command of the flying camp, thus formed, on the 20th July, 1776. The Convention of New Jersey was requested by Congress to raise for the flying camp, under General Mercer, three battalions of militia, in addition to the five formerly desired by Congress, and send the same with all possible despatch to the flying camp; and that they should be officered, paid, and provided, as directed by the former resolutions for forming the flying camp.

Thus, sir, it is plain that the detachment of New Jersey militia required to form the flying camp for the defence of New York, was called out by the Continental Congress, and for the general defence of the country; and was placed in the service of the United States, under the command of continental officers, and on the same footing in all respects as continental troops. In fact, the battalion commanded by Colonel Johnston was enlisted under a resolution of Congress, placed under its control, received into its service, commanded by its officers, and entitled to all the benefits and advantages, immediate and prospective, which resulted from that situation. So it was considered by the Convention of New Jersey, in the several ordinances which they passed to raise the men required to reinforce the army at New York.

In the last ordinance passed by the Convention of New Jersey, on the 11th August, 1776, to carry into effect the resolutions of Congress to which I have referred, the preamble recites: "The Convention, viewing with serious concern the present alarming situation of this and her sister States—that on a prudent use of the present means depend their lives, their liberty, and happiness, think it their indispensable duty to put their militia on such a footing that the whole force may be most advantageously exerted." For that purpose, the whole militia were classed in two divisions, and one half were immediately detached to join the flying camp at New York.

After the appropriate details, that ordinance concludes in a strain of patriotic eloquence unknown to the rolls of statutes, and which I cannot deny myself the pleasure of recalling to the recollection of our country. It breathes the pure spirit of "Seventy-six."

"And whereas the principles of equity and humanity require that a proper compensation and provision should of made for the families of all such as may be killed or wounded in the service, the Convention pledge the faith of this State that an adequate provision for the purpose aforesaid shall be made.

"In this interesting situation, viewing, on the one hand, an active, inveterate, and implacable enemy; increasing fast in strength, receiving large reinforcements, and industriously preparing to strike some decisive blow; on the other, a considerable part of the inhabitants supinely slumbering on the brink of ruin, moved with affecting apprehension, the Convention think it incumbent upon them to warn their constituents of their impending danger. On you, our friends and brethren, it depends this day to determine whether your wives, your children, and millions of your descendants yet unborn, shall wear the galling, ignominious yoke of slavery, or nobly inherit the generous, the inestimable blessings of freedom. The alternative is before you. Can you hesitate in your choice? Can you doubt which to prefer? Say, will you be slaves? Will you toil, and labor, and glean together a little property, merely that it may be at the disposal of a relentless and rapacious conqueror? Will you, of choice, become hewers of wood and drawers of water? Impossible. You cannot be so amazingly degenerate as to lick the hand that is raised to shed your blood. Nature and nature's God have made you free. Liberty is the birthright of Americans—the gift of Heaven; and the instant it is forced from you, you take leave of every thing valuable on earth: your happiness or misery, virtuous independence or disgraceful servitude, hang trembling in the balance. Happily, we know that we can anticipate your virtuous choice.

"With confident satisfaction we are assured that not a moment will delay your important decision; that you cannot feel hesitation whether you will tamely and degenerately bend your necks to the irretrievable wretchedness of slavery, or, by your instant and animated exertions, enjoy the fair inheritance of heaven-born freedom, and transmit it unimpaired to posterity."

It was under this animated and eloquent appeal to his patriotism, and solemn pledge that a proper compensation and provision should be made for his family, that Colonel Johnston marched to the field of his death and renown.

That pledge, sir, was never redeemed by the State of New Jersey; and that pledge devolved upon the United States, and was solemnly assumed by them when they assumed the revolutionary debt and obligations of the several States. It rests upon the equity and humanity of those who are now enjoying the fair inheritance of freedom which Colonel Johnston died to obtain. In addition to all this, the claim of the petitioners is also sustained by the equity, if not the express letter, of various resolutions of Congress. I refer particularly to those of the 15th May and 26th September, 1778; the 24th August, 1780, and the 26th May, 1781. It is likewise sanctioned by several laws of Congress, making compensation for revolutionary services in analogous cases, which I forbear to detain you by enumerating.

Strong as the claim of the petitioners is upon its own merits, there is another consideration which, sir, I feel bound to press on your attention. It appears that one of the petitioners is the wife of Joseph Scudder, Esq. His youth was devoted to the service of his country, in one of the bureaus established by the Revolution. He is the surviving son of Colonel Nathaniel Scudder, one of that illustrious band of revolutionary patriots and heroes who devoted himself to the service of his country, both in the cabinet and in the field, and was alike distinguished for his wisdom as a statesman, and bravery as a soldier. Among the first in his native State to espouse the cause of American independence, he was, from its declaration until his death, honored with a seat either in the councils of his native State, or in Congress. But he did not avail himself of the exemption which his civil employments conferred to relieve him from military duty.

At an early period of the revolutionary war, Colonel Scudder was honored with the command of a regiment of militia of his native county, then peculiarly exposed to the invasion of the enemy. In the hour of danger he was always to be found at its head, bravely defending his native soil. But it was not his fate there to fall in all "the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war." He was killed on the 16th October, 1781, near Black Point, in the county of Monmouth, while bravely leading such of his fellow-soldiers as could be collected on a sudden alarm, to repel a predatory excursion of the enemy. The honors of war were the only public tribute paid to his memory; and to this day his children have neither asked nor received any thing from the bounty of their country as a compensation for their irretrievable loss.

Thus, sir, by a happy coincidence, this petition presents before you the daughter of the first militia colonel of New Jersey, and the son of the last who fell in achieving our glorious independence. Never did death confer greater honor upon children. If it cannot disarm poverty of its miseries, it ennobles it.

The children of Colonel Johnston, now aged, infirm, and, it gives me pain to add, poor, are compelled to ask of their country the redemption of that pledge, solemnly made to their father, to relieve them from the severe pressure of misfortunes which have resulted from neither crime nor vice. Their father died on the first battlefield where the star-spangled banner was unfurled in defence of American independence; that glorious prize for which he fought and died, which animated his exertions and nerved his arm when that banner waved fitfully over the field of his death and his country's misfortunes, has been obtained by his country. The star-spangled banner now waves in triumph "over the land of the free and the home of the brave," the pride and protection of a great, prosperous, and happy nation.

The petitioners now submit their case to the equity, the humanity, and plighted faith of their country.

Mr. W. concluded by moving that the petition be read, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; which motion was agreed to.

THE EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

Mr. BENTON laid on the table a resolution to expunge from the journal of the Senate the resolution of March, 1834, censuring the conduct of the President for removing the deposits from the Bank of the United States, &c.; which was ordered to be printed. [The resolution is in the same words with the one on the same subject introduced by Mr. BENTON at the last session.]

After transacting some other business,

The Senate went into executive business; and when the doors were opened,

The Senate adjourned.

ADMISSION OF MICHIGAN.

A message was received from the President of the United States, through A. JACKSON, JR., his private secretary, on the subject of the admission of Michigan into the Union, with documents, stating that Michigan, by convention, had, at a late day, complied with the regulations of the conditional act of admission.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the message and documents be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENTON remarked that, as the President had given his opinion that Michigan had complied with the requisite terms of admission, and as he had said that he should have issued his proclamation accordingly, had the information arrived during the recess of Congress, he (Mr. B.) regarded the proposed reference as a mere matter of form, and would prefer that a joint resolution of admission should forthwith be passed by both Houses.

Mr. GRUNDY said he would still prefer the course which he had suggested, and on this account: that the first convention had not assented to the terms of admission, but another convention had decided to accede to the proposition made by the Congress of the United States. The great inquiry now was, are the proceedings in accordance with the act of admission? The decision of which question depends on information which ought to be ascertained before the actual admission, though the President had said that, in his opinion, all was right, and, if the information had come during the recess, he would have acted accordingly. Mr. G. had no design to produce any delay, by a reference to a committee. He should not withdraw his motion, and he hoped the Senator would withdraw his opposition.

Mr. BENTON said that, as the committee might draw up a joint resolution for admission to-day, he should not oppose the reference.

The message was referred accordingly.

THE TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The Senate now proceeded to the special order, the further consideration of the joint resolution introduced by Mr. EWING, of Ohio, on this subject, the question being on the amendment or substitute offered by Mr. RIVES to that resolution; which substitute proposes to refuse to receive for the public dues the bills of such banks as issued, after certain specified periods, bills under certain specified denominations; the substitute also leaving in the power of the deposit banks to refuse such funds as they may think proper.

Mr. HUBBARD, who was entitled to the floor, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: Although it was on my motion that the Senate adjourned on Thursday last, yet, in moving for the adjournment, it was not then my intention to address the Senate this morning upon the subject now under consideration. But as I shall have no better opportunity to express my own views with reference to the deposite bill of the last session, which seems to be involved in this discussion, and as I have been, in connexion with my colleague, most grossly misrepresented in relation to our vote upon that bill, and as the principles of that bill have been most strangely misunderstood—certainly most falsely and perversely stated in the public journals—I will avail myself of the opportunity now presented, briefly to express the considerations which induced me to give my support to that measure. Before, however, I proceed to notice that bill, I shall advert to the resolutions of the Senator from Ohio—shall endeavor to explain their object, and, in my apprehension, the impracticability of accomplishing the object intended, in the way and manner proposed. The resolutions offered by the Senator from Ohio are as follows:

“Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Treasury order of the eleventh day of July, anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, designating the funds which should be receivable in payment for public lands, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

“Resolved, also, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to delegate to any person, or to any corporation, the power of directing what funds shall be receivable for customs, or for the public lands; nor shall he make any discrimination in the funds so receivable, between different individuals, or between the different branches of the public revenue.”

The first resolution seeks to repeal the Treasury order—“the specie circular,” as it is called—of the 11th of July, 1836. The second is intended to prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury, by his authorized agents, from directing what funds shall be received for customs, or for the public lands, and prohibiting him from making any discrimination in the funds so receivable between different individuals, or between the different branches of the public revenue. The main purpose of the resolution is to rescind the order of the Executive, bearing date on the 11th of July, 1836, directed to “receivers of public money and to the deposite banks.”

Can this be accomplished? Is this matter within our power? It seems to me that if these resolutions should pass both Houses of Congress, the object which the Senator from Ohio has in view would not thereby be effected. If the order of the 11th of July, 1836, was issued by authority of law, the resolution of the Senator from Ohio should seek to repeal the law upon which the order is based, and which gave authority for issuing the order. If the order of the Secretary of the Treasury has not been issued in pursuance of law, the order itself is of no effect; and any resolution which we could pass, rescinding such an order, would be alike ineffectual.

If the Secretary had the legal power to send forth the order, it is beyond the legislative control of Congress. If the Secretary, or the President, through the Secretary, had the right to promulgate the circular, he may be answerable for the manner in which he exercises that right; but the act cannot itself be repealed by any legislation of Congress.

If the Secretary had not the authority, the power, the right to issue the order, then the order itself is perfectly nugatory.

The Executive is an independent branch of the Government. The Senate can have no more power over the rightful acts of that branch of the Government, than it has over an order of the House of Representatives, or an order of the Judiciary.

One branch of the Government, exercising its powers and its duties within the constitution and the law, cannot have its acts rescinded and set at naught by the action of any other branch of the Government,

If the order, then, has been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in pursuance of law, the mode proposed to get rid of it is objectionable, and, in my view, unwarrantable. If not issued in pursuance of law, the adoption of the resolution would seem to me equally objectionable and unwarrantable. In such a case, the officer should be, and ought to be, held amenable for such an assumption of power. It therefore occurs to me, that the object the Senator from Ohio has in view cannot be attained in the way proposed; and if the last resolution of the Senator from Ohio should be adopted, it seems to me that the direct effect would be to prohibit receivers from accepting the paper of local banks, under any circumstances, in payment of the public dues. It proposes, in terms, to take the power from the Secretary of the Treasury to designate the kind of money receivable; and, should it be adopted, if any effect shall be produced whatever, it will be to exclude from the offices of our receivers all local bank paper. They would be bound to take nothing but gold and silver, unless the joint resolution of April, 1816, is imperative and obligatory; and if that be so, the Executive had no authority to restrain the legal operation of that resolution; for, if binding, it gives to the debtor rights which cannot be infringed or taken away by executive power. If the order of July 11, 1836, was unauthorized, the resolution to rescind it would be unnecessary. Its adoption could not prevent the immediate promulgation of a similar order, in case the Executive, charged with the execution of the laws, should consider it to be his duty to do so. To accomplish the object the Senator from Ohio has in view, we must go beyond the order itself; we must go to the law on which that order was based, and in the execution of which it is presumed that the order in question was issued. To render the order of no effect, we must amend the law.

I propose, Mr. President, first to examine the question, whether the Executive had a legal authority to issue the order of the 11th of July, 1836; and, if he had the power, whether it was a matter of policy for him to exercise it at the time and under the circumstances he did.

Had the President, through the Secretary of the Treasury, the power to issue the order of the 11th of July last?

On this point I can entertain no doubt. It seems to my mind to be clear and free from difficulty; and so far from its being a wanton assumption of power, so far from its being illegal, it is a power in strict accordance with the requisitions of existing laws, and which the President, charged with their execution, was bound to issue if he considered the public interest demanded it.

The public lands were the property of our common country; they had been obtained by the sacrifices and services, the blood and the treasure, of the whole republic, during the war of the Revolution; and they were early pledged for the payment of the public debt, necessarily incurred in the establishment of our national independence.

An act of Congress which has reference to the sale of the public lands was passed May 18, 1796, and makes no particular designation as to the kind of money receivable. It fixes the minimum price at two dollars per acre, and directs that, “upon payment of a moiety of the purchase-money, the purchaser shall have a year’s credit for the residue.”

The act of March, 1797, declares “that the evidences of the public debt of the United States shall be receivable in payment of any of the lands which may be hereafter sold in conformity to the act” of 1796.

The fifth section of the act of May 10, 1800, provides, “That no lands shall be sold by virtue of this act, at either public or private sale, for less than two dollars per acre, and payment may be made for the same by all purchasers, either in specie, or in evidences of the public debt of the United States," at certain rates, which are prescribed in the act. And thus the law stood until 1820, when the credit system was abolished. From a view of these several acts, it results that, under the act of 1796, there was no particular designation of the kind of currency receivable for the public lands; but the payments were to be made "in money," that is, the legal currency of the country. Under the act of 1797, evidences of the public debt were made receivable for the public lands; and under the act of 1800, specie or evidences of the public debt were required in payment. Such was the law, and such was the practice under the law, with reference to the public lands, until the act of April, 1820, except it was provided, by the particular provisions of the act of 1812, that Treasury notes were made receivable for all public lands sold by the authority of the United States.

The fourth section of the act of the 24th of April, 1820, making further provision for the sale of the public lands, seems to my mind to settle the question as to the legality of the specie circular conclusively. It declares, "That no lands shall be sold, at any public sales thereby authorized, for a less price than one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, nor on any other terms than that of cash payment."

The requisition is, that the sales of the public lands shall not be made on any other terms than that of "cash payment." There cannot be two opinions, here or elsewhere, as to the import of the terms "cash payment." It means payments in the constitutional or in the legal currency of the country, in gold or silver, or in the paper currency which had been previously established by law. By acts of Congress, Treasury notes were at one time receivable for the public lands, and bills of the Bank of the United States were made receivable by the provisions of the charter itself. But at the date of the specie circular no such legislative provisions were in force. There was, then, no legal obligation at the date of that order to receive any thing for the public lands, or for the customs, but gold or silver, unless that obligation is imposed by the joint resolution of the 30th of April, 1816.

It is perfectly true, that, in practice, the legal obligation has been relaxed; but it is not believed to have been done at the risk of the Government. Paper money, beside the bills of the Bank of the United States, had been received; and our collectors were in the habit of receiving the paper of some State banks, at particular times and places, and under peculiar circumstances, for the debts due to the Government; but such collections were upon the responsibility of the receivers. The relaxation of the rule of law had been for individual accommodation.

I have stated that, by the express terms of the charter, the bills of the Bank of the United States were made receivable for customs and for public lands. But the Bank of the United States, which was made the depository of the money of the United States, would not receive in deposit all State bank paper as cash, although of the description as stated in the resolution of 1816. That charter expired on the 3d of March last, and the President of the United States, in his annual message to Congress, December, 1835, remarks, that "It is incumbent on Congress, in guarding the pecuniary interests of the country, to discontinue, by such a law as was passed in 1812, the receipt of the bills of the Bank of the United States in payment of the public revenue;" and, in pursuance of this recommendation of the President, Congress did, at the last session, repeal, in express terms, the 14th section of the act chartering the Bank of the United States. It will be found by that section that the bills of that bank were made receivable for the public dues. I will read the act of the last session in relation to this matter, as it has been urged in argument that the message of the President, and the consequent action of Congress thereon, had reference to a different matter. That act declares:

"That the 14th section of the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, approved April 10, 1816,' shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

This was but an answer to the message; it had no sort of reference to the resolution of 1816, nor had the message any such reference.

On the 11th of July, 1836, there was nothing then in the way of this circular, but the joint resolution of the 30th of April, 1816. I propose to refer to the history of our own legislation, as affording us some light upon this interesting subject of the currency. It will be found that as early as the 31st of July, 1789, Congress passed an act "to regulate the collection of duties," and the 30th section of that act requires:

"That the duties and fees to be collected by virtue of this act shall be received in gold and silver coin only," and goes on to establish the rates at which foreign gold and silver should be taken and received. This act was repealed by the act of August 4, 1790; but it will be found that, by the 56th section of the act of Congress passed in August, 1790, a provision precisely similar is introduced, which was contained in the act of 1789.

The mint was established on the 12th of April, 1792; and by the 16th section of that act of Congress it is provided "that all the gold and silver coins which shall have been struck at and issued from the said mint, shall be a lawful tender in all payments whatsoever; those of full weight according to the respective values hereinbefore declared, and those of less than full weight at values proportionate to their respective weights."

Thus it appears that by the acts of Congress, not only foreign gold and silver coins at certain rates were made receivable, but also the gold and silver coins struck at our mint were also made a lawful tender.

The first United States Bank was chartered on the 21st of February, 1791; and it will be seen, by a reference to the 10th section of that act of Congress, "that the bills or notes of the said corporation originally made payable, or which shall have become payable on demand, in gold and silver coin, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States." And thus, by the express enactment of Congress, were the bills of the United States Bank made receivable for all debts due to the Government; and by a reference to the 74th section of the act of the 2d of March, 1799, which repeals the act of August, 1790, and which "regulates the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," it will be found "that all duties and fees to be collected shall be payable in the money of the United States, or in foreign gold and silver coins" at fixed rates.

By the act of Congress of June 30, 1812, it is provided "that Treasury notes, wherever made payable, shall be everywhere received in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the authority of the United States, and of all public lands sold by the said authority."

On the 19th of March, 1812, Congress passed an act expressly repealing the 10th section of the act incorporating the subscribers to the first Bank of the United States.

Between, then, the 19th of March, 1812, and the 10th of April, 1816, when the second United States Bank was chartered, American and foreign gold and silver, and Treasury notes only, were receivable for the public dues; and, as I have before said, it is provided by the fourteenth section of the act establishing the late Bank of the United States, "That the bills or notes of the said corporation originally made payable, or which shall have become payable on demand, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, unless otherwise directed by act of Congress."

Dec. 27, 1836.]

And the section next following assigns a good reason why this preference was so decidedly given to the bills of the Bank of the United States; for no one can doubt that this fourteenth section gave to the paper of that bank a currency and a circulation which it never could have had if that had not have been incorporated in the charter. The 15th section provides "that during the continuance of the act, and whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the said corporation shall give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place within the United States, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charge."

And the next following section provides "that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary shall otherwise direct," &c. It was clearly intended, by the introduction of the fourteenth section into the charter, to grant an important and exclusive privilege to the bank; and it is just as clear to my mind that the bank was bound to receive in deposit "the money of the United States," and to transfer, without charge, that money, which constituted the public funds, from place to place, as required.

The currency which the bank was bound to receive in deposit, and which constituted the "public funds," was foreign coin at fixed rates, the coinage of our own mint, and Treasury notes. The bank could not have refused to have received either of these descriptions of currency, and it never did refuse so to do. Thus matters stood when, in just twenty days after the bank was established, comes the resolution of the 30th of April, 1816, and it certainly cannot be unimportant to inquire how this resolution happened to be offered, and how it happened to be adopted. A character is now given to it which I never supposed it was entitled to, and hence it may be useful to trace its origin, in order to determine its true character and object.

It is now not only matter of public history, but must be within the particular recollection of the members of the Senate, that, during the last war, the banks in New York, and west and south of New York, had stopped payment. The banks of New England did not, during that period, suspend specie payments. But the banks first referred to had issued a flood of paper on individual security, and on a pledge of Treasury notes; an amount which, at the time, the banks themselves were wholly unable to redeem. Much of this depreciated uncurrent paper had found its way into the public Treasury for customs and for lands. No man can say that the receipt of this money was not an entire departure from the requisitions of existing law. But still its receipt seemed to be unavoidable; it was the only money in circulation in New York and west of New York; and although the acts of Congress expressly required that the customs should be received only in gold and silver, and Treasury notes, yet, considering the particular crisis, and the peculiar circumstances of the country, it was next to an impossibility for the public receivers and collectors to observe expressly and literally the law; and hence an immense amount of this depreciated paper had accumulated in the public Treasury. The banks themselves were receiving enormous profits upon their issues; and the funds of the Government were in most imminent jeopardy. The Secretary of the Treasury could not, at the time, if he would, upon his own notion, without the order and direction of Congress, have checked this growing evil; he could not have changed the course.

The author of the resolution himself, in a most able speech which he made in the House of Representatives, with reference to this subject, much better expressed than I can the character and extent of the then existing evil, and the requisite remedy therefor. He remarked:

"What was the present evil? Having a perfectly sound national currency, and the Government having no power in fact to make any thing else current but gold and silver, there had grown up in different States a currency of paper, issued by banks setting out with the promise to pay gold and silver, which they had been wholly unable to redeem; the consequence was, that there was a mass of paper afloat, of perhaps fifty millions, which sustained no immediate relation to the legal currency of the country—a paper which will not enable any man to pay money he owes to his neighbor, or his debts to the Government. The banks had issued more money than they could redeem, and the evil was severely felt, &c. He declined occupying the time of the House to prove that there was a depreciation of the paper in circulation; the legal standard of value was gold and silver; the relation of paper to it proved its state, and the rate of its depreciation. Gold and silver currency, he said, was the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad; there could, in the present state of the world, be no other currency. In consequence of the immense paper issues having banished specie from circulation, the Government had been obliged, in direct violation of existing statutes, to receive the amount of their taxes in something which was not recognised by law as the money of the country, and which was, in fact, greatly depreciated, &c. This was the evil.

"These banks not emanating from Congress, what engine was Congress to use for remedying the existing evil? Their only legitimate power, he said, was to interdict the paper of such banks as do not pay specie from being received at the custom-house. With a receipt of forty millions a year, he said, if the Government was faithful to itself and to the interests of the people, they could control the evil; and it was their duty to make the effort. They should have made it long ago, and they ought now to make it. The evil grows every day worse by indulgence. If Congress did not now make a stand, and stop the current whilst they might, would they, when the current grew stronger, hereafter do it? If this Congress should adjourn without attempting a remedy, he said, it would desert its duty."

It became the bounden duty of Congress to interpose, and, by some decisive act, to stop all further receipts of this depreciated paper money; to improve the currency of the country; to render safe the funds of the nation, and to inspire public confidence in the resources of the Government. It was at a time like this, and under circumstances like these, that the resolution of the 30th of April, 1816, was presented; and the last clause of that resolution speaks to the then Secretary of the Treasury, and through him to all the receivers of the public money, and more especially to the banks themselves, which had flooded the nation with their over-issues of uncurrent and depreciated paper, a language which no mortal can misunderstand. It declares:

"That from and after the 20th day of February next, no duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States;" most clearly indicating that the resolution, in this part, was merely advisory. It expressed the sense of Congress in relation to its subject-matter. It said to the Secretary, that he should not thereafter receive any uncurrent paper; and it had the whole effect intended. It checked at once the issues of these banks; it produced, as if by magic, an entire revolution in the currency; it induced the banks themselves to resume specie payments; it performed faithfully its whole office, and thus the matter ended. No human being then supposed that the resolution was intended to be absolutely imperative upon the Secretary; that it went to add the local paper of specie-paying banks to the legal currency.

"At the time of the adoption of this resolution, debts accruing to the United States, whether on account of the sales of the public lands, or at the custom-house, or from other sources of revenue, were in fact received in some parts of the country, but evidently in disregard of the law, in the notes of the State banks, which did not redeem their paper 'by cash payments.' By this resolution it was obviously made the duty of the Treasury to correct that departure from law as soon as practicable; and it was, as is equally obvious, imperative on the Department, after the 20th February, 1817, to allow nothing to be received in payment of debts due to the United States but the legal money of the United States, Treasury notes, notes of the Bank of the United States, or of those State banks the notes of which were payable and paid on demand in cash."

This construction, given to the joint resolution of 1816, by its author himself, when its particular obligations, and the duties of our public officers under that resolution, were among the subjects then under consideration, appears to me to be correct. The resolution manifestly was intended to express the sense of Congress upon what had been the practice of the Treasury Department in relation to the kind of money in which the debts of the Government had been collected; and, in terms most obvious, to restrain the Treasury Department from every such departure from the requirements of existing law, after the 20th of February, 1817. But the resolution makes no change in the law; it does not, in terms, nor by fair implication, establish the notes of all specie-paying banks as legal currency, and make them, as such, receivable for the customs and for the public lands.

Let us examine the whole resolution. It provides:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the twentieth day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States."

I would ask, what obligation was imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury by this joint resolution? Nothing more, and nothing less, than to forbear henceforward from receiving uncurrent State bank paper in payment of duties and of debts of every description, and to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause all the public dues to be collected, as the law requires, viz: in the legal currency of the United States, in gold or silver, in Treasury notes, or in bills of the Bank of the United States. The acts of Congress had established each and all as legal currency, and given direction to public officers to receive them as such. This resolution established no new currency; it did not repeal nor add to any act of Congress which designated the kind of money receivable.

If the resolution is imperative, if it be obligatory, then the Secretary had no discretion. He was bound to take the bills of all specie-paying banks, as well as the notes of the Bank of the United States, in payment for duties. But, according to my apprehension, the plain, sensible, common-sense meaning to be given to the resolution is, that the Secretary should, after its passage, adopt such means as he might deem necessary to have the revenue of the Government receivable in the legal currency—the currency then established by acts of Congress; and if, for matter of individual accommodation, it should be found necessary to relax at all, in such case the Secretary of the Treasury should no longer receive the paper of non-specie-paying banks; that he should, in no event, be justified in taking the bills of any bank which are not payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States. The resolution, in this respect, is merely advisory to the Secretary. It was intended to restrain him from collecting the revenue in the way and manner it had been collected for years before; and it was also clearly intended to give authority, to give countenance, to the Secretary of the Treasury, for a time, in relaxing the rule of law—in departing from the requisitions of existing statutes—so far as he might receive the paper of specie-paying banks for the public dues. But it cannot, it seems to me, be contended for a moment that here was an addition made to the legal currency of the country; that, henceforward, the collectors and receivers would be bound to take in payment for customs and lands the bills of State banks paying specie when demanded.

The resolution was intended to operate for a time as a waiver on the part of the Government of its rights; but it could not be regarded as a positive, unqualified, and obligatory statutory provision. Such a law could never have been literally carried into effect. The receiver at New Orleans could not be presumed to know the true character of the bank paper of my own State; and yet he would be bound so to do, if the resolution was imperative and obligatory. That resolution was offered, as I have before stated, immediately after the act was passed establishing the United States Bank; and according to the construction now given to it, the exclusive privilege which had been given to that institution was taken away. The resolution, if it does not in terms repeal the fourteenth section of the bank charter, practically renders that section to the bank itself unimportant, and imposed upon the bank new obligations under the charter extremely onerous, and of great hazard to the interests of that institution. This never was, it never could have been, intended. The law was not, in terms, changed by the resolution; and if the resolution, having the effect of law, is imperative and mandatory in this particular, then, most clearly, it follows that it must be general in its operations; it cannot be in force in Boston, and of no effect in Baltimore; and yet it has been admitted that the collector at New Orleans would not be bound to receive a bill of a specie-paying bank issued in New Hampshire. This admission, correct in point of fact, gives to this measure its true character. It clearly shows that the framer of this resolution himself did not regard it as an absolute provision of law, but rather as a matter of practice, which was to be confided to the sound discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Bank of the United States was to receive in deposit the money of the Government; and it was bound to transfer from place to place, without charge, the public funds; and yet, as I have before said, immediately after the passage of the joint resolution of 1816, the bank itself refused to receive on deposit the bills of specie-paying banks, and pass them to the general credit of the Government, and to transfer them, without charge, as a part and portion of the public funds. The Senator from Massachusetts; in his report in the case of Mr. Crawford, says:

"That institution [the United States Bank] is indeed bound to give necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place; but this can only mean cash funds; and it is bound also to receive money in deposit for the United States; but it is not bound to receive in deposit, as cash, the bills of any banks whatever but its own, although they may come within the provisions of the resolution of 1816."

And thus the course of the bank was justified, and its proceeding never called forth any action of Congress expressive of its disapprobation. But how could such a course of proceeding be justified if the bills of State banks, paid in specie on demand, were by law added to the currency of the country? If the receivers were bound at all events to take the bills of specie-paying banks in payment for public lands and for customs, the United States Bank were also bound to receive them in deposit. They went to make up a part of the public funds of the Government; and yet receivers were justified in not taking the bills of specie-paying banks in payment for the public dues, and the bank was justified in refusing to receive them in deposit, and of transferring them, as a part of the funds of the Government, without charge. This is wholly irreconcilable with the idea, and with the fact, that such bills had been legalized, absolutely and unqualifiedly, as currency.

The resolution could not in any way affect the power of the President over the subject. He was bound to see the laws faithfully executed. The laws remained unaltered, the same after as before the resolution. The power and the duty of the President was the same after as before the resolution.

The construction which I have now given to the resolution of 1816 has been given to it not only by public officers, but that construction has been sustained by Congress, with reference to this subject, from that time to the present; and not until this period has the correctness of this construction, and of the corresponding practice of the Government, been questioned.

In a report to the Senate, made by the present Secretary of the Treasury at the last session of Congress, he remarked that, according to a construction adopted by Mr. Hamilton, "the Treasury, into which the money was to be eventually paid, as the chief pecuniary agent of the Government, could waive its right to specie, and could consent to receive the notes of State banks, when deemed by it in all respects equivalent to specie; and by the joint resolution of Congress in 1816, which impliedly gave some sanction to this original practice, by prohibiting the Treasury Department longer to receive the notes of State banks not paying specie, and which it had in the great emergencies of the war allowed to be taken for public dues. The clause of the joint resolution of 1816, not forbidding the receipt of notes of State banks paying specie, has not been understood as amounting to an express grant of power, making those State notes a tender for public dues; else the explicit favor granted to the United States Bank notes alone would have been nugatory."

Mr. Crawford, in 1817, after the establishment of the United States Bank, issued circulars prohibiting United States officers from receiving any bills which will not be received by them and credited as cash. And why was this? It will be recollected that, by the 16th section of the charter, the money of the United States was to be deposited in the bank and its branches. This charter had been accepted, and the corporation had gone into operation under it, and was bound to receive in deposit the money, the legal currency, of the country; but among its first acts, as I have before said, was an unconditional refusal to receive on general deposit the bills of State banks, even the bills of those State banks payable and paid on demand in specie. It results from this fact, that the Bank of the United States considered that the bills of local banks, be their character ever so good, were not money, were not legal currency, which they were bound to take in deposit; and hence this circular of Mr. Crawford became necessary.

In 1826 Mr. Rush extended this indulgence to certain enumerated State banks, not to all the specie-paying banks of the country, but to certain specified banks; but enjoined that, "as the receipt of any of the local or State bank notes may be discontinued at any time, without previous notice, it will be well for those who have payments to make to provide themselves with specie, or notes of the United States Bank or its branches, to guard against any change that may be found proper in regard to the notes of the local or State banks."

If that joint resolution of 1816 was imperative and obligatory, it is somewhat surprising that it should have received such a commentary from the head of the Treasury Department.

Mr. Taney, the late Secretary of the Treasury, issued a circular, dated March 26, 1834, in which he says:

"Reports occasionally reach Washington, unfavorable to the credit of particular State banks. Many of these rumors are, no doubt, without foundation; but it is the duty of public officers to be continually watchful of the public interests, and it therefore is expected that you will be careful to receive the notes of no banks except such as are in good credit, and pay specie promptly for their notes when presented; and you are to receive none except such as the bank in which you deposit will agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash; and, in order to remove all possible grounds of controversy or complaint, you will immediately, on the receipt of this letter, obtain from the bank in which you deposit a list of the State banks whose notes they will consent to receive and pass to the credit of the United States as above mentioned." Repudiating the idea that receivers were bound, at all events, to take the notes of all specie-paying banks in payment; but the United States Bank formerly, and the deposit banks since, should have the selection "of those whose notes should be received on account of the revenue."

If this joint resolution was absolutely binding, it is difficult to account for the fact that it has never been observed, but has been disregarded universally, by the fiscal agents of the Government, without calling forth any action of Congress. If it was a right secured to specie-paying banks, it is wonderful that not one of those numerous institutions has ever presumed to lay its grievances before Congress, that the agents of the Government had refused to receive its paper in payment of customs or of lands, which they were bound to do under the joint resolution of 1816.

I cannot, then, consider the order of the 11th July last as illegal—as against the material binding provisions of the resolution of the 30th April, 1816. I cannot regard the issuing of that order as any assumption of power on the part of the President. And, for aught I see, the order must stand, unless the President shall see fit himself to withdraw it; or unless Congress, by its own legislation, shall take away the foundation upon which that order rests—shall pass some law that shall render the order itself inoperative.

In reference to the policy and expediency of that measure, I am free to admit that a great diversity of opinion is entertained by different portions of the business community. The President says that he directed the issuing of the order with a view to the safety of the public funds, and to the interests of the people generally. No man, unless familiarly acquainted with the state and condition of the banks which had in deposit the public funds, the practices of those institutions with reference to the facilities furnished to the purchasers of the public domain, the amount of the actual sales of the public lands, and the means used in making these acquisitions from time to time, could determine the policy, expediency, or necessity, of such an order as that which was issued on the 11th of July last.

The reasons which induced the President to direct the issuing of the specie circular, are given in the circular, and in the message, and in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. It seems to me they were reasons in no way conflicting with the constitution or the law. Certainly some of the very reasons had been urged by gentlemen on the other side during the last session of Congress. To save the public domain from passing into the hands of speculators, to prevent an improper use of the public funds in deposit, to check the issues of over-trading banks, and to save the property of the nation, were among the reasons which induced the Executive to send forth the specie circular. And these very considerations were reiterated time and again on this floor in the course of the last session, in relation to the security and safety of the money of the nation then deposited in the State banks.

The President, then, was bound, if the reasons stated were founded in fact, to issue this order, which was to effect the very objects so much desired at the last session—the safety the public funds, and the preservation of the public domain. The order could never have been issued from any political considerations—from any desire for individual popularity: every man must have known that its political effect would have been precisely that which has been produced. Higher considerations than a thirst for personal popularity, or for political distinction, must have prompted the President to have issued this order. It was nothing less than a settled conviction that the public interest demanded the measure. He designed it as a mere temporary expedient; and it remains now for Congress to decide whether any thing, and, if any thing, what, shall be done in relation to this matter.

I am not, Mr. President, however, so much in favor of an exclusive metallic currency, that I am prepared, at the present time, to agree to any proposition which shall in effect legislate bank paper out of circulation. I do not believe that it would be wise to establish an exclusive metallic currency as the settled, fixed, and determined policy of this Government. The country is not prepared for such a revolution in its circulating medium. The true interests of the community require that all such changes should be gradual and progressive. Any violent and extraordinary alteration in the currency of a country will invariably bring embarrassment, confusion, distress, and ruin. I am not, therefore, for any great alterations at the present time, although I am for adopting such an arrangement as will bring into circulation more specie, and put out of circulation all bank paper of a small denomination. I shall with great readiness, Mr. President, come in aid of any proposition which shall have for its object the introduction of more specie, and of less paper, among us. But, to my mind, the time has not arrived when the currency should be exclusively metallic. The whole amount of specie in our country is inadequate for the transaction of its necessary business. Even the three hundred millions of banking capital, in addition thereto, is regarded as insufficient.

The amendment proposed by the Senator of Virginia must produce some good effect; it will, in a measure, exclude from circulation bank paper of a less denomination than five dollars. As far as it goes, it has my approbation, and will receive my support, in case the mover will so modify his proposition as to prohibit the deposit banks from exercising a power over the currency, which should be reposed in the Treasury Department. The principle set forth in the amendment I approve; and that is, to improve the currency by bringing into circulation more specie. But it would be altogether ineffectual, so long as the States shall exercise the power of incorporating local banks, for Congress to attempt to prohibit the issues of such banks. All that we can do we will do, and that is, to attempt to improve the character of such a paper currency, by refusing to receive in payment bills of a small denomination. But, Mr. President, if I have a correct understanding of the positions of the Senator from Ohio, upon the subject of banking operations in the West, there certainly was at least one good reason for the issue of the specie circular—to check the excessive issues of their local bank paper.

The Senator says "that the banks do not issue their notes upon the specie in their vaults. The notion is utterly fallacious; it is the staple produce of the country which those bank notes purchase; it is the pork and flour of the West, the cotton and sugar of the South, that is the true capital on which the banks make their issues." "The business of the country could not be transacted if the issues of bank paper were based on gold and silver alone."

I live in a wool-growing country; and that article, for some years past, has constituted one of the principal sources of business operations. It annually adds to the substance of our farmers, and it furnishes to the merchant the means of making his remittances; but I never supposed or believed that this staple of my country was the basis upon which our local banks make their issues. I live in the immediate vicinity of banks whose capital exceeds half a million of dollars, and I entertain no doubt that, in the places where those institutions are situated, there is annually disbursed more than one half of the capital of those banks in the purchase of wool; and the paper of those banks is issued within a period of 90 days, to purchase and to pay for this amount of that article; but no human being connected with the banks ever calculated on the value of the material itself for the redemption of their paper, or did the banks ever issue their paper upon such a capital. No, sir, their reliance was on the gold and silver in their vaults, on their specie funds; but more than all on the intrinsic value of the discounted paper; and whenever banks undertake to issue paper to pass current as money, equivalent to specie, based on no metallic capital, but upon the produce of the country—upon the pork and flour of the West—and to rely, for the redemption of their paper, upon the sales of such produce, sooner or later, by the fluctuations of trade, the sudden depressions of the staples of our country, such banks must experience severe losses, if not an entire prostration.

I repeat it, sir, and I appeal to every man conversant with banking for the correctness of my position, that the solvency and security of banks must depend essentially upon the intrinsic value of its discounted paper, in connexion with its specie funds, which ordinarily amount to one third of its whole circulation. Some bank, peculiarly circumstanced, and possessing great facilities and extraordinary privileges, may have within its control specie equal to its whole circulation, but not equal to its whole liabilities. The banks of New England, on an average, do not possess a specie capital within their control, or specie funds, exceeding one third of the whole amount of their paper circulation and actual liabilities; but they rely for their solvency on the worth of the debts due to them, on the intrinsic value of their discounted paper; and every man conversant with banking must know that it is a safe reliance, and that a bank doing business upon the principles I have stated can never be so embarrassed as to put in jeopardy its own bank notes.

The Secretary of the Treasury has, as usual, received his full share of abuse for his supposed connexion with, and participation in, the order of the 11th of July. It remains yet to be ascertained whether the act shall receive the approbation or disapprobation of the American people. I leave the matter with them: the issue is made up—the reasons for and against the measure have been set forth—let judgment be rendered. In the decision of that tribunal to which the Executive has so successfully and so triumphantly appealed on former occasions, he will most cheerfully acquiesce.

Treasury Circular.

But the attacks which have been made upon the Secretary of the Treasury, pending this debate, have not been confined to the specie circular. His want of judgment, of financial skill, of tact, and of talent, have been made most clearly to appear (as has been said) in his estimate of the receipts and expenditures for the year 1836, as presented in his official report at the commencement of the last session of Congress. This charge has become somewhat stale, worn out by its long-continued use. These reiterated attacks upon that officer establish one fact beyond all possibility of doubt—that the gentlemen who make these charges consider that they are contending with no ordinary enemy, but with an enemy talented, powerful, and, if not invulnerable, certainly not easily vanquished.

At the last session I attempted to show how these extraordinary receipts had found their way into the Treasury. I then stated, and I now believe, that the fact itself of there being a most extraordinary amount received during the current year, is no evidence of want of sagacity or judgment in making and presenting the estimates as they were made and presented in 1835. If the Secretary had then presumed to have estimated twenty-four millions as the probable amount which would be received in the course of the coming year from the sales of the public lands—if he had estimated that twenty millions would be received from customs, and Congress, relying on that estimate, had proceeded to make appropriations accordingly, and it had turned out that no greater sum than usual had been received from the sales of lands, or from the duties on imports, what would the gentlemen then have said? They would have denounced him indeed as a visionary statesman, and in whom no confidence should be reposed. Such estimates, founded on no facts, but the result of mere conjecture, would have justly exposed him to the charge of rashness and of folly.

What is the course to be pursued by a prudent, calculating, sensible, and discreet officer, at the head of the Treasury Department, in presenting his estimates of receipts and expenditures?

He is to ascertain what had been the actual receipts in former years; whether they had increased beyond the natural increase which would result from an increase of the population of the country; and if so, to study the causes of such an increase, and to make up his estimates of receipts with reference to the population and condition of the country. It is, after all, but an estimate; it cannot be regarded as fact; it is in a measure conjectural, and the Secretary is greatly abused for guessing so badly. But the honorable Senator from South Carolina, in his report upon executive patronage, fell into the same error. He under-estimated the receipts from the sales of the public lands as well as from customs. If I am not mistaken, it will be found that the extraordinary amount received from the sales of the public lands was received from mere private entries, and were not the proceeds of the public sales. How was it possible for the Secretary to know, or even to conjecture, who would purchase, and what amount would be purchased, of the public land at private sale, within a given period? Things, I believe, had gone on in the usual mode up to July or August, 1835; and then speculation began to break forth. It will be found that there was no very unusual increase until August of that year. The Secretary is now obliged to make up his estimate a month sooner than was formerly practised, and at a time when he could not have received the whole returns of October; and although he does estimate the proceeds at a half of a million more than usual, yet I am free to admit that the estimate falls far short of the reality; but, in making this admission, I cannot see that thereby any fault, any want of discernment, any want of foresight, of calculation, or of judgment, is chargeable upon the Secretary of the Treasury. It will appear that the actual receipts of the fourth quarter, ending with December, in 1834, from lands and customs, were but five and one third millions; while those for the last quarter of 1835 were about eleven and one third millions; and not so much land was advertised within the last as within the first period. The sales of lands in that quarter ran up to five and a half millions—a sum exceeding the whole sales of any one year since 1820. In December alone the sales amounted to two and one third millions, when usually not over half a million sold in that month. And, in relation to the receipts from customs, I might add, that the destruction by fire, in New York, of some seventeen millions of merchandise, rendered fresh importations necessary, which greatly increased the receipts from that source of revenue, and which could not have been considered by the Secretary. I cannot believe that in November, 1835, with all the lights then cast upon this subject, that the gentleman from South Carolina himself could or would have anticipated such an extraordinary amount of revenue. But it is enough for me to say, that the Secretary of the Treasury, in making his estimates of receipts for the year 1836, was governed, in a measure, by the actual receipts of former years from the same sources. But whoever calculates the receipts of any subsequent year by the actual receipts of the year 1836, will find that he has committed a greater and a more hazardous error than has been committed by the present Secretary.

The manner of executing the deposit bill of the last session is also made a matter of grave charge against the Secretary; and the pecuniary distress which now exists in our commercial cities (and I am most willing to agree that it is most severe) has been here and elsewhere charged upon the Secretary, as the unavoidable effect of the manner of his executing that bill. Now, Mr. President, I think I shall find little difficulty in showing that the Secretary could not have done less, without a violation of the law, and without wholly disregarding the state of public opinion, and the just expectations of the community. It was the forbearance of the Secretary which has saved, if not the banks themselves, certainly the commercial and mercantile community, from severer trials, embarrassments, and sacrifices. The Secretary could not have done less; he might have done more; and the few failures which have occurred in our commercial cities, in carrying into effect the provisions of the deposit bill, are evidence of the high character, resources, and responsibilities, of our mercantile community.

It was early alleged that the Treasury Department would not execute the deposit bill; that, under some pretence or other, the Secretary would delay carrying into effect its provisions, and thereby frustrate the just expectations of the people. These allegations were made and reiterated after the adjournment of Congress, because the money was not immediately removed from those places where too much had accumulated, to points where there was little or none of the public funds.

The act to regulate the deposits of the public money was approved on the 23d of June last, and it is a fact well known, that on the following day the Secretary of the Treasury commenced a correspondence, having for its object the selection of additional banks for the deposit and keeping of the public money. It was manifestly the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury "to select, as soon as may be practicable, and employ as the depositories of the money of the United States," such new banks as may be located at adjacent or convenient to the points or places at which the revenues may be collected or disbursed, requiring him, at all events, to select at least one bank in each State and Territory, if one can be found willing to be employed as a depository of the public money; and the act requires that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not suffer to remain in any deposit bank an amount of the public moneys more than three fourths of the amount of its capital stock actually paid, for a longer time than may be necessary to make the transfers, for purposes of equalisation; and in the event of too great an accumulation of deposits in any bank, such transfers shall be made to the nearest deposit banks which are considered safe and secure."

Such were some of the provisions of the bill regulating merely the deposits of the public money in the deposit banks.

The Secretary was then obliged, as soon as practicable, to select in the different States the additional deposit banks made necessary. He was not at liberty to postpone or to delay this service. The act was imperative; for the great and leading argument urged in favor of this bill was, that such an accumulation of the public money at particular points, and in particular banks, was exposing to hazard the public funds; and he was, therefore, in the most explicit manner, required "not to suffer a greater amount of the public money than a sum equal to three fourths of the capital of any deposit bank to remain in such deposit bank, but at once to remove such excess to other places of deposit, for the purpose of equalisation."

The duty enjoined upon the Secretary, under these provisions of the deposit bill, was clear and explicit, and that duty was promptly met and faithfully performed. The banks were selected with as little delay as possible; and the document now on the table will show how early these transfers were made for the purpose of equalisation, and to prevent any bank retaining in deposit, of the public money, an amount beyond three fourths of its capital, "for any longer time than was necessary." So much for the charge made against the Secretary at the time for neglecting to execute the deposit bill.

But when the money began to be moved, after the additional deposit banks had been selected, and after due notice had been given to those banks which then held in deposit, of the public money, an amount beyond three fourths of their capital, that they must prepare to make the requisite transfers, then, forsooth, a universal hue and cry was raised against the Secretary, for making any removal of any portion of the public money, until the 1st day of January; alleging that it was arbitrary and oppressive on the part of the Secretary, not required by the letter or by the spirit of the act; and that such an unreasonable proceeding would produce unnecessary distress among the banks, and the unavoidable ruin of thousands of our mercantile community. Thus blowing both hot and cold: blaming the Secretary for his pretended acts of omission, and for his real acts of commission. Under the provisions of the act to which I have referred, the Secretary doubted whether he should have the power, before the 1st day of January, 1837, to remove from particular points in any one State where there should be accumulated a great excess of the public money to any place beyond the limits of such State; and so settled was the public mind as to the course to be pursued in such a case, and so decided was the public sentiment, that no sooner were those doubts known to exist, than Congress passed the act "supplementary to the act to regulate the deposits of the public money," which provides "that nothing in the act to which this is a supplement shall be so construed as to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from making transfers from banks in one State or Territory, to banks in another State or Territory, whenever such transfers may be required, in order to prevent large and inconvenient accumulations in particular places, or in order to produce a due equality and just proportion, according to the provisions of said act."

The Secretary was bound, then, according to the plain English of these two acts, without delay, to set himself about removing from one set of banks, which then held of the public money an amount beyond three fourths of their capital, about eighteen and one third millions of dollars, and to deposit this in various other banks in the different States; and to this may be added twenty-two millions, collected since the passage of the bill. All this was to be done independent of those provisions of the act which required that the surplus in the Treasury on the 1st of January, above five millions, should be deposited with the several States. The money, on the passage of the deposit bill, which was on deposit in banks in the city of New York, could not be left in that city, because the money then there, and what was there collecting monthly from imports, would make an aggregate exceeding three fourths of their whole banking capital. There was in deposit in that city, on the 23d of June last, about thirteen millions; there is collected ordinarily from customs, about one and a quarter million each month. Their whole banking capital does not, it is believed, exceed eighteen millions. The Secretary, then, could not, without a direct violation of his duty, have suffered this amount of money there to remain, even if every banking company in that city had been willing to have been employed as a depository. I have stated that the Secretary found it necessary, in the discharge of his duty, to remove about eighteen and one third millions of dollars. This very operation is cause enough for the pressure which exists in our great commercial cities. No one at all acquainted with business, but must admit that every dollar of this money had been loaned by one set of banks to their customers; and the process of transferring made it necessary to collect from those customers, for those banks, in order that it might be removed to another set of banks. This was a real and important money transaction. It was not an affair which could have ordinarily been done without an actual collection of the money from the debtors of the deposit banks. By the deposit bill itself, the banks which held the public money were required to pay interest on all over one fourth of the money in deposit; and it must, then, have been fairly presumed that the money of the Government which had been placed in the deposit banks was out on loan. The fact was so; and, as I have before said, the very process of collecting from one set of customers at one set of banks, and paying over to another, furnishes cause enough for the prevailing pressure.

Who does not recollect the complaint made by the Bank of the United States in 1833, for the removal of the deposits from that institution, less by one half in amount than changed places under the late act of Congress? Who does not recollect the pretended distress and ruin which was alleged to be the consequence of that act of removal, when even the actual amount then taken from the Bank of the United States was not removed at once, but only as needed to pay warrants? Where there were great excesses of the public money in any State, as in New York, Louisiana, and Mississippi, it was expected that the Secretary would at once remove such excesses to other States having little or none of the public money. While those States had millions upon millions, New Jersey and Delaware had none; and beyond all question it was this sentiment which produced the supplemental act. It was then the bounden duty of the Secretary to take from those points where it had accumulated too much, and to put the money where there was a deficiency. He would have been false to his duty, he would have failed to have answered public expectation, if he had not done this. He was bound to make these transfers and these changes as gradual and as easy, and in a way to produce as little sudden fluctuation as possible. To make them, he was under an imperative obligation. But the deposit bill has other important provisions, imposing other and different duties and obligations upon the Secretary of the Treasury. He was required to make an equalisation of the public money among the States, and to collect and to pay over to the States (with the exception of five millions) what should be in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1837. He was, in truth, to prepare to apportion among the States nearly forty millions of dollars; and on the 1st of January he was to deposit one fourth of the sum with the States, in proportion to their representation in both Houses of Congress; and the whole surplus then in the Treasury was to be transferred on or before the 1st day of October from the deposit banks, and placed with the several States; and this part of the duty of the Secretary has been commenced and prosecuted with as little embarrassment as possible to the commercial and mercantile community. The distribution has not yet all taken place; far different. From what has been said, here and elsewhere, one would naturally infer that the Secretary of the Treasury had actually removed to the several States their respective proportions of the surplus which would be in the Treasury on the 1st of January next. Let us for a moment see how this matter is. There is now in New York an excess of six millions; and when Congress adjourned, New York had in deposit nearly thirteen millions. Upon the basis of dividing among the States thirty-seven millions, she would be entitled to retain only a little over five millions. She has now in deposit, as appears from the last returns, eleven millions and six hundred thousand dollars. New York, then, has not been depleted. The collections there made for customs have very nearly kept pace with the transfers which have been ordered from that city.

There is now an excess in Massachusetts of over a million; she has received $300,000 more than she had when the bill passed, and she then had $300,000 more than her share of thirty-seven millions. In Louisiana there is an excess of over three millions; in Mississippi one and a half; in Missouri over a million; in Alabama, Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, there are now excesses of the public money, as will appear by an examination of the table appended to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury. On the 23d of June last, eighteen out of the then twenty-four States had less of the public money in deposit, within their limits, than they would be entitled to have under the provisions of the deposit act; while New York, Massachusetts, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, and Alabama, then had and now have excesses; and not a single one of the eighteen, by transfers, has yet received its proportion of the thirty-seven millions. The Secretary clearly had the power to fill up and equalise the whole; his forbearance alone has saved, as I have remarked, if not the banks themselves, certainly many of the commercial community, from entire ruin. For I am most free to admit that the present distress and pecuniary pressure is most severe. What would have been the consequences if the Secretary had caused to be transferred the whole thirty-seven millions, can better be imagined than described.

I have said that Ohio and Indiana have now an excess. The fact is so; and it arises from the sales of the public lands in Indiana. The nearest deposit banks to Indiana are those in Ohio. The banks in Indiana, and they are all employed, have now an excess beyond the proportion of that State of nearly a million. The Secretary was bound to make transfers, from time to time, from those banks, and hence it accounts for some of the transfers to, and deposits in, Ohio.

Upon the basis of depositing thirty-seven millions with the States, from the last returns, it will appear that Maine is deficient in the sum of

New Hampshire	-	-	-	$700,000
Vermont	-	-	-	250,000
Connecticut	-	-	-	700,000
New Jersey	-	-	-	250,000
Pennsylvania	-	-	-	460,000
Virginia	-	-	-	1,080,000
North Carolina	-	-	-	1,600,000
South Carolina	-	-	-	1,200,000
Georgia	-	-	-	400,000
Tennessee	-	-	-	800,000
				1,580,000

And that Rhode Island, Delaware, Illinois, Arkansas, Maryland, Kentucky, are also deficient, which deficiencies make an aggregate of more than ten millions; and at the same time, of the five millions left in the Treasury, not less than three and a half would ordinarily be required in the States above named.

The Secretary has begun gradually, proceeded gradually, and will accomplish gradually, the deposits among the States. The whole cannot be completed until the 1st of October, 1837; more than half will have to be done after the 1st of January.

It has been said, by way of objection to the course of the Secretary of the Treasury, that all this should have been done by keeping the whole money in the great commercial cities until wanted. That officer would have been faithless in the performance of his public duty had he so done. The deposit bill was passed to remove such great accumulations of the public money to places of greater security. This was an argument repeatedly urged in favor of the bill. It was alleged that so great had been the accumulation at particular points, that the public money in some of the deposit banks was insecure. It was matter of constant complaint, that immense amounts were in New York and Boston, giving to them great and exclusive privileges in the use of the Government funds. It was contended that the money should be carried home to the respective States in just proportions, and there deposited, for the use of the people from whom it was collected and to whom it belonged. And I again repeat that the Secretary was bound to make the transfers with all reasonable despatch. He has done it; and in doing this he has done but his duty. And when the present excitement shall have passed away, and men shall consult their reason more, and their passions less, I hazard nothing in saying that the deliberate judgment of the community will be, that, in the execution of the deposit bill, the Secretary has done no more than his duty.

These transfers from the great depots, from our commercial cities, could not fail to produce disorder and embarrassment in exchanges, and pressure in the money market, among business men. It was anticipated. I well recollect, on my way home in July last, that the very consequences which have taken place were then represented as effects which must result from the execution of the deposit bill. It was said that it could not be otherwise; that the commercial cities which had received the money, and which had loaned the money, would be obliged to collect the money for other places, and thus a sensible embarrassment would be thereby unavoidable. But is that of itself any reason why Delaware and Tennessee, Kentucky and New Jersey, New Hampshire and Vermont, should not have their portion of the public money, as well as New York, Louisiana, Massachusetts, and Mississippi?

It was far better for the merchants themselves to part with the money by degrees, to commence before January. It has been said (with a view of showing that an unnecessary pressure has arisen from the manner of executing the deposit bill) that the United States Bank paid the national debt without any distress. That is by no means a parallel case; but even that was not done without some time and indulgence being extended to that institution. That debt was paid as it was due, in the great cities, and not in the interior. But portions of it have been just as well paid by the deposit banks since 1833, as by the Bank of the United States prior to 1833. But the two cases are unlike. Deposits with the States are not to be paid to creditors in our great cities, but to States at a distance, and in the interior; and hence the cause of the existing pressure and derangement. But the main, the moving, the original cause of all the pecuniary distress which has occurred, may be traced to the excessive surplus in the Treasury. It was the fact that our Government had thirty or forty millions of dollars unemployed in the deposit banks, not required to meet the necessary wants of the Government; it was this great accumulation of money, this enormous amount of unappropriated funds, that induced speculation and over-trading. The national debt had been fully discharged. The compromise act led to the belief that the tariff would remain undisturbed; that of course the receipts from customs and from lands would greatly exceed the public expenditures. This state of unexampled and unprecedented national prosperity, these extraordinary resources of the country, have produced one of the most extraordinary revolutions in the business of the country which has taken place since the close of the Revolution.

Within the last eighteen months the capital of the country has, to a certain extent, taken a new direction. It has changed hands; it is no longer under the control of our commercial and mercantile community, a community which is now more severely and intensely suffering from the pressure than any other class. I say that it was the surplus in the Treasury, it was the amount of unemployed public money, which has brought this evil upon us; which has induced every species of speculation; which has quickened the zeal, animated the spirit, and put in requisition all the active energies of the adventurer. The history of the times shows that there have been most unprecedented speculations and over-trading. Speculations not in the public lands only, but in stocks, in banks, in railroads, in canals, in lots, in every thing that the wit of man could devise. This mania for speculation has pervaded our whole country; it has reached the villages of New England; and but few individuals have entirely escaped from its influence.

In addition to this, the course pursued by some of the banks themselves has contributed to bring about the present state of things. The means of those institutions have been employed, not as usual, in the transaction of the regular business of our mercantile community, but in the shaving of notes, exchanges, and stocks. The seven or eight millions of the money of the Government now in the Bank of the United States, it may be presumed, has been in active use in that way. To these may be added the great pressure now existing in the money market of England, which has produced its effects here. In my judgment, these have been among the causes which have aided in producing the present state of things. It is to be hoped that it will only be temporary; it is to be hoped that the crisis has already passed; that the good sense, the high intelligence, the pure patriotism of our commercial and mercantile community, will be able to bring to a speedy end this unexampled, this most extraordinary, this violent pecuniary pressure in our cities. It has been said that the pressure is not as great as is represented. I know it to be most severe. When the best notes in our cities are sold at a discount, and sold so as to yield an interest of two, three, and even four per cent. per month; let no one say that the pressure is mere pretence. It is an awful and cruel reality. It is but the effect of our own policy. If we had left in the pockets of the people the money not wanted for the ordinary uses of the Government, if we had prevented the accumulation of such an enormous surplus, if we had been compelled annually to contract loans to meet current expenditures, business would not have been diverted from its accustomed channels, wild speculation would not have stalked through our land, and the present pressure and distress would not have been felt. We should, Mr. President, now unite in preventing the repetition of the evil, by removing its cause. The surplus found in your Treasury was the original cause of the present pressure. It was our acts of the last session which were auxiliary in bringing about the present state of things. I know that it is very convenient to make the organs of Congress (while faithfully, but so bearingly, executing the laws) scapegoats, not only for the effects of those laws, but for all the improvidence, rashness, over-trading, and speculation, of Europe as well as of America.

I have nothing further to add, in answer to the charge made against the Secretary, for the course pursued by him in the execution of the deposit bill. I should not have troubled the Senate with any remarks, had I not wished to avail myself of this opportunity to speak of that measure. I gave my vote in favor of that bill, and I have reason to believe that that vote has received the decided sanction of the yeomanry of New Hampshire. The bill passed both Houses of Congress by unexampled majorities, and yet the minority in the Senate, as well as in the House of Representatives, comprise some of our most distinguished statesmen and purest patriots. The bill, as it passed, was most emphatically and most truly nothing more nor less than a bill for the regulation, deposit, and safe keeping of the common treasure of the whole country. There is no room for doubt, with respect to the character of that measure. The thirteenth section of that bill, among other things, provides that the States receiving their proportion of the surplus shall pledge their faith "to pay the said moneys, and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of defraying any wants of the public Treasury." Whatever may be the practical operation of this measure, it was regarded at the time in no other light than a bill to regulate the local banks, having the public money in deposit, and to transfer from those banks portions of the common fund to places of greater security, the respective treasuries of the several States. I cannot believe that among those then belonging to the Senate, who gave to this bill their support, there was a single individual of the number, who would for a moment countenance the idea of taxing, directly or indirectly, the people for the purpose of distributing money to the people. I never could have yielded my assent to any such principle; and, in voting for the deposit bill, no Senator could believe that he was thereby yielding his assent to any such doctrine. I hold it to be subversive of the very foundation upon which rests our representative Government. Such a principle is opposed to the best and purest feelings of patriotism; to the letter, the spirit, the genius, of our free institutions. I never could have given my vote for this bill as a distribution bill. This character has been most unjustly given to this measure here and elsewhere. The Senator from Mississippi is mistaken if he supposes that it is so understood by the great body of the people of the States. The legislative act of

New Hampshire shows most clearly the sentiments of that State with reference to this measure. She has voted to receive her portion of the money; but the legislation of that State has most sacredly guarded the principal as rightfully belonging to the United States; that while she considers herself justly entitled to the beneficial use of her portion of the surplus, so long as it shall remain uncalled for, she holds the principal to be of right the property of the General Government. It is true that New Hampshire by her act will deposit her share of the fund among the several towns of that State for safe keeping. But the State possesses the power, by her distress warrants, to enforce collection at any time, against any town which should neglect or refuse to pay when demanded; and the pending act subjects the town to indictment, in case any part of the principal of the money therein deposited should be used for any purpose; and the court are required to impose on such a town a fine equal to the part of the principal thus appropriated, and to issue execution against any such town, to be levied and collected in the usual mode. Thus had his own State managed in relation to this matter; and gentlemen may be assured that whenever occasion shall demand that any portion of this money should be returned to the national Treasury, for the use of the General Government, that State will promptly and properly comply with such a demand.

I did not consider that, when I gave my vote in favor of that bill, I was in effect making a donation to the several States. My purpose was merely to add to the places of deposit. To give to the States the use of a portion of the public money, instead of confining the use exclusively to the banks. It was not my purpose longer to leave all the public funds in the deposit banks, which were under the exclusive control of the Government. I knew full well that it was the earnest wish of the head of the Treasury Department to be relieved from the responsibility, the care and control of the public treasure; whatever might be said of the desire of this administration to exercise an unlimited dominion over the public purse, the Secretary of the Treasury himself was extremely solicitous to be delivered from that particular charge.

In voting for this bill, I gave in no assent to the policy of a systematic distribution—nothing could have been further from my mind. The money was on hand, and no regulation of the tariff could have any effect upon the accumulation then in the Treasury; no public or private appropriations, necessarily called for, could exhaust the fund. The question was, what shall be done with it? How can it be disposed of until the same shall be required? The question was answered—wisely, judiciously, and properly answered—by the passage of the deposit bill. The question now is, what can be done to prevent any further surplus? It is an important question—it should be well considered. For one, I would desire, in some way or other, to bring down the revenue to a point below the ordinary wants of the Government. I am one of those who believe that an economical expenditure of the public money can only be attained by being absolutely required, year following year, to devise ways and means to meet current expenses. It would be far better, for the peace and prosperity of the nation, to be obliged to borrow annually, rather than be obliged to tax our ingenuity how to dispose of surpluses. Our expenditure should never be forced to absorb our means. But means should be forced to meet our expenditure.

I have said, Mr. President, all that I wish to say upon the deposit bill of the last session, and upon the manner of its execution. And if the effects of this measure, and of the specie circular, shall be to check the spirit of speculation which is abroad in the land, to confine trade, commercial and mercantile enterprise, within their proper limits; if the effects shall be to render secure the public funds, and to preserve the public domain for the legitimate benefit of the General Government, then we shall not fail to rejoice at their adoption.

Mr. HUBBARD having concluded his remarks,

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, inquired whether he was to understand Mr. H. as including in his argument of justification the discrimination made in the order between citizens of different States of the Union, requiring of one class to pay gold and silver, and permitting the other to pay in the ordinary currency?

Mr. HUBBARD replied that he had not turned his attention to that point, considering it as having been sufficiently met in the able speech of the Senator from Missouri. [Mr. BENTON.]

Mr. MORRIS obtained the floor for to-morrow; and then

The Senate went into executive business; after which, The Senate adjourned.

UNEXPENDED APPROPRIATIONS.

After disposing of the usual morning business,

Mr. BENTON rose to move the printing of the document from the Treasury Department, which had been called for on his motion, and had come in a few days ago. It was a document showing the unexpended balances of appropriations which would remain in the Treasury on the 1st day of January next, the amount of each balance, the object to which it was applicable, and the date of the law by which the appropriation was made. It was the amplification and substantiation of that part of the President's message at the commencement of the session, in which he said that these unexpended balances were estimated at $14,636,062, exceeding by $9,636,062 the amount which will be left in the deposit banks, and which are outstanding appropriations, to be met by reimbursements from the States, if the revenue fell short of meeting them; and that this large amount unexpended was the effect of the lateness of the period at which the appropriations had been made. This fourteen and a half millions has been called a surplus, for which the Government has no use; and it would seem that some States, acting on this idea, were for treating the deposit act as a distribution law, and using the money deposited with them, as if the Government in reality had no use for it. Nothing (he said) could be more erroneous than this idea. This fourteen and a half millions were not a surplus, but appropriated money—appropriated too late to be used this year, but remaining applicable to its objects, under the act of 1795, for two full years after the year in which the appropriation was made. The document contains a detailed statement of each object, and in the list would be found objects belonging to every branch of the public service; and every State would find some objects near and dear to itself, and for which the State had been long soliciting. Among these objects, were the branch mints in the South and in New Orleans, the custom-houses in Boston and New York, the Treasury and Patent Offices in this city, many fortifications, roads, and block-houses, west of Missouri and Arkansas, half a dozen Indian tribes, and among them the Cherokee treaty, on which alone the balance was $4,245,000. This latter was a good specimen of the whole of these delayed appropriations, and illustrated the manner practised at the last session to create an unavoidable surplus. First, the ratification of the treaty was kept off to the last possible moment, and then all possible exertions made to defeat it; then the appropriation law under the treaty was kept off to the last possible moment, and then all possible efforts made to defeat it. Finally, on the 2d day of July, the appropriation passed; and then Mr.

John Ross, a true coadjutor of the surplus party, went home to prevent the Indians from receiving the money; and succeeded; and so saved this four millions and a quarter for distribution, as a part of that unavoidable surplus for which the States are told, and even Georgia herself is told, the Federal Government has no use! Now, there was some use for this four and a quarter millions. The United States would have to raise it otherwise, if she did not get it back from the States; for the compact with Georgia, made thirty-four years ago, and by which the United States obtained Alabama and Mississippi, will have to be carried into effect. And so of every object mentioned in the document. There were above two hundred of these objects, and money would have to be provided for carrying each of them into effect; for they were not of a nature to be abandoned; and this head of mine, (said Mr. B., putting his finger to his forehead,) this head of mine, as belonging to a member of the Finance Committee, was now occupied with this subject, and was considering how far duties could be reduced, and how far they would have to be kept up, and what tax otherwise unnecessary must be retained to supply the place of these fourteen and a half millions, if the deposit act is perverted by any of the States into a distribution law. Now, he wanted this fact carried home to the people of the States in such form that it could not be disputed. He would therefore move to have this document printed, and five copies sent to the Governor of each State, ten copies sent to each branch of the State Legislatures, and 1,000 extra copies be supplied to the Senate for its distribution.

Mr. CALHOUN rose to make a very few remarks on the very extraordinary motion of the Senator from Missouri, and to ask for the yeas and nays on the question. The sending out this paper in the manner proposed would make an erroneous impression on the minds of those to whom it would be sent, and would be an unusual departure from the ordinary practice of the Senate. Did not every Senator know that there was a large amount left in the Treasury, say five millions of dollars, by the deposit law of the last session, for the purpose of meeting these balances? Did not every Senator know that, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there were three millions of dollars of these appropriations that would not be wanted, and were therefore transferred to the surplus fund in pursuance of a standing law? And was there not, besides, a large sum in the hands of the disbursing officers of the Government? He knew (Mr. C. said) that every exertion would be made in order to defeat the deposit bill at this session. He knew well that the battle was yet to be fought—a battle in which the people would be on one side, and the office-holders and office-seekers on the other. While up, he would refer to the Committee on Finance, and make one remark in reference to the report of that committee on the bill introduced by him a few days since, and, much against his wishes, referred to them. They had reported against the bill, and it was not strange that they should do so, because a majority of that committee were three out of the six who voted against the deposit bill at the last session. But what he complained of was, that they had reported it without one single word of explanation; the chairman simply saying that he was instructed by the committee to move for its indefinite postponement. He would now ask the chairman on what grounds he had reported against this bill? Was it because the committee were satisfied that there would not be a surplus? If so, (said Mr. C.,) let us know it. I shall be glad to hear that such was their reason, because it is a debatable proposition. Was it because they would not have the surplus deposited with the States? If this was the case, it was directly contrary to the known sense of that body, expressed almost unanimously at the last session. He could scarcely believe that the committee reported against the bill on such grounds. With the denunciations of the President himself against the corrupting influence of a large surplus in the Treasury, and his declarations that the worst disposition that could be made of it was to let it remain in the deposit banks, he did suppose that the committee could not contemplate either result. He could not believe but that, from courtesy, the chairman would make such a report as would put the Senate in possession of the grounds on which the committee objected to the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT replied, that this was not a more distinct call than he had had on different occasions from the gentleman from South Carolina, for explanations in regard to subjects which had come under the consideration of the committee of which he (Mr. W.) was an humble member. It would save the Senate some time, if subjects were debated when they were under consideration before the Senate, and not incidentally and collaterally. For his own part, he should be willing to answer any questions, after a subject should have been before the committee, and come up for debate, in the best manner he was able. But he should not hold himself bound, at the call of any Senator, to enter upon a debate on the merits of any proposition not before the body, although it may have been reported upon by the committee. When the honorable Senator's bill should come before the Senate, then he would hold himself bound, as a member of the committee, to state the reasons which governed their acts, but not now, upon a question of printing a document that had no relation to the subject, and he hoped that he should not be considered by the Senator, and the Senate, as wanting in courtesy in not complying with the request made of him; for he had made it a rule of action to treat questions, independent in their character, at separate and distinct periods. This practice he had endeavored to carry out as far as possible, and he should do so now; and whether the course of the committee should be approved or disapproved, he hoped it might be decided when the bill came up, and not in an incidental manner.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that although he very much regretted that they were not to have a detailed report, yet he must be permitted to say that he thought the course of the committee a very unusual one. A bill of acknowledged importance, if he might judge from the President's message and report of the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the course of the Senate last session, was, after a full debate, referred to the Committee on Finance, because that committee was particularly constituted to advise on the subjects to which it related; yet that committee treated it as one of the most insignificant questions, and despatched it without a written report. This all might be very right, but it certainly was very extraordinary and unusual.

He had been there several years, both as presiding officer and as a member of the body, and he must say that this was the first time he had ever known a question to be put to the chairman of a committee, which he refused to answer. As a representative of one of the States of this Union, he must say that he had a right to an answer. The bill had gone to the committee, had received its disapprobation, and the committee ought to let them know the grounds on which they objected to it. If there was no surplus, let us (said Mr. C.) hear the committee say so. If there was one, then, said he, let us hear what objections the committee have to depositing it with the States. He made no complaints, but he must say that the course of the committee was very extraordinary.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that he was at all times in favor of giving to the people all the information which could be communicated to them, either through their

Governors or the Legislatures of the several States, in relation to every subject connected with the legislation of Congress; and he was the last man who would withhold information from his constituents, which could, by any possibility, give them any light upon the acts of their representatives.

He would request the Secretary of the Senate to read the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri. After it was read, Mr. H. remarked that the resolution was as he supposed; and he was entirely at a loss to know what was the particular object of his friend from Missouri, in that part of his resolution which required that five copies of the document referred to should be sent to the Governors, and that twenty copies of the same document should be sent to the Legislatures, of the several States. From the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, it seemed to him that this document was in some way or other to have some effect upon the deposit bill of the last session; but he could not see in what way the communication of these documents to the Legislatures could have any effect whatever upon their action on that bill. Congress has passed that bill; it was to take effect within a very few days—on the 1st day of January next. The money then in the Treasury was to be set apart, and to be taken, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, from the deposit banks, and transferred to the State treasuries for deposit and for safe keeping, in pursuance of the particular provisions of the bill itself.

The printing of the document may be useful to the Senate; it may be important to them, for their information and guidance with reference to the bill presented by the Senator from South Carolina, to continue in force the deposit bill. But it could not be of any practical benefit to the Legislatures of the States, in relation to the bill of the last session. Whether wisely or not, Congress had passed that bill, and the States were soon to receive the benefit of it; and he would suggest to the Senator the propriety of so amending his resolutions as to confine the printing for the use of the Senate, and not to require that printed copies of this document should be sent to the Governors and Legislatures of the several States. With a knowledge of what probably would be in the Treasury on the 1st day of January, as the unexpended balances of former appropriations are very great, and a decided majority of the Senate gave their votes in favor of the deposit bill of the last session, it certainly would not be difficult to show that this document fails to give correct information. The gentleman from Missouri, he presumed, could not desire to have this document communicated to the State Legislatures, unless he believed it would impart useful information to them. And, for one, he could not but believe that it was calculated to make an erroneous impression upon the public mind; to misguide and to mislead the action of those Legislatures in relation to that bill. Without saying more at this time, he did hope that the Senator from Missouri would amend his motion as had been suggested.

Mr. BENTON asked the Secretary to read the caption of the document. The Secretary read it; and Mr. B., inviting the attention of the Senate to the words of the caption, and that the 1st day of January next was the time to which the unexpended balances were computed, pointed out that this was exclusive of sums which might be in the hands of disbursing officers, and which, though still charged to them, might be all expended, and would be by the end of the quarter. The sums in the hands of disbursing officers was no fund to meet these fourteen and a half millions, but were intended to be expended by the last day of the present quarter. The five millions left in the Treasury will be a fund, as far as it goes, to meet the fourteen and a half millions; but nine and a half millions will still remain to be reimbursed by the States, or to be levied by taxes off the people. The objects are not of a nature to be dispensed with, and the money to complete them must be got somewhere. This is material information to give to the States, and to give to them now, while their Legislatures are occupied with the question of our deposit act, and some for treating it as a deposit, and some as a distribution. With this document before them, no State can treat it as a distribution; no one can look upon the deposit as money for which the Government has no use; but every one will see that there is indispensable need for it; and by looking at the date of each appropriation, they will see that this unavoidable surplus was forcibly created by keeping off appropriations until it was too late to expend them.

Every body knew that the struggle of the last session was to keep off appropriations, and that the organization of committees gave the opposition the power to keep them off. In this way, the unavoidable surplus was violently and forcibly produced. Several millions were defeated altogether: namely, the anticipation of the foreign indemnities, by which the United States would have bought four millions of gold, bearing an interest of 4 and 5 per cent.; the army increase bill was defeated; the new fortification bill defeated; the New Orleans custom-house; the bill for the purchase of the Louisville and Portland canal; and others, to the amount of six or seven millions. From the beginning to the end of the session, he stood upon the ground that, if the proper appropriations were made, and made in time to be used, there would be no more surplus than had often been in the Bank of the United States, without exciting the least alarm in the bosoms of those who could now see nothing but corruption, danger, and ruin, from the like sums in the ninety different banks which now hold the public deposits. The United States Bank often held fourteen, sixteen, or eighteen millions of public money, and not a word is said about corruption; not more than that amount would have remained in all the deposit banks, if the necessary appropriations had been made, and made in time to be used. He wished this document to go to the people of the States, that they might see these facts. He knew it was somewhat ungracious to ask this Senate, so many of whom had voted for the deposit act, to furnish this evidence of the error under which they legislated; but certain it is, that many of them voted for it as a deposit law, in fact as well as in name, and not as a distribution law, under a false title, in derision of the constitution. Such Senators should have no objection to sending this document to the State Legislatures, to let them see the objects for which a reimbursement of this money must be made, or unnecessary taxes kept up to supply its abstraction. But of one thing he was certain, whether the Senate sent the document to the States or not, it would go to the States. After this attempt to suppress it, all must desire to see it.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that he found the information which the gentleman from Missouri was so anxious to give the country was already before the Senate in a very authentic form. It was to be found in the table of estimates accompanying the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. He argued that, according to the assertion of the Secretary of the Treasury, who estimated the unexpended balances of appropriation at $14,636,062, the sum of $3,013,389 would not be wanted. The Senator, therefore, in sending out a document, setting forth that $14,500,000 were required for outstanding appropriations, would mislead the public, and make a false impression. Mr. C. contended that, taking the five millions which must be left in the Treasury, on account of the deposit act, from the eleven and odd remaining of the fourteen millions, together with the money at present in the hands of the disbursing officers, there would be funds enough on hand, within a small amount, to meet the outstanding appropriations. Now, when it was admitted by every one that the surplus which would be on hand at the end of the next year would amount to at least twenty-five millions of dollars, (and for himself he entertained no doubt that it would be thirty, unless the country should be disturbed by a war, or some other unforeseen catastrophe,) he would seriously ask, was there a Senator on that floor, of any party, who would say, in a time of profound peace, (for he would not call the Seminole war interrupting the peace of the Union,) and recollecting the fact that this administration came in as a reform administration, that a tax should be raised, or that the money distributed under the deposit bill, should be refunded in order to make extravagant appropriations? He (Mr. C.) could not believe it. He knew that attempts would be made to prevent the renewal of the deposit act, though he could not say that this was one of them. But let him tell gentlemen that these attempts would only produce a reaction, and end in their defeat.

Mr. C., in conclusion, adverted to the subject of a reduction of the revenue, and the necessity of bringing it down to the legitimate wants of the Government. He insisted that the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the consideration of this matter, were bound to show, in a satisfactory manner, either that there would be no surplus next year, or to admit the necessity of making an adequate reduction of the revenue.

Mr. BENTON said the document which had been read, to wit: the estimate of appropriations for 1837, was not unknown to him. He was no stranger to the document itself, or to the laws under which it was annually framed. One part of it, that of the estimates for the service of the ensuing year, was framed under an act as old as the Government; the other part of it, that which related to the unexpended balances, was more modern, and was framed under an act of 1820, to carry into effect more completely an act of 1795, relative to unexpended balances. This act of 1795 continues all appropriations in force for two full years after the year in which they are made; and at the end of those two years directs any balance that may remain to be carried to the surplus fund. The act of 1820 was to facilitate the understanding and use of these balances; and for that purpose it directed the Secretary of the Treasury to annex them to his annual estimate of appropriations, divided into three heads, according to the act of 1795; one head was to show what part of the unexpended balances of the expired year would be wanted in the first of the two next years, and what part in the second of them, and what part would not be wanted at all; and so would go to the surplus fund. Thus the unexpended balances are now, and, ever since 1820, have been shown in three columns, headed as directed by the eighth section of that act. Thus they stand in this estimate; and the amount under each head is, first, for the service of 1837, there will be wanted of these unexpended balances the sum of $11,427,480; for 1838, there will be wanted $3,013,389; and there will remain the sum of $195,183, which will not be wanted at all in either of the two years, and therefore will go to the surplus fund. The aggregate of these three sums makes the $14,636,062 mentioned in the President's message, and also in the document of the estimates; and the aggregate of the two first sums will make the amount in this second document which is now asked to be printed. In this document the third head or column is dropped, because the amount in it is no longer wanted; and the two heads in the first and second columns are united and made into one, because the object was to know how much of the appropriations were unexpended, and would be wanting in the next two years. This document shows that near fourteen and a half millions will be wanting, of which five millions remain in the Treasury, and about nine and a half go to the States. It is certainly desirable to the States to know at once that these nine and a half millions will be wanted in two years, and part of it the first year. This is the intimation in the President's message. Mr. B. read the passage:

"The unexpended balances of appropriation on the 1st day of January next are estimated at $14,636,062, exceeding by $9,636,062 the amount which will be left in the deposit banks, subject to the draft of the Treasurer of the United States, after the contemplated transfers to the several States are made. If, therefore, the future receipts should not be sufficient to meet these outstanding and future appropriations, there may be soon a necessity to use a portion of the funds deposited with the States."

Mr. B. said, here was a clear declaration that these unexpended balances were to meet these outstanding appropriations; and if the future receipts into the Treasury did not meet them, the States might soon be called upon for a part of their deposits. Now, here was a question, first for the Finance Committee, and afterwards for Congress. Would they keep up unnecessary taxes to meet these balances, or call upon the States to refund? He, for one, should be against keeping up the taxes for this object, and should be for calling on the States, and therefore would show them at once the specific objects for which the money was wanted.

Mr. B. read another passage from the President's message to show that these moneys must be refunded by the States, or taxes, otherwise unnecessary, must be kept up to supply their place; so that, in no event, could they be called and treated as an unavoidable surplus for which the Government has no use:

"No time was lost, after the making of the requisite appropriations, in resuming the great national work of completing the unfinished fortifications on our seaboard, and of placing them in a proper state of defence. In consequence, however, of the very late day at which those bills were passed, but little progress could be made during the season which has just closed. A very large amount of the moneys granted at your last session accordingly remains unexpended; but as the work will be again resumed at the earliest moment in the coming spring, the balance of the existing appropriations, and in several cases which will be laid before you with the proper estimates, further sums for the like objects may be usefully expended during the next year."

Mr. B. repeated, the Government has a use for this money, and a use so urgent, that she must raise it by taxation, if any of the States violate the deposit act, and hold on to the moneys as their portion of a distributive fund.

To make this matter too plain for mistake, too obvious for commentary, and too imperative to be disputed, Mr. B. would refer to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the annual estimates, and showing these unexpended balances, and expressly including them in his estimate for the service of 1837 and 1838. This is the letter referred to:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

December 6, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, for the information of the House of Representatives, an estimate of the appropriations proposed to be made for the service of the year 1837, amounting to - - $20,354,442 57

Viz:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous,	-	-	$2,925,670 62
Military service, including fortifications,	-	- armories, arsenals, ordnance, Indian affairs, revolutionary and military pensions, and internal improvements, $10,758,431 33

 Naval service, including the marine corps, - - - - - 6,670,340 62

To the estimates are added statements, showing,

1. The appropriations for the service of the year 1837, made by former acts, including arming and equipping the militia, civilization of Indians, revolutionary claims, revolutionary pensions under the act of 7th June, 1832, claims of the State of Virginia, gradual improvement of the navy, and public debt, - - - - - $2,347,000 00
2. The existing appropriations which will not be required for the service of the year 1836, and which it is proposed to apply in aid of the service of the year 1837, amounting to - - - 3,013,389 34
3. The existing appropriations which will be required to complete the service of the year 1836, and former years, but which will be expended in 1837, amounting to - - - 11,427,489 87

There is also added to the estimates a statement of the several appropriations which will probably be carried to the surplus fund at the close of the present year; either because the objects for which they were made are completed, or because these sums will not be required for, or will no longer be applicable to them, amounting to $195,183 64.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. JAMES K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

With these views of the subject, and these references to the President's message, and the Secretary of the Treasury's letter, Mr. B. held it to be well proved that the document which he proposed to have printed and sent to the States was not a false or deceptive paper, to mislead and confuse the public mind, but a document true and perspicuous, calculated to instruct and inform the public mind, and to save all good citizens from the danger of falling into the error of considering the moneys deposited with the States as an unavoidable surplus, for which the Government has no use, and which they may consequently treat as their own. This document, if printed, will save all good citizens from that error, and show them that the Government has actually appropriated a large part of the money deposited with them, and must get it back, or raise it again by taxes.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had certainly made no complaint of inaccuracy on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury. He presumed that his calculations were perfectly accurate; but what he complained of was, that the Senator from Missouri proposed to send out a document which was not correct, with a view to show the outstanding appropriations remaining unsatisfied. He maintained that the document was entirely pernicious, for it set forth what was not really the truth of the case; and all that he desired was that the public should not be deceived on the subject.

Mr. DAVIS had but one word to say in regard to this matter. If he understood this proposition, it was to give information to the States, to regulate their conduct in some legislation it was supposed they were about to be engaged in. It was information, therefore, of some importance, if it was to regulate the conduct of the States in that particular. But, then, if it be important, and is to be of service, it ought to go in a correct form. Now, how did the Senator from Missouri propose to send out this information? It was, that there was now an unexpended balance of appropriations of fourteen millions of dollars, and the inference was, that the money must be called back from the States to meet these balances when wanted.

Now, if this was a fact, the information had better be sent out; but if the tendency of it was to mislead every body, it ought not to be given. The President said that there was a balance of unexpended appropriations of fourteen millions of dollars, and when the five millions left in the Treasury by the provisions of the deposite law was deducted from the sum, then there would remain nine millions; and the President proceeds to say, that if there should be no money in the Treasury to meet this balance, then Congress must make some arrangement for that purpose. Now, he called upon the Senator from Missouri to show, and it was incumbent on him to do so, that there would be no money in the Treasury to meet these balances. Now, did the Senator from Missouri propose to show any such thing? No, he did not pretend to say that the receipts into the Treasury would not be sufficient to meet all demands. What was to be the consequence of sending abroad this document? Was it to create an alarm, and prevent the States from making use of the money placed in their hands? Was there any reason to suppose that there would be a deficiency of the revenue? Has your Secretary of the Treasury, asked Mr. D., said that there will be any deficiency of the revenue? No, sir, no such thing; he suggests the bare, naked fact, that there will be fourteen millions of dollars of unexpended appropriations of the last year. Well, what did the Senator from Missouri say in regard to the revenues of the country? Why, he chided and rebuked them all (and he took it very kindly, for he was subject to such rebukes) for staving off appropriations at the last session, and, in the end, withholding appropriations. Well, sir, (said Mr. D.,) I plead guilty to the charge; I was one of those who resisted the double and triple appropriations on the fortification bill, (and I see those around me who did the same,) and sleeping or waking I have never had occasion to regret the course I then took. Why, did the Senator know what were the actual expenditures of the last year? If he did not, he could know it by looking at the President's message and accompanying documents, and he would find that they amounted to thirty-two and some odd millions of dollars; and, if he understood matters, these fourteen millions were to be added to it—making forty odd millions appropriated last session. Sir, (said Mr. D.,) compare this with the appropriations of any other administration, and see what has been appropriated by the very reluctant Congress, who have been chided for staving off appropriations, and for withholding appropriations. Find, if you can, (said Mr. D.,) a parallel to this sort of extravagance. He was astonished that any Senator could rise in his place and indulge in such rebukes as the Senator from Missouri had, after the extravagant appropriations of the last session.

The Senator seemed to consider this a question, whether this money should lie in the Treasury, to be disposed of by the officers of the Government, on their responsibility, or go to the people of the States, from whom it came. This was the question that was made there last winter, and he, for one, never could hesitate how to vote on it. After some further remarks, Mr. D. said he thought some misapprehensions existed as to the information sent out from the two Houses of Congress. Did all these documents that were daily printed go to the poor and uninformed? They who stood there knew better. It was all a miserable farce; for long before they were sent out from there, they were printed and reprinted, and circulated all over the country.

As it had been customary to accede to the proposition to print an extra number of copies of any document asked for by an honorable Senator, he would not deny the Senator from Missouri the printing of the extra number of copies of this document; but he requested that the question as to printing, and as to the distribution of the copies when printed, might be taken separately.

Mr. BENTON replied to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] who had spoken of the large appropriations of the last year; but the gentleman had forgotten to mention two things, which would have spoiled the face of the large sum which he presented: first, that fourteen or fifteen millions of this sum were extraordinary growing out of Indian wars and Indian treaties; and, next, that fourteen and a half millions more were appropriated at so late a day that they could not be expended. Mr. B. knew that these large appropriations were to figure in speeches out of Congress, as well as in it, and, therefore, took care before the rise of the last session of Congress to have a document prepared at the Treasury to show each object of appropriation, so that the extraordinaries might be seen, and no one deceived by the exhibition of the large amount appropriated. That document nullified the cry of extravagance, so incidentally set up just before the presidential election; and this document that he now asked for would nullify, in like manner, the idea of the unavoidable surplus for which Government had no use, if he should be so fortunate as to get it printed and distributed through the States. The great error of the party to which the gentleman belonged was in acting upon a certain notion which possessed all their heads, namely, that the said party possessed all the learning, all the talents, all the wit, all the genius, all the religion, morality, civility, decency, and politeness, now extant in our America; for, in acting on this notion, they necessarily considered the people as having none of those valuable qualities, as they themselves possessed all; and, therefore, they could pass off any thing they pleased upon the Boeotian multitude. This error, though comfortable in itself, and so well calculated to keep a man on the best of terms with himself, had been the source of innumerable miscarriages to the gentleman's party, and would be the source of several more. This surplus conception would be one of them. All the work of the last session to create the surplus was distinctly seen by the country; every body knew that every branch of the public service was suffering for money, and clerks raising money at usurious interest to live on, and officers raising money on their own credit, while the two Houses of Congress resounded with the cry of surplus millions, and so many labored to stave off, cut down, and defeat appropriations, in order to create surpluses for distribution. Another great error was to suppose that immense popularity was to be gained now by pushing the system of annual distributions, and endeavoring to out-run, out-leap, and out-jump one another in the glorious race of making and dividing surpluses. But the people saw through it all, and despised it all, and went for a reduction of taxes, and no surplus. They knew that the whole business was unconstitutional, corrupt, and demoralizing; and had no idea of seeing it kept up, and a regular attempt made to pension the States as paupers upon the Federal Government. They knew the absurdity and insanity of raising money one year to be paid back the next; they knew, without having read it in a book, that the famous phrase put into the mouth of Queen Elizabeth by Lord Treasurer Burleigh, and which he himself took from Demosthenes, contains all the wisdom which can be taught on this head, namely, that the "pockets of the people are the cheapest and safest treasuries for keeping surplus moneys which the Government can have." They know this, and the squabbles, intrigues, collusions, and bargains, which they will soon see, for enabling the few to handle these surpluses, and the doubtful or political objects to which they will be applied, will soon disgust them with the whole scheme; and if this document can be printed, they will see in it, the people of each State will see in it, objects as meritorious, and as near and as dear to them, as any that can be devised for the application of the moneys in their own Legislatures.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said, of all the extraordinary discussions he had ever heard in that body, that of this morning was the most extraordinary. He would ask the Senator from Missouri what object, what aim, and what end, he proposed to accomplish by the motion he had made, and the speech he had delivered? If, said Mr. K., it is designed to operate on the deposite bill of the last session, it is a matter that has gone by, and is now before the country for good or for evil. For himself, he felt no reluctance in submitting to the judgment the country will pass on the measure. If it be to victimize those who, at the last session, took a view of that subject different from that taken by the honorable Senator, then his motion was properly accompanied by the remarks we have just heard; for, said Mr. K., the Senator from Missouri and myself differed as widely at the last session as we appear to do now. He entertained the opinion then, that there would be a large, very large, amount of money in the Treasury, which could not be appropriated, without resorting to such extravagant expenditures as no administration could even approach and retain the confidence of the country. He believed, in common with many others that he saw around him, and with whom he felt proud to act, that it was their duty to devise some plan by which the Treasury could be relieved from the excess of revenue, and those who administered the Government freed from the suspicion that it would be used to effect improper purposes. Well, sir, (said Mr. K.,) we believed that the best mode to effect those objects would be to deposite it with the people of the States from whom it had been unnecessarily drawn. We believed that, by this course, the friends of the administration were not only subserving the great interests of the country, but freeing it from the possibility of censure. Who will venture to assert (said Mr. K.) that the placing this money in the treasuries of the several States, to be used as, in the discretion of the State Governments, was best calculated to advance their interests, and subject to be returned whenever wanted for national purposes, was not a better and safer deposite for it, than to leave it with the deposite banks? Sir, said Mr. K., the bill passed, and passed with the strenuous opposition of the Senator from Missouri, who, no doubt, acted from the purest motives, and honestly believed that the money would be wanted to meet the expenditures of the General Government. Whether the Senator was right or wrong, I leave to the country to determine; but, (said Mr. K.,) while I am ready to give him credit for the purest motives in opposing the deposite bill, I will not consent to be held up to the American people as so unwise, so impolitic, and so unjust, as to lend myself to a system of distribution. Nor, sir, can it be charged upon me, or the political friends with whom I acted on that occasion, with the slightest semblance of correctness, that we endeavored to create a surplus for distribution, by delaying or withholding the necessary appropriations. Far from it; far from it. Sir, our appropriations nearly doubled the estimates from the various Departments at the commencement of the session. We knew that there was an overflowing Treasury, and we gave liberally; in most instances, more than could be expended; but the Senator complains loudly

Unexpended Appropriations.

that this was produced by delaying the appropriations. He would not stop to inquire whether such delay, if it did take place, resulted from the course pursued by the opponents of the administration, or from the various schemes (some of them certainly of a most extravagant character) which were pressed upon the attention of Congress. When was it ever known that all the appropriation bills were passed through both Houses at an early period of the session? But we are told that, not having passed bills in time to meet the expenditures of West Point, Harper's Ferry, and to pay the salaries of the clerks in the public offices, was evidence of a determination to create a surplus. Delays of this kind have frequently occurred since he had been a member of the Senate, and have, no doubt, always produced serious inconvenience to those whose pittance was thus withheld; but did any one ever before hear it gravely charged upon Congress that the object of this delay was to create a surplus? He (Mr. K.) would repeat that he had given his support to the most liberal appropriations; but, at the same time, had withheld his assent to propositions for squandering the revenue, based upon repeated calls to ascertain the maximum of expenditure. What was necessary to meet the proper and economical expenditures of the Government, he would never withhold; more he would not give, even at the risk of being charged with a design to create a surplus. Sir, said Mr. K., the republican doctrine, as he understood it, was to draw no more money from the pockets of the people than was required to meet the judicious expenditures of the Government; and if the revenue proved too great, reduce the taxes. Upon what principle, by what constitutional right, do you tax the people, and draw money into the Treasury not required to carry on the operations of the Government? He held there was no such legitimate power, and the exercise of it was a gross usurpation. But we may be told that the compromise bill, as it has been termed, stands in the way of reduction. He (Mr. K.) had voted for that bill, but imposed upon himself no obligation to hold sacred its provisions. He had so declared in his place. He had voted for it under a species of duress, arising from the peculiar situation in which a portion of our country was then placed. He had believed that it did not do justice to the extent we had a right to demand, but it was all which could then be obtained, and he had accepted it; nor would he now lightly disturb it. He believed that, by a reasonable reduction on such articles as would not affect the manufacturing industry of the country, and by confining the sales of your public lands to those who purchase for actual settlement, you will go far to reduce the receipts of the Treasury to an amount, little, if any, exceeding the wants of the Government. Let us try these reductions, and if even then a surplus should be found, we may cast about for some useful and constitutional mode for its disposition. But under no circumstances could he ever consent to the prospective legislation proposed by the Senator from South Carolina; a resort to such a system of distribution or deposit, call it which you will, would, in his judgment, be one of the greatest misfortunes which could befall the States; and all who regarded their rights should array themselves against such a project.

We are told by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] that the appropriations of the last session had been extravagant beyond measure. They were liberal, sir, not extravagant. There was an overflowing Treasury, and the state of the country rendered them proper. The Indian appropriations had been great; but for them he gave his most cordial support, from policy, from justice, from humanity. The policy of their removal was the only sure policy; the only earthly mode by which that unfortunate race can be preserved as a people. Sir, my constituents felt this, and were prepared to justify expenditures which otherwise might appear extravagant, to effect objects so desirable.

Mr. K. said he was extremely sorry that it was necessary to enter into a discussion as to the effect of the deposit law of the last session. That effect was yet to be seen, and the States themselves had the responsibility of making a proper disposition of the money intrusted with them. Whether we, (said Mr. K.,) in our ignorance, have deposited more money with them than we can spare, so that a portion of it will have to be called back for the necessary expenses of the Government, was another question. But such he did not understand would be the case. The argument of the Senator from Missouri did not put it on that footing. There was no Senator, he believed, who was not satisfied that the five millions left in the Treasury by the provisions of the deposit act, with the receipts of the year, would be amply sufficient to meet all the appropriations as they were wanted. If, however, it should, by a bare possibility, turn out otherwise, there was not a State in the Union that would hesitate for a moment in answering any call on it that might be made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

He was not disposed (Mr. K. said) to complain of the course taken by the Senator from Missouri. If the object of the gentleman was to oppose a prospective distribution, it appeared to him that it would have been as well to have waited until the bill for such an object came before them. With regard to the manner in which that bill had been treated by the Committee on Finance, he believed that, as a reduction of the revenue was contemplated by them, they preferred to let it lie until it was found what could be done on that subject, without making a formal report. I go (said Mr. K.) for a reduction of the revenue down to the wants of the Government, and then we shall hear no more about deposit acts. I hold that you have no right to create a surplus and then distribute it; and that, on the contrary, you ought to reduce the taxes. I hold it my duty to oppose, as far as my little influence extends, any prospective plan for a distribution of the surplus, and will be unwilling to act on any such bill until it shall be found that it is impossible to reduce the revenue by either of the two modes proposed.

Mr. K. said he felt himself bound to make this explanation, in consequence of the course the debate had taken, as he had voted for the deposit law of the last session, believing that in doing so he was making the safest and least objectionable disposition of the vast sum accumulating in the Treasury. He should vote against the mode proposed by the Senator from Missouri, of distributing the extra copies of the document before them, because such distribution would be unusual, was calculated to give erroneous information, could do no good, and, by attaching an unnecessary importance to it, mislead those to whom it should be sent.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that if the document was to be printed, it had better be done in the form in which it already was, for that was by far the most accurate. But he did not see the slightest necessity for printing it, and hoped it would not be printed.

Mr. NILES said that he would make a single remark. He had, in the course of the debate, heard but one reason assigned for sending this document to the States, which appeared to him to be entitled to any consideration: this was, that the information it contained might be useful to the Legislatures of the States, in giving a wise and prudent direction to their legislation in regard to the money they were about to receive under the provisions of the deposit act. This, he considered, was a legitimate, fair, and, he would add, important object. There was too much reason to fear, he thought, that the States, or many of them, might make an unwise disposition of this fund, and perhaps such a disposition as would not be altogether consistent with the principles and spirit of the deposit law. Did he believe that this document contained information calculated to enlighten their course, and that it embraced all the information necessary and proper for that purpose, he might be willing to vote for so unusual and extraordinary a measure as that proposed by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BEXTON.] He doubted, however, whether this document would answer any useful purpose. It did not contain all the information necessary, and he learned it would be more likely to mislead than to enlighten the action of the States. If any document could set public opinion right on this subject, he thought the message of the President was best adapted to do it. But he despaired of attaining this object: public opinion had taken its course, and settled down under peculiar circumstances, and cannot be changed by any document we can send to the States, or among the people. So far as it is wrong, it must work its own cure.

Sir, (said Mr. N.) perhaps no law ever enacted by Congress has had so strange a destiny as the deposit act of last session. Its true character had been misrepresented, grossly misrepresented, both by friends and foes, by all parties throughout the whole Union. During its long and arduous struggle in this hall, it was treated, by all who supported it at least, simply as a deposit bill. But the moment the question was finally decided, and before the bill had got really out of the Senate, what did we hear? Why, one voice was raised—a voice of triumph—calculated to give to the law a false character. And what did we witness afterwards? The friends of the measure, he meant the original friends, those who claimed its paternity, all united, in every way and form, through their organs, the press, and in every other way, in giving a false character to the act. It was declared to be a distribution bill, a law for dividing the surplus revenue among the States. But this was not all, nor the worst. The opponents of the measure united and made common cause with its friends, its original friends, in misleading the public and giving a false character to this law. Among them, his distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] had lent the influence of his great name and fame, the extent of which no one knew better than himself, to give a character to this act. He had no doubt the gentleman supposed he gave it its true character; yet some of us, (said Mr. N.) who had felt it a duty to support it, although as much opposed to the principle of distribution as that Senator himself, thought he gave it a false character. He declared it to be a distribution act, and the triumph of the scheme of dividing surpluses among the States.

Under such circumstances it had been found of no use to attempt to present to the public the true character of this measure. If we held up the act, and pointed the public mind to its plain letter and distinct provisions, which declare that the money is to be deposited with the States in trust for safe keeping, and to be returned when demanded, we were told: "It is of no use, every body knows that this is a distribution of the surplus, and that the money will never be called for." Such were the circumstances under which public opinion had been formed, and it was in vain to think to change it by sending documents to the State Legislatures at this time. Nothing short of a voice from Heaven could satisfy a large portion of the people that this money does not belong to the States, and it will be received and disposed of under these false and erroneous views.

In regard to the benefits or the evils of handing this surplus over to the States, they yet remained to be known. Of the dangers and difficulties which it will be likely to occasion, he was as sensible as any one. We have removed the burden from our own shoulders, and thrown it on the States; we have sent the golden apple of discord among them, and it remains to be known whether it will be used for good or for evil—whether it will be a blessing or a curse.

The Legislature of his own State was now in session, and he was informed were distracted with the disposition of their share of the surplus. There were many schemes for disposing of it, and which would prevail he could not say; but presumed that the erroneous impressions to which he had alluded would have their effect, and that the distribution principle would triumph, and that the fund would be divided and subdivided, he could not say to what extent. It was proposed to divide it up among the towns; and whether the distribution principle would stop there, or be followed out, might be doubtful, for so strong had this principle taken hold of public sentiment every where, that he should hardly be surprised to hear that a more thorough distribution had been made, and that the whole fund had been divided up per capita, among every man, woman, and child, in the State, for safe keeping. He hoped the fund would prove beneficial to the State, although for a time it may distract its councils. There were those, however, who regarded the evil as greater than the benefit. A letter he had this day received from a friend on the spot, says, "For God's sake send no more money among us."

The conduct of many in regard to the deposit act had been very strange; they condemn the principle of distribution, they condemn the deposit bill, they condemn those who voted for it, yet they are willing to receive the money; nay, they seize upon it with the keenest avidity, and seem determined to follow out the principle of distribution, which they condemn, and determine to distribute, divide, and re-divide the fund, until they can get a share of it into their own pockets. These are some of the first fruits of dividing up surpluses among the people.

But great as he considered the danger from sending this money among the States, he regarded the evils of its remaining in your Treasury, and deposit banks, as still greater. Our act did not create the evils from this surplus, although it may have transferred them from this Government to the States. But the danger and the evil existed: it was here, it was upon Congress, tempting us to extravagant expenditures; it was upon the deposit banks, inflating and blowing up our whole paper system. Whatever else might follow, one thing was certain: we had removed the evil from Congress; we had thrown off a burden which had rested heavily upon us; and which he considered was more than we could bear; he felt relieved, and rejoiced to get clear of the difficulties which surrounded Congress the last session.

The only legitimate object of sending this document to the States could not be accomplished; they had already taken their course, and must be permitted to go on. If the Senator from Missouri wished—which he presumed he did not—to send this paper to the States, to persuade them or the people that Congress had done wrong at the last session, that the money they were about to receive was wanted for the legitimate purposes of this Government, he could not aid him in that course; he could see no good that was to result from it, and it did not appear to be exactly just towards those who had voted for the deposit act, although disapproving of the principle of distribution.

It would be presumption in him to attempt to advise so distinguished and experienced a Senator as the gentleman from Missouri. But he might be permitted to say what would be his own course, and what appeared to him to be the course dictated by wisdom and policy. He would not revive the contentions of the last session; he would not unnecessarily fight our battles over again. Sufficient for the year are the evils thereof. Instead of attempting to use this unexpended balance fourteen and a half millions as an argument against the act of last session, he would make use of it to oppose the extension of the distribution principle, to resist the distribution scheme of the present session. The war is not over; all the projects of last session are revived: we have the land bill, and the bill for distributing surpluses to the States, already before us. Let us now make a stand, fortify our camp, and not uselessly waste our ammunition. We shall want the unexpended balance of last year's appropriations, and all other facts and arguments which we can bring to our aid, successfully to resist powerful efforts which are to be made to follow up the distribution of surpluses annually, until the system shall be fixed upon us as the settled policy of the Government. This appeared to him the wiser and better course; he could not, therefore, vote for the gentleman's motion.

Mr. HUBBARD said that, when he was up before, he had expressed a wish that the Senator from Missouri would so amend his motion as to confine the printing of the document for the use of the Senate; and, after the discussion which had taken place, he felt confirmed in the propriety of that suggestion. The Senator had stated, as a reason for wishing to send this document to the State Legislatures, that the question as to the manner of disposing of the deposit fund was now pending before them, and that the document was intended to inform them that Congress had been apportioning money to the States for deposit; the sum of fourteen millions of dollars, which was an unexpended balance of appropriations which had actually been made, intending thereby to make the impression that this balance of appropriations must be had; and, in order to supply the Treasury with the necessary moneys, a part of the money which would be deposited with the States after the 1st of January, in pursuance of the deposit bill of the last session, would necessarily have to be returned to the Treasury, and intending also to produce an influence upon the action of the Legislature upon this subject, and moreover to hold up those who were the avowed friends of this bill to the odium of their constituents, for sending among them money required for the use of the Government. He was so unfortunate as to have differed from the Senator from Missouri, as to the propriety and policy of passing that deposit bill. He gave it his support. He had seen no cause to regret that vote. He then believed it right and proper, and demanded from a just regard to the public interest. He still believed the same; and, under the same circumstances, he should not hesitate to give a similar vote upon the same subject. He had voted for the bill, and he had also voted for the appropriation bills which are enumerated in the document proposed to be printed. He well understood the effect of his vote; and he, for one, was then entirely satisfied that the whole amount of those appropriations could not be expended before the 1st day of January next; and yet that fact, of itself, had no influence upon his mind, to deter him from giving his support to the deposit bill. The whole history of our legislation, since the foundation of the Government, will show an unexpended balance of former appropriations remaining in the Treasury at the commencement of each succeeding year. The unexpended balance on the coming 1st day of January will undoubtedly be larger than usual; but, after deducting the five millions left in the Treasury, according to the provisions of the deposit bill, the sum will be reduced to about the usual unexpended amount of appropriations. But the document, unaccompanied with any other fiscal statement, as he had before remarked, would certainly give wrong impressions, and tend to darken, rather than enlighten, the public mind as to the true condition of the Treasury. A reference to the Secretary's report upon the finances would show what would be the probable condition of the public Treasury at the close of the year 1837. There could be no mistake about this matter; making the ordinary appropriations, and calculating only upon a receipt of five millions from the sale of the public lands, instead of their being deficit in the sum of fourteen millions, there would not be a deficit of over two or three millions, upon the showing of the Secretary himself. The document, he again repeated, was calculated to mislead; and unless it could be accompanied with an official statement of what would be the means of the Treasury on the 1st day of October, 1837, when the deposit bill will have been executed, to meet all claims upon the Treasury, he should be opposed to sending it to the State Legislatures. He was entirely willing to give all desirable information; he would withhold nothing from them which could be useful; but the document, printed as it is proposed to print it, independent of the other official reports upon the state of the finances, would, it seemed to him, afford no useful information. He would venture to predict that, during the next fiscal year, there would not be any period when the Treasury would feel embarrassed from having deposited with the States the sum actually found in the Treasury on the 1st day of January. So far from it, in his belief, there would be found, at the close of the year, means sufficient to meet all claims upon the Treasury. He would, however, express the hope that the Committee on Finance would be able to bring forward some measure, which, in effect, would leave hereafter in the pockets of the people, "the best depositories of the public money," what will not absolutely be required for the use of the Government. Such a measure he should support. He would again, in conclusion, repeat his former request, that the Senator from Missouri would so amend his motion as to have the document printed for the use of the Senate. He had no objections to printing an extra number, but he had objections to sending this document, under the authority of the Senate, to the State Legislatures, as a document designed to aid them in their action, which, he believed, was calculated to produce a contrary effect.

Mr. STRANGE rose and said that he was but young in the Senate, and therefore it would be rash in him to lay down any rule for its action. But he might venture to say that on this, as on every future occasion, he would vote in favor of printing any paper which was calculated to give information to the people. He understood there were very few gentlemen in this body who objected to the proposition of the Senator from Missouri to have the document in question printed; but the objection was to its being sent to the Governors and Legislatures of the several States; and he (Mr. S.) concurred in that objection. He confessed that he was somewhat surprised to see the Senate thrown into a tumult from a mere proposition to print a document; but when he recollected how Senators were situated with regard to a measure adopted at the last session, his wonder ceased. He could not vote to send a document out, upon the grounds urged by the honorable Senator from Missouri. He was opposed to sending copies to the Legislatures and Governors of the States. And he was opposed to the proposition on another ground: the effect which it might seem it was intended to produce on the Governors and Legislatures. On the document reaching them, the natural inquiry would be, what was the object to be accomplished by sending us this document? It certainly was designed to have some effect. Is it to operate on the Legislature? What right has Congress, or any portion of Congress, to dictate to us or to either branch of our Legislature? Upon this matter (concluded Mr. S.) we are supreme, and have no superior. We judge for ourselves, and think no man or body of men have a right to interfere. I therefore unite with the Senator from New Hampshire

Election of Chaplain--Admission of Michigan.

[Mr. HUBBARD] in paying the Senator from Missouri to call to his recollection the fable of the boy and the filberts, and strike out that part of his proposition relative to sending copies of the document to the Governors and Legislatures of the several States.

Mr. RENTON accepted the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, and modified his motion accordingly, so that one thousand extra copies were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

The Senate then proceeded to the election of a chaplain; when, the ballots being counted, it appeared that the Rev. Mr. Goodman, having received 22 votes, was duly elected.

Several bills received from the House received their first and second reading, and were appropriately referred; when

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 29.

ADMISSION OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union; which was, by consent, read twice.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the bill now receive its third reading: it was but short; the facts of the case were well known; and if any Senator wished further information, he stood ready to give it, so far as it was in possession of the committee.

Mr. EWING objected to the bill's receiving its third reading at this time. It was far too important in its character to be hurried through the Senate in this manner, without time to look at or consider it.

Mr. CALHOUN joined in the objection. He had not, he said, looked much at the question involved in the bill, nor was he acquainted with the facts of the case; but, assuming them to be as had been stated in the President's message, this was one of the very gravest questions ever submitted to the Senate. It was certainly one which required to be maturely considered, and carefully weighed. He wished more time for reflection: first, that he might more accurately ascertain what the facts were; and, secondly, that he might weigh them in his mind with the care they demanded. He presumed others were of like mind; and, with a view to ascertain the wishes of the Senate, he would move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed, and that it be made the order of the day for that day week.

Mr. GRUNDY did not object to allowing gentlemen a reasonable time, but thought the day named too distant. There was one good reason why the bill should receive an earlier consideration: the distribution of the deposits was to take place soon after the 1st day of January next, and it was desirable, if the bill was to pass at all, that it passed early enough to admit the State of Michigan to receive, with her sisters of the confederacy, her due proportion of the public moneys; but if the whole subject was put off, as had been moved, the passage of the bill might be so far delayed as to render this impossible. This, surely, was a strong argument for as early an attention to the subject as possible. As to the facts of the case, they were detailed in the President's message, and in the documents which had been reported with the bill: he was fully aware that they presented a case, in regard to which the judgments of gentlemen might widely differ; but the facts themselves were few, and might soon be told. In June last, Congress had passed a bill declaring that, on certain conditions therein set forth, the new State of Michigan should be received into the Union: one of which was, that certain boundary lines should be assigned to the State; and another, that a convention of the people of Michigan, convened for the express purpose, should express their assent to these conditions, and agree to come into the confederacy on the terms prescribed. The act contained no directions as to the manner in which such convention should be called. A convention was ordered by the Legislature of Michigan; which met, and concluded to reject the conditions of admission, and communicated such dissent to the President of the United States. On farther reflection, however, without any particular form of legislation, the people themselves had since spontaneously met in their primary assemblies, and called a second convention, by which body it had been agreed to accept the conditions of the law, and thus to enter the confederacy. It was since ascertained that from 5,000 to 6,000 votes for this latter convention had been cast for the same members who had formerly decided to refuse the terms of admission, and from 8,000 to 9,000 in favor of men of a different opinion. This, he believed, was about as correct a statement of the facts of the case as could be obtained by greater delay. The question was certainly open as to the validity of the acts of this latter convention, on which, no doubt, there would be a diversity of opinion; but as to the facts there could be no dispute. It would appear, on examination, that although a majority of the people of Michigan had, at the date of the first convention, been opposed to accepting the terms of admission, yet, at the time the last was held, an overflowing majority had been in favor of the measure. When these facts should be found and admitted to be as stated, Mr. G. should give his views as to what ought to be the consequence. But he was anxious that the law should be passed in time for Michigan to get her proportion of the public money. The Secretary could not make the distribution on the first of the month, as all the returns would not then be in, but he might probably be in circumstances to do so within ten days thereafter.

Mr. CALHOUN said that no Senator was more anxious that the new State of Michigan should be received into the confederacy than himself; or could be more willing that she should obtain her due proportion of the public money placed in deposit with the several States. He desired to interpose no unnecessary delay, and would vary his motion so as to propose that this bill be made the order for Tuesday next. (Monday, he presumed, would scarcely be a business day, and many of the members might be absent.) According, however, to the statement given by the gentleman himself, there was at the bottom of this subject one of the gravest, the very gravest, questions which could be agitated; so grave, indeed, that important as he conceived the deposit act to be, he could almost prefer that their respective proportions of the surplus fund should be withheld from all the States, than that a bill like this should rashly be passed. He wished, he repeated it, more time for reflection.

Mr. MORRIS said that although he was one of the committee who had reported the bill, yet he did not concur in the preamble as reported. He did not, indeed, doubt that Michigan ought to be admitted into the Union, and should rejoice at her admission. But, as the chairman had correctly stated the act of Congress, providing for her admission, made it conditional, and required her previous assent to the condition, that assent was to be made known to the President of the United States. Now, the assent of the people of Michigan had not yet reached the President at the date of his last communication, and therefore Congress did not officially know the fact. The first question was, whether the Senate was competent to declare the act of the last convention a valid act. The law required that a convention should be called for the express object of expressing assent or dissent to the conditions of reception. Now, the Senate had learned from the President's message that the people of Michigan had assembled in a convention called by their own Legislature, and had declared their dissent, and had communicated such dissent to the President. But, after this solemn act by a convention legally called, it seemed that there had another convention been gotten up without any authority of law, and on the acts of this body the present bill was founded. It involved questions of the highest magnitude. Mr. M. went on to express his opinion that the doings of the latter convention could be no guide for the legislation of Congress, who ought to act just as if no such body had ever met. He was of opinion that the third section of the admission law, which required the previous assent of the people of Michigan to conditions presented by Congress, was an imposition upon that people; but the correct mode would now be to repeal that act, and to receive the State at once. The whole law had proceeded on the hypothesis that there was an unsettled boundary line between Michigan and the State south of her; but, as one of the Senators of that State, he considered the question of boundary as fully settled. He was willing to admit Michigan, but not on grounds which were unfounded in fact. He gave notice that he should, when the bill came up for consideration, move to strike out the preamble; it was intended as a key to the bill; but it was calculated rather to mislead than to guide to the true principle on which the bill was founded. It was possible that, on further reflection, he might change his mind; but such were his present impressions.

Admission of Michigan.

[SENATE.]

Mr. GRUNDY said that the committee, when draughting the bill, had also taken under consideration that view of the subject presented by the Senator from Ohio; and if, on Monday, the Senate should concur in that view, no regard would be had in the bill to the late convention accepting the terms of admission, and thus the object of admission would be attained. But it was on this ground that Mr. G. preferred the preamble: that Michigan could then never claim, as a State, what Congress had thus decided against. And, as there was an inveterate controversy between Michigan and Ohio, he thought it the better way to bind Michigan, so that under no pretext could she set up a claim to a section of country belonging to Ohio. If the preamble should be stricken out, the subject would be more open to controversy than if it should be retained. Mr. G. believed that, by the preamble, Michigan would be estopped from coming forward and claiming any thing. It was merely on this ground that he was in favor of retaining the preamble. But, to obviate objections, he was willing that the bill should be postponed, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was aware that the present was not the proper occasion to discuss the merits of the bill which had been reported; nor did he purpose to enter on its discussion; but, as other gentlemen had briefly stated their opinions on the subject, he would in like manner state what was his own view of the matter. He did not consider the subject of the bill as peculiarly grave or difficult, save as it was always a grave question whether a new State should be received into the Union. The language of the admission act, which had passed last year, was very plain to him, so much so, indeed, that he had expected the President would have issued his proclamation at once, without referring the question to Congress for decision. Mr. B. here quoted the act, and observed that it contained no provision requiring any legislative action on the part of Michigan, to authorize a convention of the people. It would have been improper that it should. He insisted it was perfectly competent for the people of that Territory to hold a convention spontaneously, without any application to the Legislature about the matter; and if they had done so, the only question was whether such convention had decided to accept the conditions of admission which Congress had (very properly, in his judgment) required. He believed it had: and the case was therefore very plain. He understood there had been more votes, by 2,000 on both sides, given in this latter than in the first convention; and no matter how many unsuccessful attempts had previously been made, if their consent had at last been given, there was an end of the matter; they were clearly entitled to admission. He should not enter on the argument, but merely throw out his opinion, which he should be ready, at the proper time, to enforce with what little power he might command.

Mr. EWING concurred with his colleague [Mr. MORRIS] in the opinion that the last convention held in Michigan was altogether illegal and unauthorized. He saw in it nothing which was entitled to be called a convention of the people. He was also opposed to the preamble of the bill. He had not examined the bill itself, and could not say what might be his opinion of it, should the preamble be stricken out; but how much soever it might operate as an estoppel to the new State of Michigan from ever hereafter mooting again the vexed question of her boundary line, he was not in favor of having that estoppel effected by what he considered a mere fiction. [Mr. E. quoted the admission act, to show the conditions of admission.] Now, did any one suppose that it was a fulfilment of this condition for the people to rise up in their primary assemblies, without legal organization or civil authority, and declare their assent to the conditions of admission? Was society thus to be reduced to its elements, and was it to act without social organization? The act of Congress had recognised no such principle; it had recognised the principle of social organization; and to hold the validity of the acts of such an assemblage as had come together under the name of a convention of the people, was, in his judgment, so strange as to amount almost to an absurdity. Interested or not, he thought, in all fairness, the estoppel effected by such an act of assent ought not to be accepted and held binding. It was based upon an act that was wholly void. It was said, indeed, that a majority of the people had voted; but where was the evidence of any regular social organization in the convention? What guarantee did Congress possess that it had been convened according to the forms of the constitution? Who voted? Who notified the people at large of the time and place of meeting? Did the people all consent to such time and such place? It was, at least, not probable they did. The people of this country were in the habit of looking to some regular and recognised authority in all their proceedings. A, B, and C, in a particular county, declaring that they would meet to consider this public question, did not lay the basis of a convention. How had the election of members of the convention been conducted? Who had been the judges of election? had they been sworn? if so, their oath must have been extrajudicial. And who had been permitted to vote? It had been said there were two thousand more votes given on either side than in the first convention. That that number of votes had been counted he did not doubt; but where was the evidence that they had been given? No warrant, or qualification of voters, had been alluded to. Mr. E. had no objection to the admission of Michigan, but let it be done regularly, and in a proper manner; and let nothing like trick be practised upon the people of the new State, by an estoppel improperly obtained against their claims.

Mr. MORRIS said he was very thankful for information that would show the ground on which the parties stood in the discussion. He understood the gentleman [Mr. BUCHANAN] thus: that all which was required of the people of Michigan was that they should choose a convention, and that such convention should assent to the act of admission. The gentleman even went further; if one convention had failed, the people might choose another, and so go on ad infinitum. This doctrine (Mr. M. thought) went directly to dissolve the whole elements of society, and to destroy all the obligations of law. It amounted to this: that if an act of Congress should be passed for the punishment of an offence, which act required a judicial investigation, the people might, notwithstanding, rise in an original assembly, and themselves inflict the punishment.

Again: if Michigan had adopted a constitution, it was bound to abide by that constitution. But this proposed act of Congress would give the people of Michigan the power to amend and add to that constitution. Mr. M. thought that doctrines of this kind ought not to be tolerated. And if such an original convention was proper, how was it to be created? Was one county to notify another, or one individual another? or how was it to be done? If the people of Michigan might act in this irregular way, then so might the people of any of the States, and all government and law would be thus already dissolved into their original elements, and the whole fabric of our institutions would be reduced to a shadow. And the fault would not be so much in the people of Michigan as in this proposed act of Congress. Mr. M. thought much mischief would follow the passage of the bill with such a preamble. It would be establishing by Congress the doctrine that we are not to be governed by law, but by popular frenzy. When the Legislature of Michigan passed the law authorizing a convention, was there any objection made to that law? But why pass the law, if the people might rise in an original convention? It was such a convention that at least accepted the terms of admission—a convention which, as the President had informed us, was got up without law; and the President had therefore not issued his proclamation of admission. It seemed to Mr. M. that all this was a wide departure from the constitution and laws of the country; and he should, therefore, at the proper time, move to strike out the preamble.

Mr. BUCHANAN regretted that, in expressing a mere general opinion, he had unintentionally given rise to the present discussion. The Senator from Ohio, who had just taken his seat, had stated the ground he had taken in such strong terms, that Mr. B. supposed that if an angel from heaven should attempt to convince him of the contrary, he would labor in vain. That honorable Senator had discovered that he (Mr. B.) was a great latitudinarian; and that, if the principles he had stated should once be admitted, every thing would run to confusion. The people, it seemed, would rise, and not only legislate for themselves, but execute justice also!—(he presumed by Lynch law.) But he denied the justice of any such inferences from his doctrine. By what authority had the first convention been held? Not from any power given by the act of Congress to the Legislature of Michigan to pass a law calling a convention. Why, then, had such an act been passed? Clearly from the necessity of the case. Michigan had been acting as a sovereign State, and Congress had been treating with her touching her admission into the Union. It had been very proper in the Legislature to pass such a law; but the convention assembled under it had proved ineffectual. Congress had acted wisely in not requiring any act of the Legislature to give validity to the convention. The sovereign people of the State of Michigan had a right to do, in this matter, just what they should please to do. And even had the Legislature refused to pass a law calling a convention, the people would still have possessed the right to meet in their primary assemblies, and make their wishes known to the Legislature. He admitted that Congress should first be satisfied that the convention had acted in a regular manner, and had actually concurred in the conditions of admission. But, when this was proved, it was no longer a matter of favor to receive the new State. It was her right to come in. He should not go into the argument at this time; when the bill came up, he should be happy to meet the two Senators from Ohio in its discussion.

Mr. BENTON said it was impossible that any question could arise about the admission, on which every gentleman had not already made up his mind. The subject had already been four or five years before Congress. Mr. B. insisted that the question was a mere question of right—a right which existed four years ago, but which had been met at the threshold, and fought inch by inch, till, at the last session of Congress, the friends of the admission had determined to sit it out. The admission had been resisted in a manner unknown to the history of the country. And now it was to be put off till Monday, when the Senate had rather occasion to sit at night in these short days; and the nights would be necessary for the discussion of this question. If all the questions brought forward should be discussed, they must begin with Adam, who had but one woman to govern, and enter into the history of original conventions. There was no necessity of postponing till Monday. All the time would be little enough for them to get rid of what was pent up within them almost to bursting on this subject. But if postponed, then, when Monday should come, Mr. B. would come and sit down in his chair, and would camp on this ground till Michigan should be admitted.

The discussion ended by making the bill the order of the day for Monday next.

THE TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution rescinding the Treasury order of July 11, 1836, &c.—the question being on the substitute offered by Mr. RIVES, aiming, indirectly, at the suppression of the small bills of the State banks.

Mr. MORRIS having waived his right to the floor,

Mr. SOUTHARD addressed the Senate as follows:

The resolution of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. EWING] now submitted to our consideration, proposes two things—

To rescind the Treasury order of 11th July last, and to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from delegating to others the power of directing what funds shall be received for the customs and public lands, and from making any discrimination in the funds which shall be received, either as to the persons who have to pay, or the objects for which the payments shall be made.

The amendment of the Senator from Virginia does not rescind the order, but, regarding it as legal and temporary, prescribes that, hereafter, dues to the Government shall be paid in specie or notes of specie-paying banks, provided the banks whose notes shall be received shall not issue those of less denomination than $5 now; less than $10 after 1st July, 1839; and less than $20 after 1st July, 1841; and also that no notes shall be received which the deposit banks shall not be willing to credit to the Government as cash.

The resolution satisfies itself with leaving the law on the subject as it was before the interference of the President and Secretary in July.

The amendment provides by joint resolution for the manner of payment and kinds of money which shall be received, and leaves the selection of the notes which shall be received neither to the Secretary, nor to the President, nor to Congress, but to the deposit banks. A strange surrender of power to them—a feature of a financial system to which it is impossible to agree.

The decision must be made by the Senate between the two propositions. I cannot hesitate in adopting the resolution and rejecting the amendment.

Treasury Circular.

[SENATE]

The resolution leaves the law as it was. By that law every citizen had a right to pay in the same kind of money; either in specie or in notes convertible into specie on demand. All were on an equality in this respect, in every part of the Union. This was just in itself, and suited to the fundamental principle of our institutions—equality of rights and privileges.

The resolution rests on the assumption that this state of things ought not to be changed, or, if it ought, that the Executive has no legal right to change it without the direction of Congress; that the Secretary, with or without the orders of the President, has no power of legislation in regard to the currency and the public lands; nor any authority to discriminate in favor of one citizen over another, or of the inhabitants of one State over another. These principles receive my concurrence; and I am, therefore, in favor of the resolution.

I propose to inquire—

What the order of 11th July prescribes?

What were the reasons and objects which induced its promulgation?

What the effects which it has produced?

And what authority the Secretary had to issue it?

The order relates solely to the receipts on the sales of the public lands, and does not affect the receipts for the customs or any other dues to the Government, and thus makes a distinction between them and all other sources of revenue. It prohibits the receivers and deposite banks from receiving, after the 15th of August last, any thing but gold and silver, and, in certain cases, the Virginia scrip, for the lands, and forbids their taking any note of any bank anywhere, or any certificate of actual deposite, even of specie, in the deposite or other banks, unless it be a certificate of deposite of specie given by the Treasurer of the United States.

It makes an exception in favor of the citizens of the State in which the land sold may happen to lie, and in favor of those who are called "actual settlers," and authorizes them, until the 15th of December, to pay in the ordinary currency—in specie or in bank notes.

Such are its plain and obvious provisions; and they are intended to be permanent, so far, at least, as the Executive has authority and power to enforce them.

The Senator from Virginia, in offering his amendment, seemed to regard the order as a temporary arrangement—as having worked its intended effects; and that it was now proper to legislate on the subject without reference to it. Other Senators have taken the same view.

I fear that they will not be able to escape a direct expression of opinion, by this suggestion. We cannot avoid seeing that it is, in its phraseology, its avowed objects, and the grounds on which it is defended here, a permanent measure, although it may have had some temporary objects. There is nothing on its face which looks like a temporary act. The favor extended to particular classes of buyers was to last only to the 15th of December. That day is passed, and now it is the universal rule—operating on all the sales of public lands—with no allusion to any time when that rule shall be changed.

The objects avowed as those which are to be attained by it also show that it is not temporary. They are "To repress frauds, speculations, and monopolies." And will not attempts at these continue to exist, to a greater or less extent, while the public lands shall continue to be sold? To strengthen the deposite banks, and prevent too great an amount of bank notes from coming into them. And will not buyers continue to buy and pay in bank notes as long as things are left to take their natural course? "To discourage the ruinous extension of bank issues"—"the general evil influence likely to result to the public interests, and, especially, the safety of the great amount of money in the Treasury and the sound condition of the currency of the country." And are these objects which may be accomplished by a five months' operation of a Treasury order? Certainly there is nothing in this detail of reasons which can induce the belief that the President and Secretary intended only a transient effect from their action.

Nor is it defended on this floor as a temporary arrangement. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] and others do not so defend it. They attempt to show that it ought to be the settled and permanent policy of the country. And, in this respect, they concur with the President and Secretary; while the Senator from Virginia, unwilling to disapprove their act, seems to desire to correct their error, by expressing a legislative opinion in favor of a different course for the future.

The Secretary, under his seventh head, "Of the mint and the currency," (page 21,) says: "The other objects of that circular 'were gradually to bring back the practice, in those payments, to what was deemed to be the true spirit as well as letter of our existing laws, and to what the safety of the public money in the deposite banks, and the desirable improvement of our currency, seemed at that time to unite in rendering judicious.'" He regards it as a matter of currency and safety of the public money; a matter, in its very nature, of permanent regulation.

The President, in his annual message, after an examination of the deposite or distribution law, calls our attention to "the currency of the country"—a "subject intimately associated with" that law; and he treats of this order as a part of the regulation of the currency of the country; and, to show that he does not intend any repeal or alteration of it, he adds: "It remains for Congress, if they approve the policy which dictated this order, to follow it up in its various bearings." He looks to no repeal of it. "It remains for Congress." He kindly permits us to follow it up, and to do what he has left for us—not to repeal and rescind it, but to strengthen and invigorate it. And, unless he has an opinion for Congress and another for his friends—an opinion official and an opinion private—he cannot willingly see any effort, such as the amendment proposed, to evade, weaken, or destroy it; although he may, as in the case of the deposite bill, give it his "reluctant approval," when he cannot avoid it. Left to his own choice, he would most probably extend it to the customs, and to all the revenues of the country; and if no conflicting opinion shall be pronounced by Congress, I shall not be surprised if this extension take place.

Mr. President, I ask how this order has, as yet, produced all its intended effect, and why we should regard it as temporary? The reasons and objects avowed in the public documents have not been accomplished. Were there others which have not been avowed? Is it true, as has been sometimes charged, but of which I know nothing, that a prevailing motive was to favor personal friends, and to defeat, as far as practicable, the full effect of the deposite law? It has been said that there had been immense speculations in lands by those near the Executive; and that the temporary obstruction to public sales was useful, in enabling them to make profitable dispositions of what they had acquired, and extricate themselves from embarrassment. This effect may have been produced.

A much more important public object has also been charged—the reduction of the amount which was to be distributed among the States under the deposite law; and this has certainly been effected. A Senator has told us that the order prevented "myriads of paper money from flowing into the deposite banks in the West." Then, sir, it prevented "myriads of money" from being added to the amount which was to be distributed. I can readily believe that this was one of the motives which influenced the Executive in issuing that order. We all know how strenuously that law was opposed by those who are said to court and to enjoy an acquaintance with the most intimate sentiments and feelings, both of the retiring and the approaching Executive. It was denounced in terms the force of which they did not stop to measure, and we were warned, in various modes, up to the time when the amendment was offered in the House of Representatives, that the power of the veto would be applied to it. The President declares to us that he gave it his "reluctant approval," and an official organ has announced that it would have been refused, if the veto would have prevented its passage. I leave it to his advocates to defend that political morality and independence which fails to discharge a high official duty, upon the ground, that he may be found in a constitutional minority. It comports little with the boasted energy and firmness of which the nation has heard so much, and by which many have been deluded. And may I not suggest to his defenders on this floor, whether it does become the dignity and respect for the laws which appertain to the first office of the country, by such a device, to defeat the full operation of a statute which has been passed by the votes of so large a majority of the Legislature, and to which the approval of the Executive, even though reluctantly, has been affixed? It was perfectly well known that the effect of the order would be to diminish the sums which would be received by the several States; less lands would be sold, less money would come into the Treasury, a less amount would be divided.

And, sir, notwithstanding the report of the Secretary, I cannot but suspect that the failure to receive a part, at least, of the money from the Bank of the United States, while it has still further diminished the amount to be divided, may have been induced by similar views. The Executive had no desire that that money also should come into distribution.

But, be this as it may, the effect upon this bill was foreseen by the President and Secretary. Was it also desired by them? And was this a controlling motive for issuing the order? The law was passed on the 23d June, Congress adjourned on the 4th July, and on the 11th, while some of the members were yet on their way to their homes, an act is performed which is calculated to defeat, at least to weaken, the operation of the most important measure which had resulted from their joint deliberations. Is it the appropriate business of the Executive thus to counteract the decision of the Legislature, to deprive the people of the States of the large sums of money which would have been received from the sales of the public lands, and put at defiance not only the will of Congress, but of a large majority of the Union? How far the people may be disposed to bear it, without murmuring, I know not; but as a representative from one of the States which approves the law, and has been deprived of her full measure of benefit under it by this act of the Executive, it is my duty to express my disapprobation and her disapprobation; and no servility to power, no devotion to a name or a party, shall keep me from it.

Mr. President, this order may have had temporary objects, which may have been accomplished, but it had also permanent objects, which are yet to be accomplished. It may have relieved favorites, and it may have weakened an obnoxious measure, and lessened the amount which will be in the Treasury on the 1st of January, and which the States are to receive; but the Executive cannot, at this moment, repeal it. It would be an open avowal of motives which there is too much cunning and too little courage openly and on the public records to proclaim. The order must be continued, unless the power of Congress is brought to bear on its repeal. We must consider it as permanently operating upon the currency of the country and the disposition of the public lands, and give our votes accordingly on the resolution and the amendment.

In deciding upon the policy and the lawfulness of this order, the reasons assigned for it demand our consideration. I have already alluded to them, so far as to show that they are not temporary in their nature; and if they are the true reasons, the order, in its full force, is as necessary now as it was at the moment when it was issued. But some of them call for further remark.

One of them is, in substance, to repress frauds, speculations, and monopolies, in the purchase of the public lands, to preserve them for the "actual settler," at a moderate price, and insure the more rapid settlement of the territory. It is doubtful whether the more rapid settlement of the country can promote its essential and permanent interests, and whether the speculations complained of do injuriously, if at all, impede its substantial progress in population and prosperity. But, I ask, what is meant by these frauds? And who have the legitimate power to apply the remedy for them? Who is a speculator, and what authority, under our system of Government, can limit his acquisition? Can the Executive determine what number of acres makes a man a speculator, and who shall be prohibited therefore from buying? He might as well decide how much grain a citizen should raise, buy, sell, or transfer in the market, or the number of yards of broadcloth that he should manufacture or import and dispose of. If there be any authority to control such matters, it is not executive, but legislative, and the Executive wanders from his proper sphere when he attempts to interfere with them.

It is true, as the Senator from Missouri tells us, that the word "speculator" is not to be found in the constitution; and is any other description or denomination of acts to be found there? Is his favorite "actual settler" there? But, sir, there is a more important inquiry? Does the Senator mean to infer, because the speculator is not named, therefore his rights are not protected by the constitution, and the President may make any regulation in regard to him which he may please? If the argument does not mean this, I can perceive neither its force nor application. If it do mean this, it is a bold claim for the extension of executive power. It proclaims that whoever and whatever is not named in and protected by the constitution, may be dealt with, regulated, trampled upon, at executive pleasure. The Senator instructed us about the divine right of Kings; he had better turn his attention to the divine right of Presidents, who, by such a principle, may do, not what they are authorized by the constitution to do, but every thing that is not forbidden.

Another reason assigned for the order is, to check bank issues, which had been made to a ruinous extent. That there has been a large extension of bank capital and paper currency since the financial notions of the present administration have had operation, is not to be doubted. That extension was the natural result of the course adopted by those who have had control on this subject, and has been principally effected by them. While they have talked about specie, and denounced the United States Bank and paper money, they have, in several of the States, occupied themselves in greatly increasing their bank capital and paper currency. The causes and effects of this circulation have been clearly exhibited by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] and I will not detain the Senate by repetitions less satisfactory than the original exposition. I beg, however, to say that, in forming my opinions, I do not rely on the calculations and estimates of the Secretary of the amount of actual currency, and especially of gold and silver; nor do I credit the estimate which he has given of the amount necessary for the convenience and interest of the country. The quantity of gold and silver manufacted in the nation, for articles of use and luxury, is immense. Our own mines do not furnish more than enough of gold to meet this demand for annual consumption; and much of the silver which comes from abroad shares the same fate. They are converted, not by pounds, but by hundreds of pounds; and it is doubtful whether all of both metals, taken from the mines of the world, increase, to any great extent, the specie in actual circulation among civilized nations. I feel quite sure that the actual circulation of specie here is below 25 instead of 28 millions of dollars. But if we rely on the estimate of the Secretary of the paper and specie, and place it at 148 millions, it is not much greater, in proportion to the demand, than it was in 1833 at 84 millions. The actual population and property of the country have grown in a ratio never before known in the history of nations. Its enterprise has been without parallel; its great staples alone have required 50 per cent. addition. Take an example. The cotton of about one million one hundred thousand bales, at the price in 1833, was worth about 52 millions of dollars; in 1836, the one million six hundred thousand bales, at 17 cents, are worth about 86 millions. The five or six transfers which are made of them, from the grower to the consumer, were to be met by some kind of circulation—specie, notes, or bills of exchange. And the derangement of the exchanges threw the demand with additional violence upon the paper currency. The same facts are true as to bread-stuffs, beef, pork, &c. Your bread-stuffs in 1833, at about $4 per barrel, required not more than 50 millions. In 1836, at $8 or $9, they called for about 110 millions. Your beef and pork, at $6 50 in 1833, wanted less than 80 millions; in 1836, at $12 to $14, demanded nearly 200 millions; and all these, in the two or three transfers from the producer to the consumer, swelled enormously the circulation which was required. Pursue the calculation through all the elements which constitute the materials for an estimate, and it will be found that the currency at $6 50 for each individual in 1833, would have afforded accommodation to the business and wants of the people of the Union equal to the $10 at which the Secretary states it in 1836; and when to this we add the obstructions to exchange, it is not to be doubted that some inconvenience would have been felt. Yet it is in such a condition of our interests that the Secretary sets himself to work to shut up as much specie as he can, in about one tenth of the banks; to curtail the power of accommodation in all the rest; and we are called upon to wonder at the pressure.

But, Mr. President, it is not necessary, on this question, to settle the amount of circulation which the interests of the country require. The pretence is, that we are to have that circulation confined chiefly to gold and silver. Is it practicable? and are those who talk of it sincere and well advised? To accomplish it, you must abstract from the circulation of other countries from fifty to seventy millions of specie. You could not coin it at your mints with sufficient rapidity to keep pace with the demand. You cannot buy and retain it in the country, unless your commerce will enable you to do it. Commerce will bring, and commerce will take it away. Why do not those who are the advocates of an exclusive specie currency tell us how we may accomplish the object? Let them give us a scheme; inform us where we shall procure it; how retain it; and how the business and employments of the country can be reduced to the point which such a currency would require. Until they do this, the intelligence of the people will be apt to suspect that there is more of pretence than sincerity on this point. It is by visionary and impracticable schemes like these that the real obstacles are thrown in the way of wise and prudent regulations; and we can never hope for sound legislation until they shall be removed from the countenance and support of those who are in power.

But, Mr. President, while I dissent from the views of the Executive on these points, I do not wish to be misunderstood as the advocate of an extension of our paper currency, nor as maintaining that it is in a sound and safe condition. Our whole currency is in imminent danger. There are no salutary checks and control. Banks are created often without reference to the necessities of the country, and sometimes made the rewards of partisan and party exertions. Issues, too, have not unfrequently been regulated by the wants and wishes of favorites. The constitutional control has been thrown aside, and ignorance and empiricism are meddling with matters which they do not understand. There is danger ahead of us, and we shall be fortunate if we escape without a convulsion in the currency which will agonize the country. It is time that this subject was under wiser management. But even this will be insufficient. Admit that our circulation is too great—that there is danger of over-issues by the banks—that gold and silver ought to be our only currency—and that it is the duty of the Government to look well to all these; yet the question seems, who has the authority to direct, regulate, and control them? The interference of the Executive, without the sanction and command of Congress, is usurpation of power. His right to legislate is not to be found in the constitution.

I pass to the effects which have been produced by this Treasury order. The President believes "that the country will find in the motives which induced that order, and the happy consequences which will have ensued, much to commend, and nothing to condemn." Let us examine these consequences, award all the praise which they merit.

The President says: "It checked the career of the Western banks, and gave them additional strength in anticipation of the pressure which has since pervaded our Eastern as well as the European commercial cities." The Senator from North Carolina also admits that there is a severe and grinding pressure. The Senator from Mississippi does not seem to credit it; he regards it as another panic cry. I shall not attempt to settle the controversy between them, nor waste time in proving by facts and arguments that a pressure has prevailed. The man who doubts must labor under strange ignorance of the condition of the country—an ignorance very similar to that which could assert that our exchanges are in a better state than for several years past. His opinions will not be likely to mislead. But this order was given "in anticipation of the pressure." It certainly could have anticipated it but a very few hours, for the pressure commenced at the very moment that the existence of the order was known in the cities and in the country. They were as contemporaneous as cause and effect could be. In proof of the assertion that the order checked the career of the Western banks, and gave them strength, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BAXTON] attempts to prove that it has greatly increased the specie in the banks and the accommodation to the public. He seems to think that he has quite overwhelmed all opposition, and destroyed all resistance to his conclusions, by "the logic of figures," and his "appeal to the exact sciences." It is not the first time that this logic has satisfied that Senator without convincing others. It proved very conclusively to his mind during the last session that there would be and could be no surplus to be divided among the States. The Secretary, however, has found about thirty-seven millions for this purpose, and that is far below what it ought to have been. The Senator, however, has a reason for the error of his conclusion from "the logic of figures." It is in substance this: If Congress would have made all the appropriations asked for, and made them in an early day in the session, the logic would have come out right. I do not doubt it, sir. If, in the early part of the session, we could have permitted ourselves to be charged, both by the President and Senator, with utter disregard of our duty, and wilfully, for party purposes, permitting the country to be uncovered while the clouds of war were gathering over her, and remained silent, the long and excited debate upon the three million appropriation would have been avoided, and the time spared, and the appropriations reached at an earlier day. If we will suffer the imputations against our patriotism and fidelity to the public, from all quarters, to go unanswered and unnoticed, and simply become the registers of the thousand efforts for squandering money which has been so profusely made, time will be saved, and there will be no surplus. The Senator is correct in his defence of the accuracy of his logic, if you leave him and an extravagant administration in uninterrupted possession of the means of verifying it. The appropriations last year amounted to about thirty-four millions of dollars, and we were urged to add many millions more. This would have swept the surplus pretty effectually, and left little, if any thing, to divide. But I thought that thirty-four millions was quite enough to be expended in one year by an economical and reforming administration; and the more so as it was but eight years since that the administration, of which I was an unimportant member, was denounced and discarded from public confidence, because it had expended about thirteen millions. There is some difference between thirteen and thirty-four millions in a single year. But times, sir, have changed; a new logic is in vogue: what was guilt then is virtue now.

But, Mr. President, let us see how the Senator applies this logic of figures. He takes the deposit banks alone, reads the amount of specie, and the accommodations before the Treasury order and after it—I believe he took the months of June and November last as his guides—and finding more specie in the latter than the former period, in these banks, and more accommodations also, he not only attributes it to the order, but infers that the currency is more sound because there is more specie in the country. Non sequitur do not belong to figures. The premises and the conclusion do not hold together. If there be more specie in the country, upon what principle shall we assign it to the Treasury order, in preference to the state of our foreign commerce and foreign exchanges? These may, and necessarily would, for the time, bring and keep specie here. But how the order could have had the slightest effect, it is difficult for others to see, and ought to be explained.

Again: there is manifest error in looking only to the deposit banks. The operation of the order would seem to be to bring specie into them, and take it away from the others; strengthen them, in this respect, while it weakened all the rest. To prove that they have more specie and more power to accommodate, is only to establish the charge against the order for its unequal operation, unless it be also proved that more specie has been brought by it into the country and into the other banks also, so that the whole amount of the currency has been strengthened. These deposit banks are, I think, eighty-one in number, with some branches. There are in the nation more than nine hundred banks. You do little for our paper currency, if you strengthen eighty-one to the injury of eight hundred—benefit a few to the destruction of the rest.

But I do not understand the matter as the Senator does, even as to the deposit banks themselves. In June last there were thirty-three of them. After the passage of the deposit act, they were increased to eighty-one. In June the thirty-three had a capital of $33,418,692 83. In November the eighty-one had a capital of $77,576,449 67.

To judge of their condition as to specie and accommodations, we must take their capital at the two periods, and compare the one with the other; and if the capital in November did not afford more of specie and accommodations in proportion to its amount than the lesser capital in June did in proportion to its amount, it will be difficult to persuade us that the banks have been strengthened, the currency benefited, or the public more accommodated. A few statements will show how this is. Throwing away the fractions, we may call the capital in June forty-six and a half millions, in November seventy-seven and a half millions.

In June the deposit banks had	-	$10,450,415 13
In November	-	15,520,202 42

Difference,	-	5,069,787 29
-------------	---	--------------

But if forty-six and a half millions gave ten and a half, then seventy-seven and a half ought to have given seventeen and a half—two millions more than they had in November. The deposit banks, in proportion to their capital, were not as strong in specie by two millions as they were in June before the order. A few of them, doubtless, had more, because the operation of the order was unequal; but while some were strengthened, according to the ideas of the Senator, others were weakened.

The same result will be found in their accommodations, consisting of loans, discounts, and exchanges.

In June they amounted to	-	$108,498,037 74
In November to	-	163,972,830 24

The increase being	-	55,474,792, 50
--------------------	---	----------------

But if the capital of forty-six and a half millions gave about one hundred and eight and a half, the capital of seventy-seven and a half ought to have given one hundred and eighty millions of accommodation, being sixteen millions more than they did give. Why should there have been this reduction? And if it were produced by this order, have we not found one cause of the acknowledged pressure?

Their circulation has been alluded to.

In June it was	-	$27,967,152 40
In November	-	41,482,897 82

But in proportion to their capital, it ought, in November, to have been about forty-six and a half millions, and was therefore about five millions less than it should have been.

The Senator considers this a strong argument in their favor; but does he not perceive, that while they were curtailing their circulation and discounts, they were pressuring the community severely? Nor am I satisfied that it was not their duty to the public, at least to continue, if not to enlarge, their accommodations. Their deposits had in the mean time increased nearly nineteen millions, from about fifty-seven to about seventy-six millions, almost two thirds of the capital which had been added to them, and not far from one fourth of their whole united capital. They had been placed in a condition of eminent control—they had it in their power to relieve the business of the country—their deposits were greatly increased—why did they not do it? The answer is, the Treasury order prevented. Take every species of accommodation which they afforded, and the result will make a strange exhibit. In June, loans, discounts, exchanges, and circulations, amounted to

But if the capital in June gave one hundred and thirty-six millions, that of November ought to have given two hundred and twenty-seven; twenty-two millions more than it did afford, and this with the increase of deposits. We have often been amused, if we have not been edified, by lengthy lectures (I hope the Senate will excuse the word) about the curtailments of the Bank of the United States, and most patriotic indignation was exhibited against it, for this cause. It is to be regretted that some of the denunciations could not now be directed to another er quarter—to banks disciplined into worse conduct by illegal orders of the Secretary.

But, Mr. President, while this operation was going on, and these banks withholding the aid which they ought to have given, they were acquiring relations with other banks, which threw obstacles in their way, and were calculated to make them do the same thing. I have not all the means necessary to exhibit the actual conduct of the other banks; but if they did not curtail, it was no fault of the Treasury order or of the deposit banks. A severe check was held over them. In June there was due to the deposit banks from other banks $17,867,869 49

A difference of $14,224,334 36 in the hands of the deposit banks, which they might demand at a moment, and for which their debtors were obliged to prepare, by withholding their accommodations.

Nor, while these effects were produced, does it appear, so far as specie alone, the panacea of the Senator, is concerned, that the circulation of these banks was any more safe. They had in June ten and a half millions of specie, to less than twenty-eight millions of circulation. In November, fifteen and a half to forty-one and a half of circulation—very nearly the same proportion.

But, should it be objected that it is not a fair test to apply such calculations to all the deposit banks, scattered so widely, and so various in their conditions, I answer that this is a question of currency; that which affects a part, affects all, in a greater or less degree; and the merit or the demerit of the Treasury movement must always be tested by its results upon the whole, and not on a part. Could it be proved that it had benefited the Western banks, which received the proceeds of the sales of the land, while it had injured the rest of the Union, it would be a conclusive argument against it.

But let us inquire what its effects have been there, and take the banks in Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, which will test the value of this experiment as well as any others.

These in June last had a capital of	-	$1,928,121 88

Now, this increase is only about $114,000 more than they ought to have had, without the forcing process which was resorted to. It is a small sum, and at ordinary times might have been acquired in four months by a capital of two and a half millions, without alarm or distress. It was manifestly rather the means adopted than the result, which agitated the currency. It is to be regretted that we have not before been favored with the actual receipts of specie in the land offices, that we might compare them with former years, and learn two things: 1. What increase of specie there has been in the receipts over former years, in proportion to the whole amounts received on the sales. And, 2. What was the diminution in the sales created by this order. These points would furnish salutary guides in forming our judgments on this topic. By the report of the Secretary, received a few moments before I rose to address you, I perceive that the receipts of the four months, including August and November, were only about $1,800,000. Can it be true, sir, that this was the whole amount received in those four most productive months? Were the sales diminished to such an extent, and by a mere executive order? If it be so, the device to diminish the sums to be received by the States under the deposit law has been eminently successful. How far its fairness and justice will be approved by the people of the Union, remains for them to decide.

By that report it appears that there was received for the sales of public lands in these four months, $1,802,939

In August, during one half of which payments were made in bank notes as well as specie	$307,456
--	-----------

In September	584,693

In October	691,915

Thus it appears that in all our land offices $11,419 were received under the operation of the order in November more than in August, during half of which it was not in operation. Was it worth while to derange the currency and produce distress and confusion for such a result?

It is apparent, I think, from this amount, that there has not been fair dealing in relation to these payments; and whenever we shall receive an account of the sales, I do not believe it will appear that less than two millions worth of the land was sold within that period.

The deposit banks in those three States gave accommodation, by loans, discounts, exchanges, and circulation,

In June, to	-	$7,519,037 91
-------------	---	----------------

Thus it appears that while their capital was increased $77,445 82, more than one third, their accommodation was increased $186,117 60, less than one fourth. How does the Senator propose to answer and explain this fact? Will he not see in it another cause for the pressure? At the same time their relations with other banks stood in this condition: In June they held debts and notes amounting to $3,356,149 30; in November, to $4,045,755 52; a sufficient increase to be wielded with great power. In the meanwhile, also, their deposits had increased nearly $700,000.

In the review of these statements, it seems to me that the "logic of figures" proves little that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BEXFORD] attempts to establish. It shows, on the contrary, that neither the specie in the deposit banks, nor their accommodations, have increased in proportion to their capital, and, instead of benefiting the operation of the Treasury, has injured the business and facilities of the country.

But, Mr. President, this is not the worst aspect of the order. When it was issued, the community and all the banks in the Union perceived that the desire to purchase public lands would create a strong effort to obtain specie, to be used for that purpose; and that whatever could be procured would be sent in that direction, and deposited, and shut up in a few banks in the new States. Individuals who possessed it retained it, in the confident hope that its value would appreciate. The banks retained it, because they could not tell what drafts would be made upon them for it, and whether a large amount of their ordinary circulation would not be thrown back upon them; and they feared to extend, but rather felt it necessary to contract their accommodations. All classes felt that it must derange the ordinary course of business and commerce, and, as a matter of necessity, not choice, they withheld the means from the use of others.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] seems quite indignant that the terms "tampering with the currency" should be applied to orders and effects like these. What is it, sir, but tampering, when orders are issued without warning, without authority, affecting every dollar of money in the Union, and changing the course of business? There is an intimate, sensitive relation between the course of business and the currency. You cannot touch one part of it without affecting the rest. Diminish the specie or raise its price in New Orleans, and it is instantly felt in New York and Boston. And when the cause which touches it is the simple order of the Executive, the sensation is the more deep and appalling. They who feel it do not know, and cannot anticipate, what will come next, nor how soon it will come; distrust, fear, apprehension, guards, are the consequences. It is far less so when the change is produced by the legislative power. Its action is more open, deliberate, less changeable, less dependent on local causes and the will of one or a few. This order did change the course of business. It required specie to be carried from the creditor to the debtor portions of the country; from the seats of business and wealth, where it was wanted, and in constant action, to points where it was not wanted, and could not be used, and, under express orders, was to be shut up.

It necessarily produced serious evil to the poor, while it operated less upon the wealthy. The man in moderate circumstances could not obtain his specie to buy his small tract, but by going to a bank to procure it, adding greatly to his trouble and expense. The rich man could obtain his thousands, and make his purchases. He could turn over and over again what he had, by paying a small sum to the broker, who was near by. He could make his $500 buy a tract; when deposited, he could borrow the same $500 again, at a business transaction premium, buy another tract, and repeat the operation until he was satisfied. A better device to oppress the poor, and subvert speculation, never was made. And there is no hazard in saying that less land has been bought by the poor and the actual settler, in proportion, than under the laws as before administered. The same effect has been felt wherever the order has reached. The wealthy have suffered little. Their money has been worth to them from two to five per cent. per month. It is an excellently good specimen of the value of those pretences which have misled popular opinion, temporarily. They have all terminated, sir, in making "the rich richer and the poor poorer"—which is one of the despicable phrases which disingenuous fraud so often uses in our country.

There is no occasion for surprise at the state of the money market, and that perfectly solvent paper should sell for from  $\frac{1}{2}$  to 5 per cent. per month.

But we are assured that the evils which the country has experienced resulted, not from the Treasury order and executive interference, but from the deposit act of last session. I admit, Mr. President, that it was a combination of the order and the execution of the deposit bill, with other causes, which produced it; but I deny that the slightest inconvenience ought to have resulted from the execution of the latter. It was an offensive law to the Executive, and received a reluctant approval; and it has been so treated as, if possible, to make it unpopular with the country; and, as one of its friends, I owe no thanks to the Department for the blundering and mischievous manner of its execution.

What was that law, and what did it require the Secretary to do? It provided that the surplus which should be in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1837, should be divided among the States according to their number of electoral votes, and that one fourth of it should be paid on the 1st of January, one fourth on the 1st of April, one fourth on the 1st of July, and one fourth on the 1st of October. I was opposed to so great delay in the payment, but was overruled; but I certainly did not anticipate the mode in which it would be done. The Secretary has told us that it will amount to about thirty-seven millions. Then the law simply required the Secretary to place about nine millions of money in twenty-six States, or in places where those States would be willing to receive it, by the 1st of January. The law passed on the 23d of June, and the Secretary had six months to perform the operation. He had in the Treasury in June more than this amount, which was not needed for the immediate wants of the Government, and the revenue was constantly coming in, to supply the place of any sum the position of which might be changed. There was then no obstacle to a transfer and deposit of the shares of the States. And what amount of transfers were required? There were deposit banks in all the States, I believe, except four—New Jersey, Delaware, Illinois, and Arkansas. These deposit banks being in the States, chartered by them, and having their confidence, were the places where the States would have been willing to receive their money; and the Secretary had only to leave or place it there until it was put under the control and disposition of the State authorities. Now, of the twenty-six States, there were, as appears by the public documents, fourteen or fifteen which already had in their banks their full share, and of course no transfers were necessary as to them. All the others (except the four mentioned before) had a greater or smaller proportion of the amount, and the balance only was to be transferred. And, with respect to several of these, the Secretary knew, or ought to have known, that they would prefer to receive their money exactly where it was when the law passed, because drafts on it there were at an advance. There was not more than three and a half millions which it was necessary to move at all. And yet this is the operation which is charged with a derangement of the currency. Every dollar of it might have been made to fall in with the business of the country, and to give facilities to it. None, at least none to any amount, required actual manual transfer. The Senate knows how the Secretary has dealt with it. He has given transfer warrants to the bank which was to receive the money, and thus placed it in their power to call for it when and in what currency they pleased. The paying banks, of course, have been obliged to draw in their means, to be prepared for the payment. The result was inevitable. If, on the other hand, the Secretary had simply given notice to the paying banks that they must, by a given day, say 20th of December, place the sums required in the banks to which they were to be paid, it could have been done without difficulty or derangement. Take an example: New York had to place $100,000 in North Carolina; the bank in New York would purchase drafts on North Carolina, and by other means obtain a credit on funds there in the ordinary course of its operations. The drafts paid in the bank there would have deposited the money there at a profit, perhaps, to the paying bank, and to the benefit of the commercial and other relations between the two places. A simple notice that they would purchase drafts might have accomplished it. And, once placed in the banks of the States, the States themselves, in their use of it, would have been bound, both by inclination and interest, so to have drawn it out and disposed of it as not to injure or embarrass their own institutions and their own citizens. The same process would have been sufficient for the subsequent quarterly payments.

Why, then, should this deposit act be charged with any derangement of the currency? with any part of the pressure? If it has occasioned any, it has arisen from the mismanagement or perverseness of the Secretary. He has made this law the means of playing a game of battledoor and shuttlecock with the currency of the country, and, during the process, he has added his Treasury order! to shut up a portion of the specie, and thus make "confusion worse confounded." So far as I can understand the subject, I cannot approve his conduct. The order appears to me to have placed the specie exactly where it was least wanted—created distrust and want of confidence—collected the revenue where it was not needed, and from whence it can only be transported with expense—and essentially deranged the exchanges. I do not stop to prove that they are deranged, nor to combat the assertions from high places that they are in as good or a better condition than for several years past. No man of ordinary capacity in the country can or does believe them, but all regard them as the offspring of ignorance or recklessness. Nor shall I resist by argument the assertion that the order "is conveying into the interior large sums in silver and gold, there to enter permanently into the currency of the country, and place it on a firmer foundation." I do not believe that the assertion is credited even by the person who penned it. I know not who he was. The President, I feel assured, did not; nor, in his state of health, could he have examined it with care.

There is one circumstance connected with the pretences, or, if you please, reasons for this order, which is worthy of remark. They have been acted on by the Executive, either in direct violation of the known will of Congress, or to supply what were regarded as defects or omissions in our legislation. They embrace two subjects—the public lands and the currency—neither of them within the constitutional control of the Executive; both of them before Congress in the session which had expired seven days before the order was issued.

Our journals show that we had under consideration, in various forms, the proper disposition of the lands: our attention was invited to it by the Executive; and we had bills and speeches in abundance to guide us. A select committee reported a bill to arrest monopolies of the public lands and purchases thereof for speculation, and substitute sales to actual settlers only, in limited quantities, and at reduced prices, &c., &c., (page 436;) and it rested, I believe, without an effort for its passage. We had a bill to change the mode of sales, and it was postponed indefinitely, on motion of Mr. Walker, and every supporter of the administration voting to postpone and defeat it; and yet, as soon as we had left our seats, the Executive issued an order to legislate on these very subjects, and carry out the views of a portion of his friends, but a small minority of the Senate, and against the will of the majority.

The currency, also, was the theme of repeated motions, disquisitions, and projects. The President had pressed it upon Congress. On the 10th June, (page 420,) the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] introduced, on leave; the celebrated bill entitled a bill "to establish the currency of the constitution for the Federal Government," which proposed that the Government should refuse the notes of all banks which issued those of less than $20, after March, 1837; of $50, after March, 1838; of $100, after March, 1839; of $500, after March, 1840; of $1,000, after March, 1841; and all notes of all banks after 1842. On the 27th June, on motion of Mr. Wright, this bill was laid upon the table. The same Senator, on 22d June, (page 464,) offered a resolution requesting the President "to cause inquiries to be made of the deposit banks, and of other banks of good credit, to ascertain whether any of said banks, in consideration of being made or continued depositories of the public moneys, will agree to enter into arrangements to discontinue the use and circulation of all paper currency of less denomination than $20; and also to promote the circulation of gold, by paying all the currency issued by it in gold and silver, the proportion of each to be at present according to the best ability of the bank, and eventually one half of each, the demander to have the option of one half of either metal, and the bank the other." This resolution was laid on the table, on motion of Mr. Mangum, and never afterwards disturbed.

Why were these movements made in the Legislature? If the Executive possessed the power under the laws, why was it not exercised? Why did the Executive wake up to a knowledge of its rights and duties a few days afterwards? Was it that the delusion of the specie currency had come to a stand, and the people must still be blinded a little longer by actions, when professions had grown stale? Was it that a deposit bill was to be defeated as far as practicable in its salutary effects?

A still more decisive expression of opinion was also given by Congress in the deposit bill itself. In the 5th section of that act it was declared that no bank should be selected or continued as a deposit bank, which should, after the 4th July, 1836, issue notes of less denomination than $5; nor should the notes of any bank be received in payment to the United States, which issued notes for less than that sum. This law established, as clearly as law can, the opinion of Congress, that bank notes were to be received for dues to the Government; and that it was not wise, for the present, to confine the circulation to notes of a larger denomination than $5. And yet this order was issued within less than twenty days afterwards, forbidding any bank notes to be received for the public lands.

Where was the respect for a co-ordinate branch of the Government, the only power of regulation on this subject, when its opinion, thus expressed, was spurned? Did not the Executive know—had not these proceedings informed him—what Congress thought upon these topics? And did it comport with the courtesy due from him thus to spurn their opinion, and execute his own purposes? It is painful, sir, to contemplate such conduct; and I am not prepared to give it even a "reluctant approval."

But, Mr. President, the worst aspect of this order is its total illegality. It has nothing on which to rest in the constitution and laws of the land. I propose to examine it in that aspect; and, in doing it, hope for the pardon of the Senator from Connecticut, if I should be compelled to use the ordinary process of reasoning familiar to lawyers. He seems to think very badly of them, and rejects them as safe guides. It is to be hoped that this hostility will not lead him quite up to the famous precedent given by Shakspeare, in the times of Henry VI, when Jack Cade, the clothier, undertook "to dress the Commonwealth, and turn it, and set a new nap upon it;" and promised to "apparel all the people in one livery, that they might agree like brothers, and worship him their lord." Dick, the butcher, thereupon said to him, "The first thing we do, let's kill all the lawyers;" and Cade answered, "Nay, that I mean to do. Is not this a lamentable thing, that of the skin of an innocent lamb should be made parchment?—that parchment being scribbled o'er, should undo a man?" If the Senator will permit us to look at a legal question with legal lights, we shall reach a conclusion satisfactory to ourselves, if not to him.

[At this point of Mr. SOUTHARD's remarks the Senate adjourned. The bill for the admission of Michigan was taken up the next day, and the Treasury order not resumed until the 6th January. Before the adjournment, however, Mr. RIVES offered an amendment to his amendment, which directed the selection of the notes to be received, to be made by the banks, with the approbation of the Secretary.]

When the Senate adjourned, Mr. President, I was commencing the examination of the legal right and power of the Executive to issue the order. We must regard it as the act of the President. The Secretary, aware, I suppose, of its questionable character, thought it proper to vary from the usual form, and state upon its face that it was issued by direction of the President, and thus interpose the President's popularity between himself and his appropriate responsibility. It is an old finesse of conscious weakness; and has become the pitiful resort of incompetency and error on all occasions, and it has generally proved sufficient. The "President authorized it," is argument and logic enough; reason has no business, after that, to intermeddle impertinently. The Secretary, doubtless, thought that the Deus intersit, because the dignus vindice nodus, had been found. But it is of little consequence to us who was the author of the act, provided we have independence enough not to be alarmed at the idea of casting "censure" upon "President Jackson." The question ought to be, not who authorized the order, but is it justified by law?

Its objects and effects are, to regulate the currency and the sales of the public lands, and they are so declared on the face of the order, in the report of the Secretary, the message of the President, and the defence on this floor. Neither of them is, in its nature, or by the principles of the constitution, under the power of the Executive. Aware of this, and unwilling boldly to deny it, its advocates do not pretend to defend the order on the broad constitutional right of the President to interfere with them, without the sanction and direction of Congress, but take refuge under the laws, and endeavor to pervert them to its defence. By these, therefore, they must stand or fall. They are mainly two—the resolution of April, 1816, and the law of the 24th April, 1820, and the practice under them.

We are to decide upon these by the same rules which regulate the construction of all other laws; and, to my mind, their meaning is free from all reasonable doubt. And, first, of the resolution of 1816. The circumstances under which it was passed, the evil to be remedied, its words, and the action of Congress and the Treasury Department, all point clearly to one construction, and one only.

The charter of the old bank expired in 1811; the nation, during the war of 1812, had suffered severely from the state of the currency; bank paper had depreciated; the paper of the Government had failed to afford a remedy; the banks, in three fourths of the Union, had refused to redeem their notes in specie; the Treasury had applied all the means under its control to induce them to resume specie payments; the dues of the Government were received in worthless paper; it was accumulating in their Treasury; and we all recollect it in the shape of a million or two of unavailable funds. The evil was, the refusal of the banks to redeem their notes in specie; the remedy was, to restore specie payments. Relief was to be found by Congress, for the evil was intolerable. Wise or unwise, constitutional or not, they adopted the expedient of chartering a bank. They made it the depository of the public money, agreed to receive its notes, and required it to pay specie on demand. The object of its creation was the restoration of specie payments, and bringing back the currency to the sound condition in which it had formerly been. The task was difficult, and Congress was disposed to afford all the aid in its power. The charter was passed on the 10th of April; and twenty days afterwards, before the adjournment of Congress, before a dollar was subscribed to the bank, the resolution was passed, and is entitled "A resolution relative to the more effectual collection of the public revenue." They may be regarded as coterminous acts, both having the same object. That object was not to require all the currency to be specie, nor all the dues to the Government to be paid in specie. The man who had proposed either, at that day, would have been regarded as laboring under the delirium of madness. The evil was not that all the currency was not specie, for it never had been so in the history of the Government. It was not that the Government could not get specie only for its claims, for it never had demanded specie only. But it was that the currency had degenerated into worthless paper, and that the Government was paid in that paper; and the object was to restore the currency, and obtain paper which would be redeemed on demand; to compel the banks to resume specie payments. The evil was depreciated paper; the remedy, to take only that which was not depreciated. It was not intended to restore what is called "the currency of the constitution." It was not to have a currency altogether of gold and silver, for that was utterly impracticable. It was not to exclude specie-paying notes, but to obtain them. Under these circumstances, it would be extraordinary if the resolution bore a construction which would authorize the Secretary to refuse them altogether.

It has two parts—one prescribing the duty of the Secretary, and the other expressing the opinion of Congress as to the time within which the duty might be accomplished. The first is mandatory, the second advisory. The first requires and directs the Secretary "to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States. The second part declares that nothing but the kinds of money so specified ought to be received after the 20th of February then next. It prescribes four kinds of money, either of which the Secretary was at liberty to receive; and he was to receive none other but those. But had he the power to refuse any one of these? Could he have rejected specie? Treasury notes? notes of the Bank of the United States? If not, on what principle of construction could he reject the other, when Congress had placed them on the same footing, and directed his duty in the same phraseology? Does any man believe that Congress intended that he should refuse them? Did Congress or the Secretary then so understand it? Surely not. And are we not bound now to give the construction which was then intended, and then understood, by all parties? At that day there was no dispute about it. All regarded it as directing the Secretary to receive notes payable and paid on demand in specie. The then Executive, and every Executive since, has construed and practised upon it in the same way, until the 11th July last, when new and strange light broke into the executive mansion, and from a source better calculated, I fear, to mislead than to direct.

The Senate will remark that while the resolution prescribes the kinds of money to be received, it draws a plain distinction between legal currency and the money which it would receive. The former was established by law, and was the guide between creditor and debtor, between citizen and citizen, and the Government had a right to claim it. But it had also a perfect right to waive it, and receive any thing else in its stead. And, in this resolution, it points out three kinds of money which it would receive, which were not legal currency—Treasury notes, United States Bank notes, and notes of other banks. We shall see that this distinction is important, in the progress of this examination; and it is because it has been overlooked, that confusion has crept into the arguments of some of those who defend this order. The resolution has nothing to do with establishing or declaring the legal currency; it deals only with, and prescribes rules for, the payment of debts to Government. They who rely upon it ought to prove that Congress had no right to declare that the Government would receive any thing but legal currency. If they had that right, and have declared that they will receive something else, what authority has the Secretary to say that nothing else shall be received? To me it seems clear that, by the words and exposition of the resolution, the Executive had no authority to refuse notes of specie-paying banks.

But it has been objected that this construction, by imposing on the Secretary the necessity of receiving these notes, compels him to receive all, and, of course, to take notes of inconvenient, or, perhaps, insolvent banks, and that the practice has been to select and refuse such as he saw fit. I answer, to require him to receive notes of specie-paying banks does not compel him to receive those which are not equal to specie at the place where they are paid. It is a false construction to say that he must take such notes when they are at a discount; for they are not then specie-paying to the officer who receives them; he cannot turn them into specie without loss; they are not equivalent to specie. He takes them because he can get an equal amount of specie on demand for them. This he cannot do if the bank be at a distance; its notes are not then worth specie. Much less can he be required to take those the solvency of which is justly questioned. Congress intended to authorize the receipt of notes which were convertible into specie without loss. It would be quite as correct to argue that the Secretary, being bound to receive specie, was therefore obliged to receive that of which he doubted the weight and genuineness, and which could not be passed for the amount which its denomination indicated. He must exercise his judgment whether the notes are good, will be paid on demand, and are equal to specie where they are offered. Beyond this he has no discretion. Besides, the order which we are considering does not direct the rejection of those notes only which are suspicious, of banks at a distance, and which are at a discount, but of all notes, the very best, those of banks in the immediate neighborhood, and which could be converted into specie without delay and without cost; and to prove, if he receive all, that he may receive some which are not of full value, is an odd mode of reasoning to reach the conclusion that he may reject all.

But, if this inconvenience do exist in the rule, we must recollect that we are discussing, not its policy and expediency, but its meaning; not what the law ought to be, but what the law is, and, of course the power and duty of the Executive in regard to it. If he have not the power by law, it should be denied to him. If the law be not right, let Congress amend it.

But, Mr. President, I deny the very foundation of the argument in support of this order; the point from which it starts and at which it ends. It rests on the assumption that gold and silver are the currency of the constitution, and thence it is inferred that the resolution is to be construed in relation to it, and that the Executive is justifiable in restoring it by his orders and regulations to the country. There is no such thing as a currency of the constitution in any other sense than that which regards all matters within the legitimate powers of Congress as constitutional. In that sense, the courts, the departments, the customs, are the courts, departments, and customs, of the constitution. The constitution has provided no currency for the Union. The 5th item, 8th section, of the 1st article, says that "Congress shall have power to coin money, and regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coins." It may coin money, and may prescribe its value; it may coin gold, silver, copper, tin, iron, whatever it pleases, and place what value upon it it sees fit. The power is unrestricted and unlimited. It is the power to create a currency for the Union, according to the condition and necessities of the Union.

The confederation had no currency; and, until Congress exercised the power, the Union had no currency. When it did exercise it, it created a currency in conformity with the constitution, but in no other sense the currency of the constitution. It might have established other metals as coins, have given them different values, have required gold and silver to pass at a higher or lower standard, and they would have been equally the currency of the constitution as they now are. Congress has changed the fineness and standard value of coins, and might have changed them still more, and been equally within its constitutional powers. The cant phrase "currency of the constitution," means nothing more nor less than the currency which Congress has established in virtue of the authority conferred upon it, and which it may alter at pleasure. It might, so far as its power is concerned, have established any other. Gold and silver are the legal currency, the current money, and are constitutional only because they have been made legal; but, without an act of Congress, they would have been no currency. There is, sir, another provision on this subject in the same article, section 10, item 1: "No State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, nor make any thing but gold and silver a tender in the payment of debts." The reasons for this provision are abundantly found in the history of the Revolution and of the confederation. The power was wisely taken from the States; the control of Congress was intended to be complete. One Senator [Mr. BUCHANAN] has said that, by some strange accident, Congress had lost all control in regard to the currency. It is so, and it is extraordinary that his memory does not direct him to that accident. But the constitution was not created in that spirit, nor with that view. With Congress the regulation of the currency is a question not of power, but of policy; with the States it is a question not of policy, but of power. Congress wisely established a currency of gold and silver, and made them a legal tender at a standard nearly corresponding with that of the nations with whom we have most commercial intercourse; and in this respect its duty was well done, and its policy will, I trust, never be changed. But it had the power to create another medium and another standard. I should not have thought these remarks necessary, if we had not incessantly, for two or three years past, heard of the currency of the constitution in bills and speeches which, however unsound, seem to have been suited to the political market. I proceed to examine the action of Congress upon this subject.

The law of the 31st of July, 1789, the fifth upon your statute book, regulating the collection of duties, directs that they shall be "received in gold and silver coin only," at the following rates: The gold of France, England, Spain, and Portugal, and all other gold of equal fineness, at 89 cents for every pennyweight; the Mexican dollar at 100 cents; a crown of France and of England at $1 11, and all other silver of equal fineness, at $1 11 per ounce. This law is referred to by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report of the 26th April, 1836, and he seems to consider it as a recognition by Congress that gold and silver alone were a legal tender, and alone ought to be received for dues to the Government. Speaking of the authority to direct what money shall be received for public lands, he says: "This Department entertains the opinion that Congress alone possesses that authority in the first instance, to be enforced by the Treasury as the chief fiscal agent of the Government, under such constructions of the laws relating to the subject as seem reasonable. An authority of this kind was accordingly exercised by that body as early as 1789, by requiring all duties on foreign imports to be 'received in gold and silver only,' by subsequently directing payment for the public lands to be made in 'cash,' and by often recognising the principle countenanced in the constitution (in the prohibition of any State to 'make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts') that such a coin alone should generally be permitted to be used as a legal tender either by or to the United States." A more muddy phraseology could not well be found than this of our Secretary, and he shall be my Magnus Apollo who will construe it by any known rules. He seems, however, to assert that Congress had often, and especially by the act of 1789, recognised the principle that gold and silver alone should be used as money with which to pay to the Government. He makes a great mistake. Congress has never recognised that principle, and in that act had no reference to legal currency or legal tenders. They were deciding only what they would receive for the duties. A legal currency was not established until the 2d of April, 1792, nearly three years afterwards; and they directed the receipt of coins which never have been made a lawful tender: the crown of England, and all other gold and silver, not enumerated in our laws, giving currency to foreign coins. That act establishes only that Congress drew a distinction between legal currency and the moneys which they were willing to receive; but it does not recognise a currency, nor prescribe to its agents the rule that such coins alone as have since been made a legal tender "should generally be permitted to be used as a legal tender either by or to the United States." The first reference fails the Secretary. He must not rest upon this law to justify him in the pretence that, by the order of 11th July, he was carrying out the expressed will of Congress.

He seems to admit—and I use the word seems with becoming caution—he seems to admit that there was no direct action of Congress on this subject of payments to the Government, from this law of 1789, to the charter of the bank and the resolution of 1816. If that be so, there was then, up to the latter period, no declaration by Congress that the legal currency alone should be received for dues to the Government, and no direction or will of Congress to be carried out by the action of the Executive. And the practice as to the receipts was directly the reverse of the order of the 11th July. Almost immediately after the law of 1789, as soon as the collections commenced under it, Mr. Hamilton, the then Secretary of the Treasury, received into the depositories of the Treasury notes of banks which were convertible into specie. He took care that they should be notes of solvent banks—convertible—equal to specie where they were received. Our Secretary considers this as a modification of the enactments and principles of the law. What right had Mr. Hamilton to modify the law? He did no such thing. He knew that Congress intended rather to prescribe the value to be received than the medium in which the duties should be paid; that the object was to receive specie or its equivalent. His construction was known to and sanctioned by Congress, and it became the settled practice—the common law of the Government, and continued, with every legal sanction, from his day down to the resolution of 1816; and I know of no authority which could change it without the command of Congress.

During the war of 1812, and after its termination, the banks south and west of New York suspended specie payments, and yet their notes were received by the Government. It was of necessity, not choice; but it proves the practice, and confirms the assertion that the Secretary and the advocates of this order are in error when they suppose that there was any thing which required gold and silver only to be received for dues to the Government prior to 1816. The practice itself had the force of law, and Congress alone, in whom rested the control of the currency and of the Treasury of the nation, could alter it. An interference with it by the Executive was an assumption of undelegated authority.

There is nothing in our laws or practice to impugn this view, unless it be the act of 2d April, 1792, establishing the mint, and the laws making foreign coins a lawful currency. That act, section 16, (1 Laws, 267,) declares that "all the gold and silver coins which shall have been struck at, and issued from, the said mint, shall be a lawful tender in all payments whatsoever," &c.

But this merely establishes the currency—the lawful tender; and has nothing to do with the question what the Government will receive for its dues. That it is to be decided by the practice and by other laws, and the Executive has no lawful authority to violate that practice and those laws. The laws relating to foreign coins as a legal tender commenced with the act of 9th February, 1793.

It declares, 1. That the gold coins of England, Portugal, France, and Spain, shall pass current as money, at the rates then fixed, as shall also the Spanish milled dollar and its parts, until three years after the mint shall commence to coin, after which only the Spanish milled dollar and its parts were to pass current.

This coin had been the common currency before this act, and is the only one which, through all changes and at all times, has been a lawful, recognised tender between citizen and citizen. But this act, section 3, directly recognises the right of the United States to receive other foreign gold and silver coins in payment, and directs the officers who receive them to send them to the mint to be recoined. Thus establishing the fact that, at the moment of fixing the currency, they received what was not made lawful, and therefore no argument can be drawn from the currency to justify the act of the Secretary. He must look only to those laws and resolutions which relate to the moneys which the Government has agreed to receive. Under this law all foreign coins would have ceased to be a lawful tender three years after the mint went into operation. This period was fixed by a proclamation of the President, dated 22d July, 1797, to be for silver coins, except Spanish milled dollars, on the 15th October, 1797, and for gold, on the 31st July, 1798. (See 5 Laws, appendix, 511.) But the law was suspended from time to time, although no alteration was made in the foreign coins which should be received, until the act of the 25th June, 1834, which added the dollar of Mexico, Peru, Chili, and Central America, and that restamped in Brazil, and the five-franc piece of France; which then became a legal tender. But still, other foreign coins were received by the Government, and still are received.

We have, then, the practice and the laws up to the passage of the resolution of 1816, and find nothing to justify the Secretary in his order.

The character of that resolution has been considered, and we have to inquire whether the practice since comports with the construction which I have put upon it. The first action under it was by Mr. Crawford, and his conduct is referred to as authority for this order.

I am not the assailant of Mr. Crawford, nor his apologist for any errors which he may have committed. I was not his advocate, and to this hour have been made to feel the penalty of my offence. I leave his defence to those who were his particular friends in his palmy days—some of whom have strangely changed positions since that time. I thought he sometimes stretched the law beyond the meaning of the law, but he did nothing on this subject which could be a justification for this order.

He had been compelled to receive depreciated paper, for there was nothing else in which the Government could be paid. He was a good democrat—the very model of those who now claim the name; yet he used all the power of influence and of argument to induce Congress to charter the late bank. His argument in its favor is one of his ablest efforts. He had to aid that bank in restoring the currency of the country to a sound condition; and the resolution of 1816 was enacted to give him countenance and support. It was, of course, his duty to go as far as that resolution authorized him to go; and the point at which he stopped his successors ought to have hesitated to pass.

The Secretary, in his report of 26th April last, seems in some difficulty to give us a correct and safe history of his acts, on account of the burning of the Treasury. Fire seems to be either a warm friend or a desolating enemy to the existing administration. It will afford or avoid many an explanation, when errors and corruptions are alleged against it. It may truly be said to be an administration purified and cleansed by fire. But enough remains on this point to enable us to understand Mr. Crawford's conduct correctly.

Under that resolution, and the law chartering the bank, he was bound by his duty to receive and place in that bank the public moneys; and to receive, after the 20th February, 1817, nothing but specie, Treasury notes, notes of the Bank of the United States, or notes of specie-paying banks. To effect this end, he had to deal with banks which had refused specie for their notes, had resumed it, and subsequently stopped again.

He did not direct that notes of specie banks should be refused, but gave directions that the officers should not receive notes which would not be received by the Bank of the United States, in which he had to deposit them, and by which they were to be credited and paid, either in their own notes, or in specie. What less could he have done to perform his duty? He further requested the depositors to give notice to the receivers what notes they would so consider. This was justifiable, because Congress had created the depository, and had required the treasure to be placed in it, and had not, at the same time, required that depository to receive any money but that which it was willing to receive. The Secretary could accomplish the two great objects of his duty—to aid in compelling the banks to resume specie payments, and thereby restoring a sound currency, and to deposit the public money in the Treasury provided for it—in no other way.

But, when this example is cited by the Secretary and by Senators, do they not perceive the strong contrasts between the acts of 1817 and of 1836? When the order now under consideration was issued, there was no obligation on the Secretary to restore a currency already sound, at least not declared to be unsound by Congress, and there was no Treasury designated by Congress which had refused to receive the notes which the Secretary has rejected.

The precedent manifestly does not sustain the act.

Mr. Crawford did not forbid all specie-paying notes; he only required that those received should be equivalent to specie where they were paid; and all his regulations were governed by two considerations—

1. To receive all the kinds of money mentioned in the resolution of Congress;

2. To take the notes of banks in such way that they could be received into the Treasury; and that no money should be lost by taking notes of insolvent banks.

Mr. Crawford did receive notes of specie-paying banks. This he could not have done, if the laws and resolutions of Congress required only gold and silver. The phrase "currency of the constitution" had not then acquired its potency in Congress, nor among the people; nor had the adroit reformers of that currency undertaken to restore it "for the Federal Government."

The acts of Mr. Crawford were called in question, and he was accused and tried—and a verdict of acquittal pronounced. His defence gave him more reputation than any other production of his life; and if one who hears me were absolved from his honorary obligation to secrecy, I doubt not he could tell us when, and where, and by whose aid, that production was prepared, and how that reputation was acquired.

In that trial, which took place before a most able committee of the House of Representatives, of which Mr. Livingston was chairman, and Mr. Webster one of the members, the conduct of Mr. Crawford was investigated, and their report is given in the documents of the House of Representatives.

It appears by it that the chief complaint was, not that Mr. Crawford received the notes of the specie-paying banks, or of any banks, but that, after they were received, he deposited the money in insolvent banks, and thereby lost it; and that he made corrupt bargains to give these State banks too much for receiving and transferring the public money. But neither his accuser nor the committee ever dreamed that it was his duty, under the laws then in force, or under the resolution of 1816, to refuse notes and demand specie. That very sage notion was reserved for these times, when the spargere voces ambiguas is the creed of the popular politician; when gold and silver have been converted into "the currency of the constitution," and men rest their claims to popular confidence on the unworthy cry of—gold, gold, silver, silver; no United States Bank; no United States Bank; the poor against the rich; the poor against the rich!—et id genus omne.

No United States Bank, sir! The hour is approaching rapidly when a different language will be held; when the successors of those who have made profit, in money and honors, by these impositions on popular credulity, will, under another name, perhaps, and by more specious devices, restore the substance, if not the form, of that great controller and purifier of the currency. And I, sir, for one, shall rejoice when that hour arrives, provided the object be boldly, manfully, and frankly avowed and accomplished, without local and personal objects, and with a single eye to the permanent and lasting interests of the nation.

The precedent of 1817, sir, proves only that Mr. Crawford and the then Executive considered themselves bound to receive bank notes which were equivalent to specie where they were paid; and that he gave directions to the receivers and the depositories to take them wherever they were equivalent to specie; and it condemns the bold assumption of the order of 11th July, which refuses all notes and demands specie only, without legal sanction for the usurpation of power—a usurpation perpetrated under advice which would destroy any administration, because it inflicts injuries which an intelligent nation cannot and will not bear.

The subsequent history of the practice under this resolution has been most unskillfully told by the Secretary, in his report before referred to, and has been unadvisedly adopted by the Senator from New Hampshire. It is stated that Mr. Crawford, in eighteen hundred and twenty-three, extended the indulgence of receiving at the Western banks notes of certain banks on the seaboard. The indulgence—why, sir, that indulgence was nothing more nor less than receiving for lands and other dues in the West the notes of banks which were not only worth specie, but which were, at the places at which they were received, the very best funds which the Government could obtain. They were notes of banks the drafts on which were at a premium. It was the receipt, not of actual specie, but of that which, for the uses of the Government, was worth more than specie. This is a singular kind of indulgence, and an odd kind of argument to show that the Treasury has the power to refuse all notes of all specie-paying banks. The resolution of 1816 requires the Secretary to receive specie-paying notes; he receives those of the local banks and of banks on which drafts are at a premium; and this is the indulgence of receiving notes instead of specie, and a proof that the Secretary of the Treasury may refuse all notes! Logical reasoning, this.

But I beg to inquire, if the law of 1820, the resolution of 1816, or any thing else, required specie only to be received, how could Mr. Crawford, in eighteen hundred and twenty-three, direct notes of Eastern banks to be received at the land offices in the West? The argument must cut both ways. It must prove that the legal currency, only, "ought generally to be permitted," and yet that the Secretary has the right to direct, by way of indulgence, the notes of any banks he selects to be received.

We are thus brought to the law of 24th April, 1820. To construe it correctly it is necessary that we should recollect the previous legislation.

The old Congress, on the 30th May, 1785, had directed certain of the public lands to be sold, and fixed the price at one dollar in specie, or loan office certificates reduced to specie, or certificates of liquidated debts of the United States. The provision was necessary, because there was then no other currency but specie and depreciated paper. The sole object was to secure a specified value or the land sold.

Several changes were made, but none affecting the question under discussion, until Congress, after the establishment of the Federal Government, on the 18th May, 1796, passed a law directing sales of certain parts of the land, and the terms; but it uses the expression, money—purchase-money, without designation of kind.

The act of 3d March, 1797, establishes the rates at which the evidences of public debt shall be received in payment for lands.

The law of 10th May, 1800, says that "payment may be made for the same by all purchasers, either in specie or in evidences of the public debt," &c., according to the provisions of the act of 1797. These acts are similar to that of 1789, respecting the customs, and were understood and practised on in the same way. Thus far sales had been on credit; and, notwithstanding the phraseology, the Secretary, with the knowledge and approbation of Congress, received notes of banks as equivalent to specie; the terms being regarded as fixing the amount to be received, not the kind of money.

Next came the resolution of 1816; and, whatever may have previously been the construction, it expressly authorized the receipts to be in notes of specie-paying banks. And this resolution, and the practice under it, were in full force when this act of 24th April, 1820, was passed.

Did this act repeal the resolution of 1816, and require the payments to be only in specie?

It is so suggested by the Secretary, and so argued by several Senators.

The Secretary says that directing payments to be made in "cash," countenanced the idea that such coin alone should be generally permitted to be received. And two Senators argue that cash payments can mean only payments in the lawful tender.

They all look to the 4th section, and to the word cash, as their guide, and overlook the 2d section, which is more important, to fix the meaning of the law. It relates to all sales of the public lands: the 4th only to resales of lands forfeited for non-payment. It provides that, in all sales, no credit shall be allowed after the 1st of July of that year; "but every purchaser at public sales shall, on the day of purchase, make complete payment therefor, and purchasers at private sales shall produce to the register a receipt from the Treasurer of the United States, or from the receiver, for the amount of the purchase-money," &c. It is perfectly apparent that this section relates only to the time of payment, and not at all to the currency in which payment should be made. The lands had been sold on credit; evils had resulted from it, and Congress declared that no more credits shall be given, but complete payment be made on the day of sale. The object was to reduce the price to $1 25, and to require cash sales; and they say nothing of specie or lawful tender, or currency of the constitution. This matter they left as it was before; and this we have seen was payment in specie or notes known to Congress, long practised and justified by the resolution of 1816. If they had intended to change the mode of payment they would have so said. They did not, and the practice continued until the 11th July last uninterrupted.

Does the 4th section alter this general provision for the sales of all the public land, and prescribe a different rule for the sales of the forfeited lands? It would be extraordinary if it did so. It merely provides that these forfeited lands shall not be sold for less price than the other lands, $1 25 per acre, "nor on any other terms than that of cash payment." In other words, that they shall be sold at the same price and on the same terms as all the public lands. Cash payment, in this section, means precisely what is meant in the 2d section by the words "shall on the day of purchase make complete payment therefor." It means payment at the time of entry. No lawyer, at least no judge, would put a different construction on them; and the Executive never did, until last July, when an apology was to be hunted up to justify an interference with the currency of the country, and to cover over the purpose of defeating, as far as possible, the operation of the distribution bill.

But even if the 4th section does require specie for the forfeited lands, it does not justify the order. That relates not to forfeited lands, but to all the public lands within the Union.

The only remaining precedent or authority to which we have been referred is the instruction of Mr. Rush, in 1826. He came in in 1825; found the notes of specie-paying banks constantly received; fell desperately in love with the Bank of the United States; lauded it highly, and desired to make it the sole instrument of the Treasury in its operations; and he directs the receivers to require specie, or notes payable in specie on demand, and otherwise in good credit; and not to receive notes which would not be received as cash where they were to be deposited, or which the receivers thought it not discreet to receive. Mr. Rush did not, in this, directly violate the resolution of 1816; because that resolution could not reasonably be construed to require the receipt of notes where they could not be turned into specie at full amount. But he did place in the hands of the receivers a discretion which might be wielded to oppressive results, where there was a desire to injure particular banks. The correct action, under that resolution, would have been to receive notes of State banks, which could, on demand, or near the office, and without loss, be turned into specie—to make the demand for payment promptly, and whenever that demand was not answered to refuse at once other notes of the bank.

Upon this review of the laws, resolutions, and practice, I have not been able to discover any thing which can justify the Executive in changing the mode of payment for the public lands—demanding specie and refusing all notes of all banks. It is an assumption of legislative power, and a violation of the plain meaning of the acts of Congress.

There is another feature in this order which deserves decisive reprobation. It forbids receiving any thing but gold and silver, "provided that until the 15th December next the same indulgences heretofore extended, as to the kind of money received, may be continued, for any quantity of land not exceeding 320 acres to each purchaser, who is an actual settler or bonafide resident in the State where the sales are made."

Treasury Circular.

[SENATE.]

The meaning is, that actual settlers or bonafide residents of the State may buy 320 acres, and pay for it in any money they please; all others must pay in gold and silver. I wish the Senator from New Hampshire had persuaded himself to bend his mind to this proviso. He seems to have examined the order with some labor, and to have been prepared with reasoning and references to sustain it; but he entirely overlooked this most extraordinary feature. After his argument was closed, his attention was called to it by the Senator from Ohio, but he was quite unprepared to give us a constitutional view of the difficulty which it presents. He, however, referred us to the exposition of the Senator from Mississippi; and I suppose that exposition is all that we are to hope for to relieve our consciences and satisfy our judgments.

The objection to this part of the order is, that it makes a distinction between actual settlers and others, and between the citizens of the States where the lands lie and all others, and allows advantages to the former which are denied to others. The argument in support of it, and to which we are referred, amounts to this: it is no violation of right, nor of the constitution, because the constitutional provision does not confer on the citizens of one State all the rights of citizens in every other State, such as voting, &c.; and there is a distinction recognised by law and practice in favor of actual settlers and against speculators, as in case of the pre-emption laws. The Senator will find it difficult from his premises to show the right of the Executive to create and establish distinctions between citizens, such as this order creates. He will discover, that he must make great leaps in his process of reasoning, and surmount more than one sturdy non sequitur—quite as troublesome as that resulting from the logic of figures.

The constitution, article 4, section 2, says: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

This is one item in that article which provides for the relative rights and duties of the Federal Government towards the States and towards each other, such as

Giving faith and credit to judicial proceedings;

Delivering up fugitives from justice, and from service or labor;

The admission and rights of new States;

The security of representative forms of government to all the States;

And the power to dispose of and make rules respecting the territory and property of the United States.

The association of it with these subjects shows the spirit in which it ought to be construed, and the object which it sought. This object was entire equality between the States and the citizens of all the States, freedom of intercourse, and interchange of privileges; and the article itself is the most important in that great work to accomplish some of its avowed ends, "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity," &c. Its construction, by every principle of legal and philosophical reasoning, should be liberal to attain these objects.

The terms are clear, and were intended to be a substitute for that article of the confederation which relates to the same subject, and which was most confused and inexplicable. "The citizens of each State"—all the citizens of every State—"to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States"—to all the immunities and privileges which the citizens of those States enjoy under similar circumstances.

Now, this does not mean the right of voting, whether an inhabitant or not; nor those other rights to which the Senator from Mississippi refers. The citizens of Pennsylvania have not the right of voting in New Jersey; and why? Because they have not the residence, and other qualifications, which are necessary. There are citizens of New Jersey, also, who, at particular elections, have no right to vote, not because they are not citizens, but because they have not resided in the county or township long enough, and paid taxes. The citizens of Pennsylvania have no right to vote there, for the same reason; yet the citizens of Pennsylvania are on a perfect equality with the citizens of the State, under like circumstances. Let them reside there the time, and do other acts prescribed for her own citizens, and they will have the same right.

They can acquire it in the same time and by the same means. The same rules govern with regard to both. One enjoys the right, because he has complied with the requirements; the other does not, because he has not complied.

So with regard to all other rights; any citizen of the Union may, in any State, enjoy the same rights as the citizens of that State, by doing what they have done, and placing himself in the same circumstances.

It is the common obligation of citizens in all the States to perform certain prescribed duties, in order to entitle them to the enjoyment of the common rights. If a citizen of any other State will perform the same prescribed duties, he shall have the enjoyment of the same common rights. And this article gives to every man, everywhere, the high and sacred privilege of being a citizen on the same terms. The Senator need not be alarmed about the hosts of Xerxes or of Petrus, and lest Delaware should pour out her million of votes on this construction. The adjoining States can afford her many voters, and when they shall have done what her own citizens have, they will be able to add to her popular vote, but not till then.

So, also, the interest in even the exclusive common property of a State may be acquired by any one becoming a citizen, and it may be lost by ceasing to be a citizen. The rule is equal to all.

This principle as to States is nothing more nor less than that which is applied at every election in every State, in regard to their counties. An inhabitant of one county cannot vote in another, because he does not reside in it; and so an inhabitant of one State cannot vote in another, because he does not reside in it; but each may, at his own pleasure, and on the same terms, relieve himself from his disability.

But whether this construction of the act can be carried thus far or not, is it not distinctly true that if there be special privileges, such as voting, which cannot be equally enjoyed, the distinction arises from State laws and institutions, not from the laws and institutions of the Union? And if this be so, how does it relieve the Executive when he draws distinctions in virtue of the powers of the Union? The States may make their own internal regulations, always regarding constitutional restraints; but does it follow that any such power has been vested in the General Government? and, above all, in the Executive of that Government? Does the constitution say that he may make distinctions in favor of a State—then may he not make them against a State? And is there not thereby a power erected which may trample upon the equality of the States—bestow favors upon favorites, and wreak vengeance upon opponents? Sir, I have not so read the constitution of my country. I have not so learned the doctrine of State rights. The grounds of defence here are abhorrent to every principle contained in our institutions; and an authority is claimed, which, if sanctioned and practised, will create a despotism or sever the Union.

There are great fundamental privileges and immunities belonging, of right, to all citizens of free Governments, and which have especially belonged to all the citizens of all the States since they became free, independent, sovereign, and confederated. Equal protection by Government; enjoyment of life, liberty; the acquisition and possession of property; the benefit of habeas corpus: passing through and residing in any part of the Union, for trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or other occupations; the maintenance of actions for the defence of rights; the purchasing, holding, and disposing of property, real and personal, with many others—these constitute us one nation—these make the Union. And shall the Executive, at his will, deny us the enjoyment of any one of them all? And shall he do it, especially, in relation to the common property of all—to the public lands? Do Senators remark the extent of the power which has been assumed? The common privilege and immunity is to buy and hold land where the citizen pleases, without being burdened in the acquisition and possession more than others; more than the citizens of the State where he acquires and holds it. Can this privilege be violated by a State? Can Indiana forbid a citizen of New Jersey from buying and possessing her lands? or, if he do buy, compel him to pay for it otherwise than her own citizens may? Not while the 4th article of the constitution exists—not while the Union lasts. Can Congress do it? And does the executive power reach to that which neither the State nor Congress may touch? Yet this the Executive has done, and done more. He has forbidden the people of other States to buy the common property of the Union, within Indiana and the other States, except under a severe restriction. And if he may impose one restriction, where shall he be limited?

I have always, Mr. President, esteemed this provision, and the article of which it forms a part, as the most precious in the constitution of the country, and most necessary for its peace and prosperity. You may alter the executive powers, enlarge or limit the Judiciary, amplify or restrain the Legislature, and your Government may still retain its character and usefulness; but violate and destroy that article, and the fabric is shattered: we are no longer common and equal citizens of a common and glorious nation, made glorious by equal laws.

And, sir, how is this act of the Executive, which violates that article, defended? The defence ought to be clear, beyond cavil or debate. I understand the Senator from Missouri to assert that there has heretofore been a distinction drawn and maintained between actual settlers and speculators in the land, between residents and non-residents; and that Congress has sanctioned the distinction, by numerous pre-emption and other laws, for above forty years—from the first plan for the sale of the public lands, down to the time when propositions were made for dividing the proceeds of the lands. The first evidence to which we are referred to sustain the allegation is an extract from the report of Mr. Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, in 1790. It is in the following words:

"That, in the formation of a plan for the disposition of the vacant lands of the United States, there appear to be two leading objects of consideration: one, the facility of advantageous sales, according to the probable course of purchases; the other, the accommodation of individuals now inhabiting the Western country, or who may hereafter emigrate thither. The former, as an operation of finance, claims primary attention; the latter is important, as it relates to the satisfaction of the inhabitants of the Western country. It is desirable, and does not appear impracticable, to conciliate both. Purchasers may be contemplated in three classes: moneyed individuals and companies, who will buy to sell again; associations of persons who intend to make settlements themselves; single persons or families, now resident in the Western country, or who may emigrate there hereafter. The two first will be frequently blended, and will always want considerable tracts; the last will generally purchase small quantities. Hence a plan for the sale of the Western lands, while it may have a due regard to the last, should be calculated to obtain all the advantages which may be derived from the two first classes."

Now, I do not understand Mr. Hamilton as the Senator from Missouri does. He was proposing a plan for the disposition of the public lands. To effect the sales was the leading object—"as an operation of finance, it claimed primary attention." This, he thought, ought to be pursued in conformity with the convenience and interests of those who were to buy and occupy them, as an inducement to them to make purchases. His scheme, therefore, had these objects, and none other. They could be attained most effectually by suiting the scheme to the character of the several kinds of purchasers; and he gives a list of them—a mere description of classes of men: moneyed individuals and companies, who buy to sell; associations to form settlements; and single persons or families, who had or might settle there. And it is this description or list which the Senator converts into a distinction "recognised in the nature of things, and sanctioned by laws."

But does Mr. Hamilton advise that any distinction shall be made between them—that the settlers shall be permitted to buy on other and better terms than other classes? This is the point complained of in the Treasury order; and the Senator must exercise both ingenuity and imagination before he will make the discovery of it in this paper. It requires optics keen to see what is not to be seen. On the contrary, Mr. H. expressly says: "Hence a plan for the sale of the Western lands, while it may have a due regard to the last, (the settlers,) should be calculated to obtain all the advantages which may be derived from the two first classes," (the moneyed individuals, companies, and associations.) This language needs no comment. It was reserved for the Senator to see in it a preference of the settler over the speculator. But if Mr. Hamilton did advise such a distinction and preference, it was advice only—not legislation: a plan for the sales—not an execution of the plan. Congress did not make a law which sanctioned it. The act of 1797, nor any other of the acts, contains any such provision. And thus we learn the value of this evidence, which is offered to defend the establishment of such a distinction and preference by an order of the Executive, and at the executive pleasure. And it is by such perversions of documentary evidence that executive usurpations are sustained.

Again, Mr. President, the Senator insists that the same distinction between settlers and those who are not—between residents and non-residents, has been drawn by the pre-emption laws. These laws have never been favorites of mine. They have produced frauds and perjuries without number. Where they have favored one honest claim, they have covered hundreds of those which are dishonest and base. They have offered rewards for the violation of law, and the plundering of the public property. But, bad as they are, they afford no apology for this assumption of executive power. They give to the man who has settled on and improved the public lands, under the circumstances stated in the laws, a right to buy at the minimum price. In consideration of settlement and improvement, Congress agree not to sell the land settled and improved to others, but to give a title to it, provided the settler will pay the regular price for it. They will not throw that land into public competition, because he has it in possession, and by his cultivation has added to the value of it, and of the adjoining public lands. But, sir, this gives no preference to one citizen over another, under the same circumstances. It does not permit one man to buy at public sales, at one price, and forbid others, similarly situated, to buy at the same price. It does not prohibit citizens of other States from purchasing on the same terms as the citizens of the States where the lands lie. And if it did, it is a distinction drawn by Congress, and limited to those already on the lands. By what right does the Executive extend it to other settlers and bonafide residents? Where does he get his legislative power? By what authority does he extend a law made for one object to embrace another? Has he no limit; no restraint? Is he to be permitted to wrest any and every law from its purpose? And is there to be no end of his trespasses on the legislative authority of the Union? The pre-emption laws did not apply to these sales; and he knew that Congress had refused to give those laws a further extension. During our last session the subject was before us, not only on private petitions, but on a memorial from the Legislature of the State of Indiana. (Journal, 97.) They requested us to continue the pre-emption laws for three years. A bill was reported on the subject. The Committee on the Public Lands expressed an opinion against it; and the bill was rejected by a vote of 23 to 17. Yet, the moment Congress adjourned, the Executive issued an order more unequal than any pre-emption law; and we are now to be outraged by being told that because Congress has drawn some distinctions on former occasions, the President may draw more; and that the Executive has the power, without the authority, and against the will of Congress, to regulate the sales of your public lands as he pleases. Every argument in support of this order is an apology for executive usurpation.

There is but one other suggestion of the Senator that I deem it important to notice. He says, if it be unconstitutional to discriminate between revenue payments, then Congress cannot do it; and yet Congress has done it, and that in relation to the lands themselves; that in March, 1823, an act was passed to make foreign gold coins receivable in payment of the public lands. This was a discrimination and an exception, for an act of 1819 had illegalized the circulation of foreign coins.

And who, Mr. President, has said that it was unconstitutional to discriminate between revenue payments? Congress has an undoubted right to decide what shall be received for any or for all its dues, provided they require the same payment equally from all the citizens. They may receive foreign gold for customs, as they always have done. So they may for the lands. But does it follow that the President may, of his own authority, do this? Where does he get his power?

Besides, I do not understand what the Senator means by the foreign coins being illegalized in circulation. Their circulation has never been illegal. It has, at all times, been lawful to offer and to receive them. Their circulation has been legal, but they have not at all times been a lawful and compulsory tender between citizen and citizen, but all were at liberty to pay and to receive them. The act of 1819 did not illegalize their circulation, nor that of 1823 make them a lawful tender. So far as regards their circulation between citizen and citizen, the latter act did not affect them at all. The law of 1819 was one of the chain of laws which made certain foreign coins a lawful tender for definite periods. It expired by its own limitation. It was not the will of Congress to renew it; but subsequent to its expiration they authorized those coins to be received for the public lands. This they had an undoubted right to do; and the only legitimate inference from that law is the one to which I have before called the attention of the Senate; that there is a clear distinction between the lawful currency or tender, and the money which the Government has agreed to receive for its dues—a distinction which destroys the whole argument in support of the order of the Executive.

I now repeat again my inquiry, where is the apology for the discrimination between the kinds of money, and between the citizens of different States?—and what could have been the temptation to make it? May it not be found in the anticipated operation of the order itself? The contriver of it could not fail to see that it must act most unequally, oppressively, and injuriously, on the West. The lands are the great and only source of debts to the Government there. To compel them to pay in specie, while others were paying elsewhere in the ordinary currency, was an act of gross oppression. To force them to gather up their gold and silver, and to deposit it in a few of their banks, so as to take it out of circulation, and compel all the rest of their banks to curtail their accommodations, was a refinement of despotism which would naturally excite the indignation of all who were not the humblest slaves of power. The effect was feared. The elections were approaching—the succession might be put in jeopardy. The force of the blow was to be weakened, and an exception was made in favor of those States. Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, have a temporary suspension as to them and their citizens. They are to be permitted to buy as they have heretofore done. But how long, sir? Until the 15th December—until the elections were over. And it had its effect. The succession was saved in almost all those States; while, but for the exception, they might have shared the fate of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio. Indeed, I believe that even the exception would have been insufficient, had it not been for an assurance from the very cabinet of the palace itself that the order should be revoked—an assurance deceptive and untrue, because there was no intention in the Executive to revoke it. If it be revoked it will be by the power of Congress; or, perchance, the policy of those who are preparing for the 4th March next. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia may serve, perhaps, to evade it—to escape from it—without the manliness to condemn it.

Mr. President, in this review of the laws and practice of the Government, I have been able to find no justification for this executive interference with the currency of the country. He has no constitutional right to regulate the currency; his duty is to execute the laws as Congress may make them. And I regard this order as a gross usurpation of power. The Secretary saw it; he had not the manliness to issue his order in the common form of instructions from his Department. He felt the necessity of calling in the magic of a name to sanction his oppression. He had experienced the power of that name, and its potency in silencing all complaints against trespasses on the constitution and the laws. And he thought, in this emergency, "the President of the United States has given directions" would be the best argument which he could use. And, sir, it may produce its effect. They who would have found no difficulty in condemning Levi W—, will hesitate before they disapprove the act of President Jackson. I wish the Secretary could have contrived to bestow upon it the name which its real paternity demands. The records of the Senate furnish the heraldic guides which would not have misled him. But is the act less a violation of law and duty, and are we the less bound to speak the truth in regard to it? I regard it as inferior to no infringement upon the rights of Congress, no stretch of executive authority, which we have heretofore witnessed. It is the greatest, and I hope it will be the last; and, as it is said to have been proclaimed as the "crowning glory of my administration," no future effort for glory will be essayed, and that the hour approaches when we shall have a name less potent, and a disposition less presuming, with purposes more consistent with the constitution and laws, to save us from at least unnecessary encroachments.

A few words as to the amendment, and I will cease to fatigue the Senate. The Senator from Virginia has, by his amendment, created some embarrassment with me. I am not unwilling to express the opinion that the order must be rescinded. I desire to do so. I feel it to be a duty to do so. Yet I should prefer his amendment to doing nothing but submitting quietly to this assumption of power. But, as I prefer the original resolution, I must vote against the amendment; and then it is possible that, by defeating it, we may also defeat the resolution. But be it so.

The amendment may be regarded as having three objects:

1. To declare that the dues of the Government may be received in specie or specie-paying notes. Thus far it is a mere reiteration of the resolution of 1816, in almost precisely the same words; and it leaves the authority of the Secretary exactly where that resolution left it. Pass it, and the Secretary has the same right to refuse every thing but specie that he had in July last; and he will, of course, exercise it in the same way, for Congress will have expressed no opinion against it. It is intended as a repeal of the order. It may operate as such, but it evades, it does not directly and straightforwardly compel the repeal.

2. It limits the notes which are to be received to the banks which do not now issue of a less denomination than five dollars, and shall not, after 1st July, 1839, those of ten dollars, and after 1st July, 1841, of twenty dollars. I have no great repugnance to this progression, although, I think, too rapid, and that the convenience and interest of the country will not be promoted by it. It is much more slow, however, than the locomotive progress of the proposed bill of the last session "to re-establish the currency of the constitution for the Federal Government." That brought us, in 1841, to the receipt of no notes of any bank which issued notes less than one thousand dollars, and no note after 1842. I prefer, for the present, the rule given in the deposite bill. But as Congress will retain the power of repealing this provision, if the circumstances of the country required it, I should not for it alone vote against the amendment.

3. I object also to the mixed discretion of the Secretary and the banks which the amendment to the amendment produces; and I prefer, when we legislate in regard to the currency, to do it directly, and in the ordinary forms of law.

We are informed that we cannot agree to the resolution, because it will be a censure upon the Executive, but must take the amendment, which will avoid the action of the order, and not condemn the President. I should like to be informed what we can do, and what opinion we may express. We declared that we thought the act of the Executive in taking the public treasure from the legal depository was not justified by the constitution and laws, and we sinned so that our act is to be expunged. And now we may not, by legislative action, by law, repeal an order of the Executive which violates the laws, and regulates the currency and the sales of the public lands. What, I repeat, may we do? Under this doctrine the Executive has only to get ahead of Congress, do any act which his ambition or his caprice may dictate, and our mouths are closed, our legislative authority is gone, and we are powerless for any purpose but to approve the act of tyranny. It is a doctrine of servility and base subserviency. I cannot act upon it. Officially, I must do my duty; privately, I have no wish to censure or condemn. I can have no desire, sir, at this moment, to cast any censure there, which is not demanded by the obligations of public duty. When age and disease are obtaining their gloomy triumphs over the body and the intellect; when earthly honors are escaping with the rapidity of the passing hours; when sycophants and dependents are beginning to exhibit their conviction that their devotion is no longer required by their interests; and when a name which has gratified ambition and secured power is fast loosening its hold upon popular prejudice, credulity, and confidence, I should as soon think of digging open the grave, and violating there the maxim, nil de mortuis, as of casting unnecessary censure on the decaying idol. But, sir, when I believe that the great interests of our common country have been injured, the constitution and the laws disregarded, and I see no imperative obstacle to the expression of my opinions, I cannot refrain from the decisive vote which those interests and that constitution require at my hands. I believe that the order was unauthorized; that it has been injurious; and I cannot consent to evade the direct and proper expression of my opinions. If, in doing so, the amendment should be defeated, and the order remain unrevoked and unaltered, I must leave the responsibility with those who sustain it, and on whom that responsibility ought to rest.

[About the usual hour of adjournment, Mr. SOUTHWARD gave way for a motion for adjournment by Mr. EWING.]

Before the Senate adjourned, however, Mr. RIVES gave notice of his intention to modify his amendment to Mr. EWING's resolution on the subject of the Treasury order, so as to cause it to read as follows, viz:

"Resolved, That hereafter all sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, whether for customs, public lands, taxes, debts, or otherwise, shall be collected and paid only in the legal currency of the United States, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes; that is, from and after the passage of this resolution, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars shall be received in payment of the public dues; from and after the 1st day of July, 1839, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars, shall be receivable; and from and after the 1st of July, 1841, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars; provided, however, that no notes shall be taken in payment by the collectors or receivers, which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not, under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash."

The amendment, thus amended, was ordered to be printed, and then the Senate, on motion of Mr. CLAY, adjourned over to Monday next.]

Mr. KING, of Alabama, presented the credentials of the Hon. JOHN McKINLEY, elected by the Legislature of the State of Alabama a Senator from that State, to serve for six years from the 4th of March next.

Mr. PRESTON appeared in his seat to-day.

LAND BILL.

Mr. WALKER, from the committee to whom it was referred, reported Mr. CLAY's land bill, with an amendment, striking out the whole bill save the enacting clause, and substituting another which restricts the sales of the public lands to actual settlers, and to them in small quantities, accompanied with many guards against its being evaded by speculators.

ADMISSION OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the previous orders of the day be postponed, for the purpose of considering the bill to admit the State of Michigan into the Union.

Mr. CALHOUN was opposed to the motion; the documents accompanying the bill had but this morning been laid upon the tables, and no time had been allowed for even reading them over.

Mr. GRUNDY insisted on his motion. Of one point he was fully satisfied—that Michigan had a right to be received into the Union; on this, he presumed, there would be but little difference of opinion, the chief difficulty having respect to the mode in which it was to be done. There seemed more difference of opinion, and he presumed there would be more debate, touching the preamble than concerning the bill itself; but he could not consent to postpone the subject. Congress were daily passing laws the effect of which pressed immediately upon the people of Michigan, and concerning which they were entitled to have a voice and a vote upon this floor, and, therefore, the bill for their admission ought to receive the immediate action of the Senate. As to the documents, they were not numerous. The gentleman from South Carolina might readily run his eye over them, and he would perceive that the facts of the case were easily understood. Indeed, there was but one of any consequence, respecting which there was any controversy. When the Senate adjourned on Thursday, many Senators had been prepared and were desirous to speak, although the documents were not then printed. It was the great principles involved in the case which would form the subjects of discussion, and they could as well be discussed now. He thought the Senate had better proceed. One fact in the case was very certain; there had been more voters for the members to the last convention than for the first. How many more was a matter of little comparative consequence. The great question for the Senate to consider was this: what is the will of Michigan on the subject of entering the Union? If this could be decided, it was of less consequence whether the bill should or should not expressly state that the last convention, and the assent by it given, formed the ground of the admission of the State.

Admission of Michigan.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CALHOUN here inquired whether the chairman of the committee was to be understood as being now ready to abandon the preamble. If the Judiciary Committee were agreed to do this, he thought all difficulty would be at an end.

Mr. GRUNDY replied, that, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, he had no authority to reply to the inquiry; but, as an individual, he considered the preamble as of little consequence, and he should vote for the bill whether it were in or out. Michigan ought undoubtedly to be admitted, and all the consequences would result, whether the preamble were retained or not. He had received no authority from the committee to consent that it should be stricken out. For himself, he was settled in the belief that Congress possessed full power to prescribe the boundaries of a Territory, and that when that Territory passed into a State the right remained still the same. Congress had already established the boundary of Ohio, and that settled the question. He never had perceived the necessity of inserting in the admission bill the section which made the assent of Michigan to the boundaries fixed for her by Congress a prerequisite to her admission, because the disputed boundary line was fixed by another bill; and whether the preamble to this bill should be retained or not, Michigan could not pass that line, so that the preamble was really of very little consequence.

Mr. CALHOUN said that, in inquiring of the honorable chairman whether he intended to abandon the preamble of the bill, his question had had respect not to any pledge respecting boundaries; but to the recognition of the second convention and of its doings. He wanted to know whether the chairman was ready to abandon that principle. He had examined the subject a good deal, and his own mind was fully made up that Michigan could not be admitted on the ground of that second convention; but the Senate might set aside the whole of what had been done, and receive Michigan as she stood at the commencement of the last session.

Mr. GRUNDY observed that, if the gentleman's mind was fully made up, then there could be no necessity of postponing the subject. The gentleman has fully satisfied himself, and now (said Mr. G.) let us see if he can satisfy us. His argument, it seems, has been fully matured, and we are now ready to listen to it. Though I consider that there is no virtue in the preamble, and that the effect of the bill will be the same whether it is stricken out or retained, yet I am not ready to say that I shall vote to strike it out. I am ready to hear what can be said both for and against it.

The question was now put on the motion of Mr. GRUNDY to postpone the previous orders, and carried, twenty-two to sixteen. So the orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill; which having been again read at the Clerk's table, as follows:

A bill to admit the State of Michigan into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

Whereas, in pursuance of the act of Congress of June the fifteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed," a convention of delegates, elected by the people of the said State of Michigan, for the sole purpose of giving their assent to the boundaries of the said State of Michigan, as described, declared, and established, in and by the said act, did, on the fifteenth of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, assent to the provisions of said act: therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the State of Michigan shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in carrying into effect the thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the act of the twenty-third of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," shall consider the State of Michigan as being one of the United States.

Mr. MORRIS moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to strike out the preamble.

Mr. CALHOUN then rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

I have bestowed on this subject all the attention that was in my power, and, although actuated by a most anxious desire for the admission of Michigan into the Union, I find it impossible to give my assent to this bill. I am satisfied the Judiciary Committee has not bestowed upon the subject all that attention which its magnitude requires; and I can explain it on no other supposition why they should place the admission on the grounds they have. One of the committee, the Senator from Ohio on my left, [Mr. MORRIS,] has pronounced the grounds as dangerous and revolutionary. He might have gone farther, and with truth pronounced them utterly repugnant to the principles of the constitution.

I have not ventured this assertion, as strong as it is, without due reflection, and weighing the full force of the terms I have used; and do not fear, with an impartial hearing, to establish its truth beyond the power of controversy.

To understand fully the objection to this bill, it is necessary that we should have a correct conception of the facts. They are few, and may be briefly told.

Some time previous to the last session of Congress, the Territory of Michigan, through its Legislature, authorized the people to meet in convention, for the purpose of forming a State Government. They met accordingly, and agreed upon a constitution, which they forthwith transmitted to Congress. It was fully discussed in this chamber, and, objectionable as the instrument was, an act was finally passed, which accepted the constitution, and declared Michigan to be a State, and admitted into the Union, on the single condition, that she should, by a convention of the people, assent to the boundaries prescribed by the act. Soon after our adjournment the Legislature of the State of Michigan (for she had been raised by our assent to the dignity of a State) called a convention of the people of the State, in conformity to the act, which met at the time appointed, at Ann Arbor. After full discussion, the convention withheld its assent, and formally transmitted the result to the President of the United States. This is the first part of the story. I will now give the sequel. Since then, during the last month, a self-constituted assembly met, professedly as a convention of the people of the State, but without the authority of the State. This unauthorized and lawless assemblage assume the high function of giving the assent of the State of Michigan to the condition of admission, as prescribed in the act of Congress. They communicated their assent to the Executive of the United States, and he to the Senate. The Senate-referred his message to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee, on its own authority, reported this present bill for the admission of the State.

Admission of Michigan.

Such are the facts out of which grows the important question, had this self-constituted assembly the authority to assent for the State? Had they the authority to do what is implied in giving assent to the condition of admission? That assent introduces the State into the Union, and pledges in the most solemn manner to the constitutional compact which binds these States in one confederated body; imposes on her all its obligations, and confers on her all its benefits. Had this irregular, self-constituted assemblage the authority to perform these high and solemn acts of sovereignty in the name of the State of Michigan? She could only come in as a State, and none could act or speak for her without her express authority; and to assume the authority without her sanction is nothing short of treason against the State.

Again: the assent to the conditions prescribed by Congress implies an authority in those who gave it to supersede in part the constitution of the State of Michigan; for her constitution fixes the boundaries of the State as part of that instrument which the condition of admission entirely alters, and to that extent the assent would supersede the constitution; and thus the question is presented, whether this self-constituted assembly, styling itself a convention, had the authority to do an act which necessarily implies the right to supersede in part the constitution.

But further: The State of Michigan, through its Legislature, authorized a convention of the people, in order to determine whether the condition of admission should be assented to or not. The convention met; and, after mature deliberation, it dissented to the condition of admission; and thus again the question is presented, whether this self-called, self-constituted assemblage, this caucus—for it is entitled to no higher name—had the authority to annul the dissent of the State, solemnly given by a convention of the people, regularly convoked under the express authority of the constituted authorities of the State?

If all or any of these questions be answered in the negative—if the self-created assemblage of December had no authority to speak in the name of the State of Michigan—if none to supersede any portion of her constitution—if none to annul her dissent to the condition of admission regularly given by a convention of the people of the State, convoked by the authority of the State, to introduce her on its authority would be not only revolutionary and dangerous, but utterly repugnant to the principles of our constitution. The question then submitted to the Senate is, had that assemblage the authority to perform these high and solemn acts?

The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary holds that this self-constituted assemblage had the authority; and what is his reason? Why, truly, because a greater number of votes were given for those who constituted that assemblage than for those who constituted the convention of the people of the State, convened under its constituted authorities. This argument resolves itself into two questions—the first of fact, and the second of principle. I shall not discuss the first. It is not necessary to do so. But if it were, it would be easy to show that never was so important a fact so loosely testified. There is not one particle of official evidence before us. We had nothing but the private letters of individuals, who do not know even the numbers that voted on either occasion; they know nothing of the qualifications of voters, nor how their votes were received, nor by whom counted. Now, none knows better than the honorable chairman himself, that such testimony as is submitted to us to establish a fact of this moment, would not be received in the lowest magistrate's court in the land. But I waive this. I come to the question of the principle involved; and what is it? The argument is, that a greater number of persons voted for the last convention than for the first, and therefore the acts of the last, of right, abrogated those of the first; in other words, that mere numbers, without regard to the forms of law or the principles of the constitution, give authority. The authority of numbers, according to this argument, sets aside the authority of law and the constitution. Need I show that such a principle goes to the entire overthrow of our constitutional Government, and would subvert all social order? It is the identical principle which prompted the late revolutionary and anarchical movement in Maryland, and which has done more to shake confidence in our system of government than any event since the adoption of our constitution, but which happily has been frowned down by the patriotism and intelligence of the people of that State.

What was the ground of this insurrectionary measure, but that the Government of Maryland did not represent the voice of the numerical majority of the people of Maryland, and that the authority of law and constitution was nothing against that of numbers. Here we find, on this floor, and from the head of the Judiciary Committee, the same principle revived, and, if possible, in a worse form; for, in Maryland, the anarchists assumed that they were sustained by the numerical majority of the people of the State in their revolutionary movements; but the utmost the chairman can pretend to have is a mere plurality. The largest number of votes claimed for the self-created assemblage is 8,000; and no man will undertake to say that this constitutes any thing like a majority of the voters of Michigan; and he claims the high authority which he does for it, not because it is a majority of the people of Michigan, but because it is a greater number than voted for the authorized convention of the people that refused to agree to the condition of admission. It may be shown by his own witness, that a majority of the voters of Michigan greatly exceed 8,000. Mr. Williams, the president of the self-created assemblage, stated that the population of that State amounted to nearly 200,000 persons. If so, there cannot be less than from 25,000 to 30,000 voters, considering how nearly universal the right of suffrage is under its constitution; and it thus appears that this irregular, self-constituted meeting did not represent the vote of one third of the State; and yet, on a mere principle of plurality, we are to supersede the constitution of Michigan, and annul the act of a convention of the people regularly convened under the authority of the Government of the State.

Admission of Michigan.

[SENATE.]

But, says the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BURMAN,] this assembly was not self-constituted. It met under the authority of an act of Congress; and that act had no reference to the State, but only to the people; and that the assemblage in December was just such a meeting as that act contemplated. It is not my intention to discuss the question whether the honorable Senator has given the true interpretation of the act, but, if it were, I could very easily show his interpretation to be erroneous; for, if such had been the intention of Congress, the act surely would have specified the time when the convention was to be held, who were to be the managers, who the voters, and would not have left it to individuals who might choose to assume the authority to determine all these important points. I might also readily show that the word "convention" of the people, as used in law or the constitution, always means a meeting of the people regularly convened by the constituted authority of the State, in their high sovereign capacity, and that it never means such an assemblage as the one in question. But I waive this; I take higher ground. If the act be, indeed, such as the Senator says it is, then I maintain that it is utterly opposed to the fundamental principles of our federal Union. Congress has no right whatever to call a convention in a State. It can call but one convention, and that is a convention of the people of the United States to amend the federal constitution; nor can it call that, except authorized by two thirds of the States.

Ours is a federal republic—a union of States. Michigan is a State—a State in the course of admission—and differing only from the other States in her federal relations. She is declared to be a State in the most solemn manner by your own act. She can come into the Union only as a State, and by her voluntary assent, given by the people of the State in convention, called by the constituted authority of the State. To admit the State of Michigan, on the authority of a self-created meeting, or one called by the direct authority of Congress, passing by the authorities of the State, would be the most monstrous proceeding under our constitution that can be conceived; the most repugnant to its principles, and dangerous in its consequences. It would establish a direct relation between the individual citizens of a State and the General Government, in utter subversion of the federal character of our system. The relation of the citizens to this Government is through the States exclusively. They are subject to its authority and laws only because the State has assented they should be. If she dissents, their assent is nothing; and, on the other hand, if she assents, their dissent is nothing. It is through the State, then, and through the State alone, that the United States Government can have any connexion with the people of a State; and does not, then, the Senator from Pennsylvania see, that if Congress can authorize a convention of the people in the State of Michigan, without the authority of the State, it matters not what is the object, it may in like manner authorize conventions in any other State, for whatever purpose it may think proper?

Michigan is as much a sovereign State as any other, differing only, as I have said, as to her federal relations. If we give our sanction to the assemblage of December, on the principle laid down by the Senator from Pennsylvania, then we establish the doctrine that Congress has power to call at pleasure conventions within the States. Is there a Senator on this floor who will assent to such a doctrine? Is there one, especially, who represents the smaller States of this Union, or the weaker section? Admit the power, and every vestige of State rights would be destroyed. Our system would be subverted, and, instead of a confederacy of free and sovereign States, we would have all power concentrated here, and this would become the most odious despotism. He, indeed, must be blind, who does not see that such a power would give the Federal Government a complete control of all the States. I call upon Senators now to arrest a doctrine so dangerous. Let it be remembered that, under our system, bad precedents live forever; good ones only perish. We may not feel all the evil consequences at once, but this precedent, once set, will surely be received, and will become the instrument of infinite evil.

It will be asked, what shall be done? Will you refuse to admit Michigan into the Union? I answer, no; I desire to admit her; and if the Senators from Indiana and Ohio will agree, I am ready now to admit her as she stood at the beginning of last session, without giving sanction to the unauthorized assemblage of December.

But if that does not meet their wishes, there is still another by which she may be admitted. We are told that two thirds of the Legislature and people of Michigan are in favor of accepting the conditions of the act of last session. If that be the fact, then all that is necessary is, that the Legislature should call another convention. All difficulty will thus be removed, and there will be still abundant time for her admission at this session. And shall we, for the sake of gaining a few months, give our assent to a bill fraught with principles so monstrous as this?

We have been told, that unless she is admitted immediately, it will be too late for her to receive her proportion of the surplus revenue under the deposit bill. I trust that on so great a question a difficulty like this will have no weight. Give her at once her full share. I am ready to do so at once, without waiting her admission. I was mortified to hear on so grave a question such motives assigned for her admission, contrary to the law and constitution. Such considerations ought not to be presented when we are settling great constitutional principles. I trust that we shall pass by all such frivolous motives on this occasion, and take ground on the great and fundamental principle that an informal, irregular, self-constituted assembly, a mere caucus, has no authority to speak for a sovereign State in any case whatever; to supersede its constitution, or to reverse its dissent deliberately given by a convention of the people of the State, regularly convened under its constituted authority.

Mr. GRUNDY confessed that he could not see any thing in the whole proceedings calculated to excite alarm. The Senator [Mr. CALHOUN] had told the Senate that a proceeding in Maryland had excited more apprehension in regard to our institutions than any thing that had occurred since the establishment of our Government. Now, that was the gentleman's opinion; but he (Mr. G.) had seen the time when there was felt more solicitude with respect to the stability of our Union than what had recently happened in Maryland, or in the proceedings which had been adopted in Michigan. In order to determine the question before the Senate, it might be as well to take a short review of the facts and circumstances connected with it.

By the ordinance of 1787 it was provided that this Territory, and all portions of the territory ceded by the State of Virginia northwest of the Ohio, should be admitted as a State, not by conventions called for the purpose of ratifying a proposal made by Congress, but upon the fair condition that when their population should have amounted to a certain number. Michigan, at the time she first applied to be admitted into the Union, possessed a population of one third more than was required by the ordinance of 1787. But he should state that, before asking for admission, as she had a right to do, she called a convention, and framed a constitution. The General Government had at that time a right (without prescribing the terms to be found in the act of the 2d March, 1836) to receive her into the Union. But what did Congress do? Did they comply with her request, or with the terms of the ordinance? No. Congress prescribed different provisions from any to be found in the ordinance. Now, according to the view he took of the subject, this sovereign and independent State, having the same right to be represented on that floor as South Carolina or Tennessee, has been for a long time kept knocking at the doors of Congress, and still they were shut against them. He would, having said this much, say nothing further on this part of the subject.

At the last session, and for some sessions previous to that, a very serious controversy had arisen between the State of Ohio and the Territory of Michigan. What, he asked, did Congress do, in its great desire to see tranquillity and harmony restored between them? It passed the act of 1836. And yet the Senator from Ohio [Mr. EWING] now wanted to see no such provision as that contained in the act of 1836, and which he [Mr. GRUNDY] believed to have been placed there by the committee in the proper discharge of their duty, and which he thought commendable in them.

[Mr. EWING explained. I contended for the third section. I thought it of no importance then, nor do I now.]

Mr. GRUNDY resumed. He was speaking of the Senator's exertions in regard to another bill, or other bills, which were introduced to fix the northern boundary of the State of Ohio; and before that was accomplished Senators insisted that Michigan could not be admitted into the Union. Well, what was the objection now to her admission? None that he could see. But when the Senate came to pass this act of admission, they put in this section:

"That, as a compliance with the fundamental condition of admission contained in the last preceding section of this act, the boundaries of the said State of Michigan, as in that section described, declared, and established, shall receive the assent of a convention of delegates elected by the people of said State, for the sole purpose of giving the assent herein required," &c.

Now, that was the provision to which this preamble has a reference. Did that section say that the Legislative Assembly of Michigan should call a convention to decide on the subject? Not a word did it contain to that effect. Did the constitution of Michigan authorize the calling of a convention on the part of the Legislature? Not a word did the constitution contain on the subject? But the Legislature did call a convention, and they refused to assent to the conditions contained in the act of Congress.

Now, to judge that Congress did not intend putting a legal construction on the section, that the intervention of the Legislature should be necessary, let him suppose that the Legislature should refuse to act, and consequently call no convention, and the people of Michigan had risen up una voce, and given their assent to the meeting in convention, would gentlemen have said "the convention must be called by the Legislature?" Now, this was the consent of the people of Michigan—of the population entitled to vote, residing there. And shall the Legislature of that State have the power to refuse or grant that which the people may demand on so important a subject as this? It seemed to him it ought not to be required; and, therefore, the conclusion he drew from the question was, that the people have a right to convoke their assemblies, the delegates from which have a right to meet in convention, and there, if they deem proper, ratify the conditions prescribed by Congress. If he were right in that conclusion, then the preamble was correct; and if wrong, it ought to be struck out.

He felt no concern in regard to this branch of the subject at all. He was free to admit that, without the preamble, he was ready to vote for the bill. But for the third section of the act of 1836, let him tell the Senate, Michigan would have been represented here, and in the other House, long ago. Well, now the people have been called upon in their primary capacity, and have given their assent to the conditions of Congress, why should the Senate cause further delay in admitting her? The Senator from South Carolina had said it would not take long to have another convention. He (Mr. G.) admitted it; but every moment did her injury. Senators were, by delay, violating a greater principle than that of which the gentleman had spoken. It was a greater infraction of principle than any known to free government.

He admitted, with the Senator from South Carolina, that the testimony establishing the fact of the assent of the people of Michigan was of great importance, and in this case not according to the strict rules of legality; yet the testimony was of such a character that Legislatures would not refuse to act upon it, although courts of justice would reject it, because not duly accredited by the oaths of witnesses. But did not Senators do daily many acts upon testimony not on oath, but for which the statements of men of high standing, honor, and honesty, guaranteed their truth?

What, he asked, was the amount of the testimony produced? Why, that between five and six thousand votes were given at the election of members for the convention in September last, and that from eight to nine thousand were given for the delegates who formed the convention in December. What was the object in calling upon the people of Michigan? It was to know whether they were willing to come into the Union on the terms prescribed by the act of the 2d of March, 1836. They have answered, and given their assent. In one county there was given at the first election for the delegates who were elected, 180 votes of a majority. These delegates constituted the majority in the first convention; and by their votes the assent of Michigan was refused. At the first election, about 1,700 votes were cast, including both parties. At the last election, 1,900 votes were given in favor of the assenting party alone. The whole thing was changed, and must have been changed by the revolution of opinion.

Without going further into the subject, he wanted the Senator from South Carolina to inform the Senate how he would do justice to the people of Michigan; and, further, how the passage of the bill was to be obtained in any form. Would he send the people back again to a convention? The delay was unnecessary, and objections would be made of a similar character. Why should the Senator not vote for the bill, the preamble being struck out. What difficulty was there in it? For his (Mr. G's) part, he could not see any. He contended that there was nothing of a political character in this matter, either on one side or the other; therefore, it was fairly on principle that a difference of opinion could be said to exist. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina, "Can Congress call a convention in a State?" he answered, "No!" nor did it in this instance; neither does the preamble or bill give such a power, nor imply it. He would conclude his remarks by merely declaring that, whether the preamble should be stricken from the bill or not, he would vote for it.

Mr. MORRIS, on his first motion to strike out the preamble to the bill providing for the admission of Michigan into the Union, said: The gentleman from South Carolina had correctly understood his object, which was to bring the principle contained in the preamble to the bill in a direct form before the Senate, for its decision. Although he entertained for the talents and ability of the Senator from Tennessee the highest respect, yet on this subject he had entirely different views from those expressed by that gentleman; still he would say that, on this question, particularly on the doctrine contained in the preamble, the gentleman was unquestionably in error. He, however, agreed with the Senator that Michigan ought to be admitted into the Union; his mind had undergone no change on this point, for he was of the same opinion at the last session of Congress; he was opposed to the principle contained in the third section of the act for her admission at the time of its passage, though he said nothing on the floor of the Senate on the subject. He at that time considered this third section not only as unnecessary as it respected the rights of Ohio, but as unconstitutional and dangerous, and as requiring of the people of Michigan an act nugatory in itself, and humiliating in its consequences. He was anxious then, he was anxious now, that Michigan should be admitted without having any restriction or condition whatever imposed on her. He thought then, as he found the fact now, that the people of Michigan would view this provision, requiring their assent to the law of Congress, as an act of supererogation, and one which the authority of the constitution did not warrant, and did not reach; and he had found both conventions which had lately been held in Michigan concur on this head, for both had denied the power of Congress to require the assent which had been required in the third section of the act for their admission; nor did they submit or agree to give it as a matter of right, but as matter of obedience only, and to prove to the country their love and attachment to the Union. Whenever Michigan shall be admitted, it ought to be on that high and elevated ground on which she desires to stand: a repeal of the third section of the act of last session. On this ground, Mr. M. said, he wished most ardently to place her citizens; and the passage of the bill without the preamble would accomplish that object; for he believed that it was a well-settled principle, that, if the provisions of an act passed by the Legislature be repugnant to the provisions of a former act, the former act is repealed without any express words being used for that purpose. This, then, was his first, though most inconsiderable, reason, for wishing to strike out the preamble; for, if his doctrine was true, as he verily believed it was, the passage of the act itself, without the lumber and encumbrance of the preamble, would fairly and honorably admit the State of Michigan at once. He had understood the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] to say that, if both the Senators from Ohio were satisfied as to the northern boundary line of that State, he would have no objection to give his assent to the bill, provided the preamble was stricken out, after this declaration. If that were done, as he (Mr. M.) hoped it would be, he had but little doubt of the unanimous vote of the Senate in favor of the admission; he could not possibly see any quarter from which objections would be made to it. Gentlemen had argued as if there was a party here who wished to keep Michigan out of the Union; he was not one of those; and whatever gentlemen might say in argument, he did not suppose a single member harbored such a wish, but all were anxious for her admission the first moment it could be done without a violation of constitutional duty, of principle, or of law. Although it has been attempted to be impressed upon the Senate that the controversy which had existed between Ohio and Michigan, with regard to boundary, was one reason why the delegation from that State were opposed to the bill, he begged leave to undeceive gentlemen on this point, by assuring them that was not the case; the course which Ohio had marked out for herself in that controversy had proved itself to be the correct one. Congress, by their act of the last session, had given consent to the constitutional boundary of that State, and it had now become satisfactory as well as obligatory on all parties; and thus the encumbrance which for so many years had been thrown over the title of Ohio by the act of Congress of 1805, establishing the Territory of Michigan, had been withdrawn; and the moment this was done, the jurisdiction of Ohio over the disputed territory was complete. It is, then, by virtue of the constitution of the State that Ohio has taken jurisdiction over that portion of country; we cannot for a moment admit the idea that Congress has given us any power to do so. Congress has only recognised the validity of our claim, and removed the difficulty the act of 1805 had created. He, therefore, as one of the Senators from Ohio, was perfectly satisfied that the State of Michigan should be admitted without any reference to the Ohio boundary whatever. On this question doubts no longer remain, as it respects Ohio; and he felt strongly disposed to remove from the people of Michigan the now unnecessary and humiliating condition which had been imposed on them, which condition, he thought, in point of sound policy, was never required, nor did he believe that Congress rightfully possessed the power to impose it.

But, sir, (said Mr. M.,) the view which I have so far taken on this subject is a very important one, indeed, when compared with the broad and dangerous principle contained in the preamble before us. He had for many years occupied some humble station in public life; had been somewhat acquainted with the legislation of the country; that branch, more than any other, had occupied his attention; and he could say, in the most perfect sincerity, and with a clear conscience, that he never had heard, nor had he ever expected to hear, doctrines such as were recognised in the preamble to the bill, and such as had been openly and clearly avowed in the Senate on the present occasion, and in support of the preamble now under discussion. The facts, as stated by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] with regard to the proceedings in Michigan, have often been repeated on this floor; they are well known, and need not be again detailed. Congress has recognised, even by the act of the 15th June, 1836, Michigan as a State; in the third section of that act she is no less than four times spoken of as a State. It is the State of Michigan, and not the people of the country, as abstract from the sovereignty of the State, that can rightfully respond to the law of Congress; and it is only the voice of the people of the State, collected and expressed as a State, that ought to be received as creating any obligation on the part of Congress, or indeed any obligation upon the State herself.

But, sir, what are we to understand by this word "State?" Do we mean an organized, or do we mean an unorganized, community? Do we mean a country governed by known and established laws, or do we mean one where the law shall never be known but when expressed by the public voice, through the medium of county conventions, or by an assemblage of the people at one particular place? If by the word "State," or the expression, "people of the State," we mean, as I contend is the only correct meaning, an organized community, a people who have associated together and provided, for the safety and security of all, written constitutions and laws, and also provided for the exercise of its sovereignty through the instrumentality of constituted tribunals, or a Government of any other known and established character, if this be the case, then he contended that a State had but one mode, and one medium, through which it could express its opinions or exercise its power; and that, in pursuance of its own constitution and laws, a State can be known or recognised under no other character; and, to use a figurative expression, it can neither think, speak, nor act, in any other way. Well, sir, (said Mr. M.,) what are the few facts to which this doctrine can be applied in the present case? The sovereign, but it would probably be more appropriate to say the physical or numerical, power of the people of Michigan, exercised in their primary assemblies, without the authority of any law of the State, and not only without the sanction of any constitutional provision, but in direct contravention of constitution and law, and by mere numerical strength, evidenced by a plurality of votes, have understood her to give the assent of the State to an act of Congress, which is to remain obligatory upon the State in all time to come, and which the regular constituted authorities of the State have no power to control, and which the people themselves, according to the provisions of their own constitution, can never alter, abridge, or amend; and it is the assent thus given that we are now so emphatically called upon to receive as the constitutional and legitimate will of the State. Sir, (said, Mr. M.), I cannot consent thus to humble any one of the sovereign States of this Union. Let it be constantly borne in mind, that there have been two conventions assembled in Michigan, for the purpose of considering, or assenting to, the act of Congress. The convention which first met was in pursuance of a law of the State specially passed for that purpose; that it was elected and organized according to the provisions of that law; that this convention dissented from the proposition of Congress, or rather did not consent thereto; that subsequent to this decision it was that the people met in their primary assemblies, and the result was that another convention was had. The documents furnished the Senate inform us that in two counties no elections were held, and, of course, those counties were not represented in this latter convention, the president of which, in a communication to the President of the United States, says that "the convention originated through primary meetings of the citizens of the several counties, in ample time to afford notice to the whole State; pursuant thereto, elections, kept open for two days, on the 5th and 6th instant, (December,) have been held in all the counties except Monroe and Macomb." This (Mr. M. said) was a relation of facts and circumstances to him entirely inexplicable; no time is mentioned as to the notice given, nor what kind of notice was thought necessary, or how the same was promulgated. This, as it appears to us, was mere matter of opinion, and might, in Michigan, depend very much on party views and party purposes. But the great principle, and, indeed, the argument, does not depend on these minor considerations; the question is, will Congress recognise as valid, constitutional, and obligatory, without the color of a law of Michigan to sustain it, an act done by the people of that State in their primary assemblies, and acknowledge that act as obligatory on the constituted authorities and Legislature of the State? Are we prepared to subject all State power and State authority to the test of this principle? Our answer not only concerns Michigan, but ought, and, I trust, will be examined into by every State in the Union; and although Michigan at this moment may be the scapegoat to bear off this power into the Western wilderness, yet it may and can be found convenient to apply it to other States. Are we prepared for this application? Is the great question now about to be decided? I would most seriously call upon all State-rights men to look well to this matter. Do you love and venerate your own constitution and laws, the only guarantee you have for all your personal, social, and political rights? Are you willing to subject them all to this tremendous power? Congress may have a favorite measure to accomplish, which may come in collision with State power. How easy to overcome this power, by doing what is now claimed to be right in Michigan; pass an act requiring the people of the State to give their assent to it, or permitting them, if you please, to do so; send amongst them your agents and emissaries, to induce calls for primary assemblies, to hold a convention to suit your views; obtain the act of assent by such convention, and your whole purpose is answered. The State is under your feet; you are the master-spirit that directs its movements; and you would have the right to call upon the executive power of the country to see that your laws were faithfully executed. Why, sir, but yesterday, and we might have looked on this picture as fancy only; but it is now fast assuming the character of fact, and we may awake to the reality before we are aware. All that has been suggested, and much more, may take place under the sanction of the broad principle now contended for. Let it not be said that we are unnecessarily alarmed, and that the argument is carried to extremes. We always test principles by the extent to which they can, consistent with themselves, be carried into effect. Suppose Congress should have a favorite project to carry through a State, say the State of South Carolina—for instance, a road or canal—which all would agree could not be done without the consent of the State, and Congress should pass an act in terms precisely those used in the act for the admission of Michigan, and the Legislature of the State should be convened to consider the proposition, or should provide for the election of a convention, who should meet and reject the same. If, after all this, some person should be found possessing influence sufficient, either with or without the patronage of this Government, to obtain a majority of the qualified electors of the State, or even the whole body of the people, both male and female, no matter how expressed, whether by convention or otherwise, would any man say that this was sufficient authority for Congress to proceed with the contemplated work? No! none would be found to avow this at once; yet to this length will the doctrine lead.

Admission of Michigan.

Sir, the matter can be brought home to our doors in Ohio; we have had a controversy partaking of this character with the Bank of the United States: the Legislature of the State denied the power of Congress to authorize the bank to send a branch into the State without its consent. Suppose the charter had contained a provision that a branch might be sent into any State by the "assent of a convention of delegates, elected by the said State, for the sole purpose of giving such assent." Suppose, sir, this had been the original charter of the bank, and a convention of delegates had been gotten up, and have forced upon the State the power of the bank, contrary to her own constitution and laws, and against the express will of the Legislature: I ask every citizen of Ohio, what would have been his opinion and feelings on a state of things of this kind? For my own part, as a citizen of that State, I had rather see Ohio struck at once from the Union, than that a doctrine of this kind should be considered orthodox, and prevail in practice. We might wander for a while at large, and find a resting place; but when once swallowed up by this Government, our power of action would entirely cease. Then, indeed, would we have no Government of our own; we would be but mere automata in the hands of those who administer this Government. They would be the judges both as to the time and manner of our acting, and of the validity of the records of those acts. Would not this be the condition of the States if we adopt and maintain this dangerous principle?—a principle which admits a State into the Union without law and without record, so far as the State has any action in this case. It is true, as was observed by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that good precedents are soon forgotten, while bad ones live forever. He (Mr. M.) contended that the principle contained in the preamble to the bill was vicious in the extreme. Shall we, then, countenance it? Shall we maintain it? He trusted not.

He said he was somewhat surprised, he confessed, to hear the doctrine that had been advanced by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] That gentleman, if he understood him correctly, not only sustained the proceedings of the last convention in Michigan, but contended that if it had not assented, the people would have gone on, even ad infinitum, to elect conventions, until they had obtained one which would give the assent. A doctrine so latitudinarian as this, he said, he could by no means admit. It was a doctrine that unloosed all the obligation of society, and dissolved government into its original elements.

In a controversy of this kind he would not fear to meet the gentleman, even in his own State, in which, as far as he knew, this doctrine had been first promulgated to the country. He would call the attention of the Senator to a public letter from the pen of a very distinguished citizen of that State; that letter had been made public, and of course was public property, and liable to public examination. The doctrine, he contended, contained in it, was revolutionary in its nature; it went to prove, as he understood it, that the right of revolution was a right inherent in the very nature of our institutions; a doctrine which he could not admit as correct, and one which went to prove that we had no stability whatever in our Government. This doctrine was broached in a State whose citizens had always proved themselves sound republicans; democratic sons of democratic fathers; and he felt highly gratified in finding that in that State this doctrine had fallen still-born from the press: it was at once rebuked by the good, sound, democratic sense of the people, and he thought had gone to the tomb of the Capulets; but he feared it was but the precursor of more extensive operations of a system which, while it flattered the pride and vanity of the people, was stealing from them every vestige of liberty, and undermining the foundation of all their social institutions. The case of Maryland had been mentioned; the plea in that case was, if he understood it correctly, that the Legislature of the State having, as some thought, neglected to adopt such measures as the wants of the people required, that the people, or rather a majority of the people, had the right, by a convention, elected without the authority of any law, to put down the whole frame of Government, and establish a new Government, with new powers and new agents, in its stead; that, in fact, the majority of the people of a State had the right to form a Government to suit their own convenience, without any regard to the rights of the minority, as secured under the existing Government. This he considered the first act in the grand drama, by which he feared that public institutions, made for the safety of all, were to be abolished for the special benefit of a party; it was the mere precursor of more energetic and extensive operations. Suppose a few of the large States should be disposed to think that the Senatorial representation in Congress was unequal; that it was absurd, and derogatory to the rights of the people, that New York should have no more power in this body than Delaware; and should wish to change the present order of things. True it is that the constitution of the United States has provided that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate; but what of that? This, according to the argument we have heard, is but a subordinate right, always subject to the constitutional power of the people; let conventions be held, elected by the people in their primary assemblies, according to mere numbers, and less than half a dozen of the most populous States would swallow up the twenty smaller ones, who now, by giving their assent to this doctrine, do homage to the larger States for their liberties, and appear willing to rely on them, and not on the constitution, as the security for their rights. It would be well that we should always remember that our fathers did not expend their blood and treasure to establish a Government resting alone upon popular breath, but one founded on written constitutions and laws for the security of all, and in the formation of which all had an equal right to participate.

But, sir, suppose all that has been urged against the facts, as they appear in this case, should be deemed insufficient to show that the principle upon which the admission of Michigan is made to rest is founded in mistaken and erroneous views, yet he contended that there was no certain or conclusive evidence to show that the consent of the people of Michigan had ever been given, as required by the act of Congress. Who are the people of Michigan, within the meaning of that act? Surely the qualified voters of that State, and none other; no one will contend for an opposite construction. What evidence, then, have we that the convention which gave the assent was elected by the proper persons? None at all; for aught we know, or for aught that appears in any part of the documents furnished the Senate, there is no conclusive evidence that the people of Michigan ever did give their assent to the act of Congress. That the people of that State are desirous of being admitted into the Union he had little doubt; but insisted that certain forms were necessary before that admission could take place. The evidence furnished to prove a compliance with those forms he considered entirely incomplete and unsatisfactory. True, as the Senator from Tennessee has said, we have evidence founded on publications in newspapers, the statements of individuals, and copies of the proceedings of the convention itself; but none of these come to us under oath, or under the forms of official proceedings. The gentleman's opinion is, that evidence thus furnished ought to be considered sufficient to found an act of legislation upon. To this (he said) he agreed; but was the present a mere question of general or local policy, to operate in future? He thought not. It was a question of a judicial character. Deciding upon the proper construction of an existing law, and the facts that were to determine the rights of citizens under that law, we assumed here the character of judges rather than legislators; and he thought it indispensably necessary that at least the shadow of judicial evidence should be preserved; and he contended that in this case even that shadow did not appear. In measures of naked policy, the argument of the gentleman might safely be admitted; but he repudiated its application in the present case. If evidence of a higher nature exists, it is somewhat extraordinary that it has not been furnished the Senate. If we are to rely exclusively on the popular vote of the people of the State, we ought to have some evidence of the votes given, and by whom. Does a single gentleman here know, by any evidence furnished, whether the persons who voted on the 5th and 6th days of December, for members to a convention, were qualified electors or not? No; not one of us has any evidence on that point. How, then, are we to judge of the validity of the vote, or the rights of the convention? None of the proceedings were authorized by a State law, and thus stamping them with the solemnity of State authority; nor have we any parol evidence, even without oath, at all satisfactory on this point. It is most extraordinary that we are not furnished with any evidence as to who the voters were that cast their votes for the election of members to the convention by whom the assent was given; and we may ask, and not without reason, who were they, or by what rule or authority their votes were collected and counted? No one here knows any thing on the subject. Sir, the history of the day informs us that the tide of emigration into the State of Michigan has for a year or two past been immense; not only citizens of the United States, but foreigners, who have reached our shores in shoals, have found their way into that part of our country. Have we any evidence that this class of men were not the persons, in a good degree, who have thus undertaken to remodel the constitution of Michigan, and with it the very principles of our Government? Was it this class of men, or any portion of them, that have undertaken to give the assent of Michigan to her boundaries, as prescribed by Congress? Have we, I repeat again, any evidence to prove that this is not the class of persons who elected the second convention? We have no such evidence.

There is another view of this subject, not unworthy our notice. The election appears to have been held two days in each county, and he should be glad to be informed who it was that selected the days, and the number of days in which the election was holden. Who it was that gave the notice of the place and manner of conducting the elections. Was it proclaimed by one individual, or was it made known by an assemblage of citizens in one county to the citizens of another county? Did the county of A send a special messenger to the county of B, and so throughout the State; or did the people act simultaneously, by instinct or impulse? Was the voting by ballot in one county, and viva voce in another, and in a third by the holding up of hands or counting of heads? All these facts, he contended, were entirely unknown to the Senate, and yet we were called to declare, by the solemn enactment of a law, that the people of Michigan, in proper form, had given their assent to the condition imposed on them by the act of Congress. He contended that the Senate was about to establish the truth of a fact about which they had heard but little, except from public rumor, paragraphs in party newspapers, or from the statements and assertions of individuals not under the obligations of an oath. This, he thought, would be a most dangerous decision, pronounced at a very inauspicious time. The condition of the country is at this time peculiar, if not alarming. He said he felt it his duty to express his opinions honestly, as he entertained them; and he regretted much that duty seemed to require him to comment on the existing state of things. Almost every newspaper on which he laid his hands contained the history of crimes almost without number, and strongly impressed upon his mind the idea that men began to think it right to take the administration of justice into their own hands, and dispense what they believed it to be, entirely without any of the forms of law. He had read of punishments of the highest nature being inflicted by the order of assemblies of the people, in some of the States, who had conducted their proceedings with all the formality and gravity, no doubt, that the convention of Michigan had conducted theirs. He had read, with some surprise as well as regret, advertisements in newspapers in different cities, offering for sale fine duelling pistols, and pistols for the belt and the pocket, bowie-knives, and like instruments, well calculated for the taking of human life, offered as convenient articles, necessary for the convenience or comfort of man. He had no recollection of seeing, until very lately, advertisements of this kind; and the question very naturally pressed itself upon his mind, what does all this mean? Does it not prove to us that men are endeavoring to place themselves entirely above the power of the law, and do that which they think to be right in their own eyes? He thought that it was high time for the whole constituted authorities of the country to use all proper means to circumscribe the entire action of the people within the strict limits of the law, before the restraint of law was lost sight of altogether. Recognise (said Mr. M.) that the people of Michigan may, in this informal manner, dispense with the constitution and laws of their own State, and you at the same time recognise the doctrine that numerical strength alone shall have precedence in point of obligation to the most solemn legal enactments. It seemed to him there was at that moment a powerful responsibility resting on Congress, and that they ought to proceed with the most serious deliberation. He had heard for a year or two past much said about the abuse of executive power; but, said he, we are about to change the question, and to establish here dangerous assumptions of legislative power. By the act of the 15th of June, the fact of Michigan having assented to the conditions of that act is to be ascertained by the President of the United States alone; he is made the sole judge when the assent is given, and is to make the same known by proclamation. Has he found the fact to exist? or has he issued his proclamation? No; he has done neither. He informs us that one convention, elected and convened in pursuance of a law of the State, had not given its assent. He also informs us that another convention had met, and did assent; and he further says, that if the proceedings of this latter convention had come to him in the recess of Congress, he would have issued his proclamation in conformity with the provision of the act of Congress, if he was satisfied that this convention, in all respects, had accorded with the will of the people of Michigan. The President was not satisfied that such facts existed, upon which his proclamation ought to issue, and he referred the whole proceedings to Congress; and this very reference ought to prove to us that the fact did not exist, and that Michigan had not complied with the conditions required of her; and he referred it, in order that the restrictions might be removed; but, instead of removing the restrictions, we are about to find the fact of assent. He was anxious that this question should come to an issue, and that Michigan should come into the Union, but was not willing to sacrifice any principle to attain even this desirable end. He thought it would be better for the people of Michigan themselves, and more satisfactory, if they were kept a little longer out of the Union, rather than have a principle adopted which both of her conventions had declared to be unconstitutional. He trusted, however, that the difficulties might be remedied in the way suggested by the chairman of the committee; for he understood the gentleman to say that he viewed the preamble as of little consequence, and would vote for the bill if it was stricken out; yet he would feel himself bound to retain it, although he considered it perfectly harmless and nugatory.

Now, if this was the case, he hoped the gentleman, in courtesy, would at once agree to let it be stricken out by the Senate, without his vote, as he believed it to be entirely unimportant, while other gentlemen believed it involved a dangerous principle, and would compel them to vote against the bill if it was retained; and he fully believed, that if the gentleman would thus give his assent, and the obnoxious preamble was stricken out, there would not be a dissenting voice to the admission of the new State into the Union. He could see no prejudice that would result, in pursuing this course, to the boundaries of either Ohio or Indiana; their boundaries were already settled, and could not be disturbed, whether the preamble was retained or not. A great deal (said Mr. M.) has been said here about Michigan having extended her jurisdiction over part of the territory belonging to Ohio and Indiana; but if he understood the constitution of Michigan, no definite boundary was established by that instrument. It was in the preamble to the constitution it was to be found, and in that alone. It was there provided that the people inhabiting the Territory, as established by the act of Congress of 1805, formed for themselves a State Government; this he considered as creating no difficulty as it respected the question of boundary, either with Ohio or Indiana. He therefore most sincerely hoped the honorable chairman would give his assent to thus striking out the preamble, for with it he thought it impossible to vote for the bill.

The honorable chairman, he said, had told us that this was not a party or political question. He agreed with him that it was not. He felt that he ought to approach it as a judge; and, so far as he was advised of the important principle involved in the case, he would endeavor to decide upon it according to the dictates of his best judgment. He trusted that no Senator would give his vote on this question under the influence of party or political feelings. However, (said Mr. M.,) we may be attached to party for the purpose of favoring political views as to future policy; yet, when we come to a question of the magnitude of the one before us, we must decide it upon higher grounds, and suffer ourselves to be influenced by the sound principles of justice only. If Michigan was not a State, when would her existence as a State commence? If she was a State at the time the act of the 15th of June last was passed, she could only speak or rather make known her will as such State, and therefore the assent of this latter convention was not her act. If, said he, we recognise her as a State, we must date her existence from the time she adopted her constitution; and if her Senators and Representative, who have been elected to Congress, are entitled to seats, then indeed was she a State to all intents and purposes from that time; and the convention which afterwards met without authority was in derogation of all her State rights. No gentleman, he presumed, would deny this; and yet we are about to set up the acts of certain unauthorized individuals as above the constituted authorities of the State. There was one circumstance which he deemed somewhat material, which he wished to notice. The number of delegates which composed the first convention was forty-nine, and he took it for granted that the law of Michigan prescribed this number. But the convention which gave its assent to the act of Congress was composed of seventy-two members. How happened this? Was this a movement by which certain gentlemen in the State were to be put up, and others put down? Who apportioned to one county twelve delegates, the sixth part of the whole number, while an adjoining county sent but two? Where was the power in Michigan to make this discrimination, except the legislative power? Sir, (said Mr. M.,) admit the truth of this preamble, and then the legitimate lengths to which it may be carried, and we dissolve the very elements of Government, and reduce its power to physical or numerical force. It is through anarchy that we arrive at despotism. Submit this to any State, even to Michigan herself, freed from duress, and no one would agree to it. He was sure it never would be assented to in his own State; her people had no authority to change her political condition, even by the consent or advice of Congress, but only through their own Legislature, and in the manner and form in which they had bound themselves to each other in their own constitution. It has been said that the first step from correct principles was taken with more difficulty than others which followed. As in morals, so in politics: if we once let go our hold on the constitution, for any purpose whatever, we may soon find it convenient to dispense with it on most if not every occasion. These (Mr. M. said) were his views on this important question, delivered, to be sure, in desultory and unconnected manner; and he thanked the Senate for their patient attention.

Mr. STRANGE said he should detain the Senate but a moment or two; for, in his judgment, there was not space for much pertinent argumentation on the subject under consideration. He did not perceive the alarming consequences from the adoption of the preamble, which presented themselves to the minds of other gentlemen; nor, indeed, did he much care, except so far as it might be gratifying to others to retain it, whether the preamble accompanied the bill or not. The retention of it struck him as being an exceedingly simple matter, involving no assertion either dangerous or untrue. Congress, at the last session, passed a law constituting Michigan one of the States of this Union upon a particular condition therein prescribed, and the preamble merely asserted the performance of that condition. And what was that condition? Why, that the people of Michigan should hold a convention, and agree therein to be bound by the territorial limits prescribed by Congress to that State. Have the people of Michigan complied with that condition? Has she held her convention, and given the assent required? It was not denied, as he understood, that a convention had been holden, but the manner of holding it was objected to. He was not aware that either the common law, or any statute, prescribed any mode of assembling conventions; and no mode was prescribed in the act of Congress imposing upon Michigan the condition of holding this convention; and it was rather hard now, after she had holden her convention, to tell her that she could take nothing by it, because it had not been properly holden, although no landmarks for her guidance were laid down by the common law or statute, and Congress herself had neglected to indicate any mode in which a convention might be constituted satisfactory to herself. Michigan was left, as we are still left, to the plain dictates of common sense, that a convention was an assemblage of the people of a community, in person or by their agents or representatives, no matter how assembled; and by that plain principle of common sense she has a right to ask that she shall be tried. How was the Government under which we live put in operation, but through the action of the primary assemblages of the people?—and who has ever dared to question the propriety of that result? And is Michigan now to be told, in the absence of all law, and in the face of such examples, that there was a particular mode of action, the only legitimate and proper one? The report of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee shows that Michigan has holden a convention and given her assent, and it is not denied that a convention has been holden, and the assent thereby given; but gentlemen say it is not a legitimate convention, but do not show us what is necessary to constitute a legitimate convention. It has been assumed, in the argument of this matter, that Michigan is a State. If so, there is nothing left, it seemed to him, either to dispute or legislate about. The Senators and Representative from that State were entitled to their seats without further action. He was not prepared to admit that she was a State. She was unquestionably once a Territory, the property of this Union, and could only rise to the dignity of a sovereign State by the consent of Congress, properly given. Congress had given this consent, but it was accompanied with certain conditions, which conditions must be performed ere the consent could take effect; and whether these conditions had been performed was the very matter under consideration. He denied that there was any chrysalis state in which she ceased to be a Territory, and yet was not a member of this Union. The transition must necessarily be instantaneous from territorial existence to that of membership in the Union. Until she became a State she continued to be a Territory, and only ceased to be a Territory when she became a State in the Union. Her existence as a State, and her membership in the Union, were the cotemporaneous effects of one action.

If he rightly understood the reason why Congress had imposed this condition upon Michigan, it was that there might be no future difficulty between her and the States of Ohio and Indiana, relative to boundary. Congress could never decide the judicial question, as to what effect any or all the circumstances should have upon the rights of the several parties. As a matter of prudence, she might ask conditions which might, in her judgment, tend to peace, but it remained to the judicial tribunals of the country only to decide ultimately upon their regularity and effect. A rigid technical course was, therefore, unbefitting Congress; and nothing remained for her at present but to ascertain, upon broad and liberal principles, whether the condition required of Michigan had been performed.

Some reference had been made to the State of Maryland in the course of the argument, which, by the by, he did not think at all parallel to the case of Michigan; but, as it had been mentioned, he would say that if the people of Maryland, or any other State, thought proper at any time, by a convention, however originated or organized, to change her constitution, Congress would have no right to interfere, unless she departed from a republican form of government. It was an affair entirely domestic; and the authority of Congress to interfere in the matter, under any circumstances, could only be by force of the fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States, by which a republican form of government is guarantied by the United States to the States, respectively. The evil of such a course, if any, would be confined to the citizens of the State itself; and neither the General Government, nor that of any other State, would have a right to interfere, as long as the republican form of government was preserved. But the case of Michigan fell far short of this, and, in his judgment, involved no question which could alarm the most apprehensive. It was a case which could only occur on the formation and admission of new States, and could be drawn into precedent under no other circumstances. The simple question, he repeated, was, has Michigan complied with the conditions required of her? The preamble affirmed that she had, and, believing it to be true, he should vote for retaining it.—

Mr. DANA said: I have listened with attention to the arguments of the gentlemen opposed to the admission of Michigan into the Union, and have perceived no sound reason for rejecting her application. She has, as is admitted by those gentlemen, complied with all the conditions required of her. She has the requisite population; she has formed a republican constitution; and Congress, by its act of last session, has approved of that constitution. And does not an imperious duty rest on us to receive that State into the Union? She asks it, and I am satisfied that we are bound to grant her request. And why not do it now, sir? We are told by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that we cannot do it without a violation of the constitution; and by the honorable member from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS,] that it cannot be done without dissolving the elements of our Union? But how stands the case? Let us advert to the principles and facts on which this question rests. Sir, a long and severe contest had existed between Michigan and Ohio in relation to their boundary line, each claiming the same territory, and each ready to defend it with their lives. Michigan claimed an admission into the Union; but Congress could not admit her, standing as she did in a hostile attitude towards one of the States of the Union, until the exciting question of boundary was settled. And the wisdom of this measure is apparent to every one. To have admitted her with her quarrel into the Union would have been dangerous and ruinous. Congress, therefore, in the first place, proceeded to settle the boundary line between these contending parties, upon principles conceived to be right, and then to limit and prescribe the boundaries, and point out the territory over which Michigan should have jurisdiction; and then, in the same act of June, it approved of her constitution, and provided for her admission into the Union by the proclamation of the President, if a majority of delegates, chosen by the people for that sole purpose, should give their assent to the terms of admission prescribed by said act. And to me it appears that the only question for us to consider is, have a majority of a convention, thus chosen, given their assent to the terms of admission? If they have, we are bound, sir, to admit them.

It is understood, sir, that a convention of the people of Michigan was held in September last, who did not give their assent to the terms of admission prescribed by this act; and of course the President did not admit that State into the Union by proclamation. It is further understood, that a second convention was held on the 15th December last, who did give their assent to the terms prescribed by the act, as before mentioned; but the evidence of this assent was not communicated to the President until after the present session of Congress. He did not admit the State by proclamation, but said he should have done so had he received evidence of the fact of the assent of the convention during the recess. As he did not, he has submitted the subject to the present Congress.

These, sir, are the facts. And, now, what are the principles by which we are to be governed in the case? If, sir, I understand any thing of statutes, or their construction, the act of Congress of last June, defining the limits and regulating the jurisdiction of Michigan, accepting her constitution, and providing for her admission into the Union as an independent State, stands, as it ever has stood, an act of Congress. That section of it, however, which authorized the President to admit this State by proclamation, not having been acted upon by him, is inoperative; a dead letter. The power delegated by Congress to him, now reverts to them, and we can admit upon the same terms on which we authorized the President to admit this State, or we can admit upon such other terms as Congress shall deem wise and expedient. But, sir, we are told by grave and learned Senators that Congress having authorized the President to perform this service on a certain contingency, that he, and he alone, can receive this State into the Union. Is this sound doctrine? Can it be so? Let us examine this position. On receiving evidence of the assent of a majority of the convention, the President was authorized to admit this State into the Union. He does not receive this evidence, or not in season, and the subject is submitted to Congress. Now, sir, my apprehension is, that the President's power conferred by the act has ended; that it has reverted to Congress; and they alone can exercise it. Does a delegated power for a specific object, and for a limited time, always continue? Cannot those who constitute an agent also revoke his power? And can they not exercise that power, when voluntarily surrendered by the agent? If not, I have yet to learn the first principles of statutes and their construction. Yes, sir, in my humble opinion, we have a right to exercise the powers we delegated to the President, and that section of the statute granting them will not be violated. That section is dead, and as if it never had passed; and the powers return to us, and, I trust, to be exercised by us in the admission of this State.

But, sir, we are met with another objection, viz: That a majority of the convention have not assented to the terms prescribed in the act of June last. We are told, sir, that one convention assembled for the purpose of giving their assent, but withheld it, and that their doings ought to be conclusive. Again: the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. EWING] tells us that the second convention was not called by authority, not according to act of Congress; that it originated with the people, and that they assembled in their primary meetings and chose their delegates to the convention. And then he triumphantly asks, who presided at those meetings? How were they organized, and who swore their officers? My reply to these positions and inquiries is, first, that the act of Congress requiring the assent of the convention does not point out how the delegates shall be chosen. It requires the assent of a majority of a convention chosen by the people for that purpose. Here, sir, the law has left it, and wisely left it, to the people to select their delegates in their own way. If a particular mode had been pointed out, that mode must have been pursued; but as there was none, the people were left to their own election, and they have exercised their powers as they thought most judicious. And now, sir, because they have not exercised them in a manner agreeable to the views of gentlemen, but in perfect accordance with the act of Congress, shall we set aside their doings, and compel them to wait year after year for the enjoyment of those rights and privileges to which they have long been entitled? "Who presided at those meetings? How were they organized, and who swore their officers?" Claiming the privilege of a Yankee, I will answer these questions by proposing others. Who presided over the meetings when the former delegates were chosen; and how were those meetings organized? Who swore their officers? I have no doubt but that the town meetings were properly organized, governed, and the officers duly qualified. But, sir, is that a question before this honorable body? Has this Senate looked into the organization of towns, and to the qualifications of their officers? Such an instance I have never known, nor does it in my opinion exist. What, sir, shall this grave Senate convert itself into an inquisitorial body over primary assemblies? And where shall we begin, and where end? Suppose we look into their organization for the year 1836. That inquiry must necessarily carry us to their organization, and the qualification of their officers for 1835; and so we should go on to the first precedent under the constitution. The idea is too absurd to dwell upon. And why should we doubt a correct procedure in the primary assemblies of the people of Michigan any more than in those of Ohio, or any other State? No, sir; the people of Michigan had a right to hold their primary meetings and choose their delegates, and they have done it; and who has a right to gainsay it? There seems to be a dread of the revolutionary character of these meetings! A dread of the doings of the people? Sir, I have no fear of either. When left to themselves, the people will generally do right; much more so than those who would trammel them, and lead them astray. Neither have I any of those apprehensions or gloomy forebodings which seemed to alarm the mind of the honorable Senator from South Carolina in regard to the violation of the constitution; nor have I any fears that the elements of our Government will be dissolved, which seemed to burden the anticipations of the honorable member from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS,] although we should adopt the proposed measures of admission. Sir, our glorious independence was the purchase of blood and treasure lavishly expended, and our constitution and form of government the result of mature wisdom and experience combined; and are these States, after all, bound together by such feeble ligaments? Is the value of our Union so slightly appreciated as to be dissolved upon false issues, and for trivial causes? I will not indulge in such anticipations, especially not as the consequence of this measure.

Much, sir, has been objected to the passing of this bill, because the first convention of delegates withheld their assent to the requisitions of the act. I am not at all surprised that they did; nor ought this to operate in any way against their subsequent assent. Consider for a moment the situation of the people of Michigan, when they chose their delegates to the first convention. They were then agitated by the question of boundary; they were disappointed at the decision of Congress; they were smarting under the wounds they had received from Ohio; and, not having time nor being in a condition to reflect upon the advantages and disadvantages of a union with the States, they did not consent to the terms proposed by the National Legislature. Is this, then, strange? Would it not have been more strange if, under the circumstances, they had given their assent? But, sir, when passion had subsided, and opportunity had been given for reflecting upon the situation of a State out of the Union, they discovered that they were depriving themselves of great and inestimable advantages; that their present state was one of weakness and exposure, and strength and protection could only be found in the Union. Was it, then, wonderful that a change of sentiments should have taken place? No, sir, it would have been much more wonderful if a change in this respect had not taken place. And is it true that, because one convention did not consent to the terms prescribed, another could not? No, sir, if one or two, or even a dozen conventions, had refused their assent to the conditions, and afterwards, upon reflection, the people changed their minds, and chose a convention, a majority of whom at last gave their assent, they would even then have had an incontestable right of admission into the Union. Beside, this last convention was chosen by about three thousand votes more than the former one.

Sir, actuated by these principles, applied to these facts, I can entertain no doubt of the rights of Michigan in this case, and the path of our duty is equally clear. But I am not for admitting them without retaining the preamble in the bill. That connects their admission with the terms prescribed in the act of June, and that settles the boundary line between Michigan and Ohio, and puts an end to the long and bitter, if not bloody, contest in which those two States have been involved. Nothing can be more abhorrent to the feelings of every friend of liberty and humanity, than a fratricidal war between two of the States of this Union. I would never admit Michigan and her quarrel, but it should be fully and permanently settled before she becomes one of the United States.

I concur, sir, in the views of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE,] that if this question should be brought up hereafter, it must be settled by a judicial tribunal. But the act of Congress prescribing and making known the terms of admission, and the assent of the convention to those terms, together with the preamble of the present bill, would, I apprehend, throw an insuperable barrier in the way of a recovery by Michigan. I am therefore for retaining the preamble.

A single thought more, and I have done. It is not denied that Michigan embraces a population which entitles her to a rank among her sister States; that she has formed a republican constitution and organized her Government under it, and that Congress have approved of it. She has also given her assent to the terms prescribed, and now presents herself for admission into the Union, and for her legitimate rank as an independent sovereign State. Her claim is not without precedent, but has frequently been conceded to others. Now, let me ask, what is the duty of Congress? Have we a right to deny her this privilege? Shall we continue to debar her, from year to year, of rights and privileges to which she is entitled, and which she demands at our hands? Sir, a solemn duty devolves upon us, and I trust that we shall best discharge it by immediately admitting this State into the Union.

Mr. WALKER said that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] seemed to consider the question of the admission of Michigan as a State of the Union, at the present session of Congress, as fraught with alarming consequences. The preamble of the bill now under consideration, the Senator tells us, embodies principles anarchical, revolutionary, and subversive of the constitution of the Union. The Senator says Congress can call no other convention than one to amend the constitution of the Union. Yet, said Mr. W., they have repeatedly called conventions to enable the people within certain territorial limits to form State Governments. And Mr.

SENATE.]

Admission of Michigan.

W. read extracts from various acts of Congress to this effect.

[Mr. CALHOUN here said he intended to say that Congress could call no convention in a State, and that Michigan was a State when this convention was called.]

If, then, said Mr. WALKER, Michigan is a State, or was so when this convention was called or assembled, why does the gentleman refuse to consider her as a State, and deny her, not only now, but till next year, any representation in the Senate of the Union. If she (Michigan) is a State, as the gentleman asserts, she must be entitled to all the rights of a State, and especially to the most important of all those rights, that of representation in the Congress of the Union. Sir, said Mr. W., this convention in Michigan has been assembled, as in former cases, by a people passing from territorial pupillage to State sovereignty, and is called by Congress in the same manner as similar conventions have been heretofore called by Congress, for the same purpose. But if Michigan be a State, and it be a violation of State sovereignty to authorize the people to call a convention, is it not equally a violation of State sovereignty for Congress to authorize the Legislature to call a convention in Michigan, and especially to call such a convention in a manner repugnant to the provisions of the constitution of Michigan? Yet the Senator from South Carolina adopts the proceedings of the first convention, and disowns the proceedings of the second convention. Was the first convention called in pursuance of the act of Congress? If so, that convention, according to the Senator's argument, is a gross violation of the constitution of the Union; and yet, if that convention was not called in pursuance of the act of Congress, the dissent of the convention to the terms proposed by Congress can have no effect. Now, one of the express grounds upon which the first convention refused its assent to the terms proposed by Congress was, that the convention then assembled had no control over the boundary question; the Legislature not having pursued the mode designated by the constitution of Michigan, in calling the convention. And yet the Senator from South Carolina would give efficacy to the proceedings of this convention, which disclaims its own authority and constitutional existence, whilst he denies the authority of the last convention, assembled in pursuance of the act of Congress. The act providing for the admission of Michigan as a State of the Union demands, as a prerequisite of admission, the assent of a convention of delegates elected by the people of Michigan, for the sole purpose of giving such assent. The intervention of the Legislature was not required, nay, it was previously dispensed with; for the bill, as proposed at the last session, did first require legislative action; but that clause of the bill was stricken out, as Mr. W. conceived, to satisfy those who contended that the Legislature could not, but by the assent of two thirds of that body, assemble a convention for any purpose whatever, and that the assent of a majority of the people was all that Congress required. But now the utmost authority is given to legislative action by those who denied its authority at the last session of Congress. A convention of delegates, elected by the people, was all that Congress required. That convention has assembled, and there is satisfactory evidence that it did truly represent the wishes of a majority of the people of Michigan. It was a convention called, not by Congress, but in pursuance of the act of Congress; and the act required no other authority. The President declares that this convention has so assembled, in pursuance of the act of Congress, and that if Congress were not in session, he would have issued his proclamation for the admission of Michigan.

Now, said Mr. W., the act of Congress authorized the President to form an opinion as to the validity of the convention, and admit Michigan. He has formed and communicated to us that opinion, and now gentlemen would not give the effect even of prima facie evidence to the President's opinion, as now officially communicated to this body. If the President was satisfied with the validity of the assenting convention, he might, under the law, have proclaimed Michigan a member of the Union. He tells us he is satisfied; and yet now that opinion is to have no effect whatever. All that Congress desired was the assent of a convention of the people, not of the Legislature of Michigan; and if the convention be revolutionary, the act of Congress is revolutionary; for it requires no assent or sanction of the Legislature of Michigan. But if the second convention be revolutionary, because not called in pursuance of any law of Michigan, why is not the first convention still more clearly revolutionary, because called in defiance of the provisions of the constitution of Michigan? But, said Mr. W., if Michigan became a State by the adoption by her people of their State constitution before the last session of Congress, why, when the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] at the last session, introduced his bill to annul all that had passed, and calling, by the mere act of Congress, a new convention in Michigan, did not the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] then oppose that act of Congress for calling that convention in what, it appears, the Senator considers the State of Michigan? Yet all the Senator's friends who voted on that bill voted for it; and, of course, if the Senator's present position be correct, violated the constitution of the Union. It is somewhat remarkable that Michigan is regarded by many as a Territory, when that view of the question will exclude her from the Union; and that again she is held up as a State, when that position, it is supposed, will delay her admission.

Mr. W. concluded by observing that, in his opinion, to delay longer the admission of Michigan would be an act of the clearest injustice, and a violation of the spirit of the constitution and of the ordinance of 1783.

Mr. TIPTON addressed the Senate in favor of the bill. Again, said he, we have before us the question of admitting Michigan into the Union as a member of this confederacy. This subject is an old acquaintance. Four years ago it came before us in the form of a memorial from her Territorial Legislature, praying Congress to authorize the election of delegates to a convention, for the purpose of framing a constitution, and to provide for her admission into the Union on an equal footing with the existing States. The subject was referred to a select committee, and a bill was reported accordingly; which, however, did not find favor with a majority of the Senate of that day. Every effort made by its friends was met by motions to postpone, lay on the table, or adjourn; the opposition having the power in the Senate to give the bill the go-by, the session closed without passing the bill, and, as he thought at the time, in denial of justice to the people of Michigan.

The people of the Territory, thus left to seek justice under the ordinance of Congress of July, 1787, in their own way appointed delegates to a convention, to form a constitution and State Government for themselves. But, unfortunately, by their constitution, they claimed jurisdiction over a portion of the territory of the neighboring States. They claimed to include within the jurisdictional limits of Michigan more than a thousand square miles of the State of Indiana. This territory was given to Indiana by an act of Congress of the 19th of April, 1816, authorizing the people of Indiana to form a constitution and State Government. The territory was accepted by Indiana, her laws extended over it, and thereby placed beyond the control of Congress or any other power except that of the people of Indiana. That part of the constitution of Michigan which lays a claim to jurisdiction over it, is, therefore, contrary to the constitution and laws of the United States, and necessarily void.

By the act of Congress of the 15th of June, 1836, Michigan was admitted into the Union on certain conditions, one of which prescribed the limits within which she was to exercise jurisdiction; confining her southern boundary to a line drawn through a point ten miles north of the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, which line is the northern boundary of the State of Indiana. To the boundaries thus prescribed, Michigan was required to give her assent by a convention of delegates elected by the people for that sole purpose. The President of the United States, on being notified that the assent of Michigan was given to the terms prescribed by Congress, was authorized and required to issue his proclamation announcing the fact; upon which she was to be admitted into the Union without further legislation on the part of Congress.

It appears, by the documents communicated to the Senate by the President, that there have been two conventions held in Michigan since the adjournment of Congress in July last. The delegates composing the first were elected in pursuance of a law of her Legislature. The convention consisted of forty-nine members, met at Ann Arbor in the month of September, and, by a vote of 28 to 21, refused to accept the terms of admission proposed by Congress. Various causes operated, we are told, to produce this result. The people of Michigan, finding the very unpleasant position in which they were placed by the non-acceptance of the terms of admission proposed to them, met in primary assemblies, and resolved to hold elections in the different counties for delegates to a convention, to accept the terms of admission proposed.

Elections were holden in an orderly and proper manner in every county but two. Near three thousand more votes were polled at this than at the former election. About 70 delegates were chosen, who met in convention on the 14th ult., and by their resolution, now on our tables, unanimously acceded to the terms upon which their admission was provided for.

Honorable Senators on the opposite side of this question deny the legality of this latter convention. They tell us it savors of revolution or misrule, is subversive of the constitution and principles of the Government under which we live, lacks the sanction of law, and does not by any means express the sentiments of the people of Michigan. What would the honorable Senators have had the people of Michigan to do? Congress had prescribed no method to be pursued by them in electing delegates to the convention. It said nothing about a law of the Legislature of Michigan being necessary to legalize the election. But, on the other hand, the delegates who composed the first convention declared, in the preamble to their resolutions, that the Legislature of Michigan derived no power from their constitution to authorize or direct the election of delegates to a convention.

If a competent authority had laid down rules by which these elections were to be conducted, the qualification of voters, &c., they would have been implicitly obeyed; but as nothing is said in the constitution or law upon the subject, the people were left to pursue such a mode of arriving at the object as they thought proper, and we learn that the elections were conducted in the manner heretofore usual in the Territory. With this I am satisfied. I consider it a convention of delegates elected by the people, for the sole purpose of giving the assent required; that they have given their assent will not, I presume, be denied. And, such being the case, I feel bound, from a sense of justice, to fulfil the agreement made with them on our part.

Mr. T. said he was somewhat surprised by the course pursued by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS.] That Senator was a member of the Judiciary Committee, who reported the bill under consideration, knew the views entertained by the majority of that committee, and now he moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out the preamble, because, as he tells us, it recognises the action of the last convention of delegates. The mode pursued in electing delegates to that convention he is pleased to characterize as revolutionary; and he tells us, all that is necessary is to strike out the preamble, and repeal the third section of the law of the 15th of June, requiring the assent of the people of Michigan to the terms of admission, and all will be right. I suppose he thinks all is safe as regards his own State, and that others must take care of themselves. Sir, I hope that the members of this Senate will bear in mind that, in framing the constitution of Ohio, doubts existed whether a line drawn due east from the southern extreme of Lake Michigan would terminate upon Lake Erie or the Detroit river; and the convention incorporated in the 6th section of the 7th article of the constitution of that State, a provision, that if the line referred to should not include the most northerly cape of the Maumee bay, then, and in that case, the northern boundary was to be extended so far north as to include it, with the assent of Congress. And, sir, the honorable members from Ohio, in this and the other branch of Congress have labored incessantly for forty years to obtain the assent of Congress to that provision, and it was not until the last session that a law could be passed fixing that boundary as he wished it, and now the honorable member tells us all is well. He is willing to strike the preamble from this bill, and repeal the third section of the law of last session, both of which require the agreement of Michigan to take the northern boundary of Indiana, as now established, as her southern limit. Sir, I shall vote against the recommitment, and against striking out the preamble of the present bill. I view the preamble as in fact the key to the true intent and meaning of the bill, and as important as any part of it. If it be stricken out, I must vote against the bill. To pass the bill without the preamble, would, in my judgment, endanger the peace of more than one State. To retain it can be productive of no evil, whilst striking it out might be followed by serious consequences. It might give Michigan grounds to believe that she would be supported here in the extraordinary claim she has set up to more than a thousand square miles of the State of Indiana, a territory which Indiana will never resign.

I am in favor of the bill as it came from the Judiciary Committee. It will quiet forever the unjustifiable claim of Michigan to a portion of the State from which I come. I am anxious she should be admitted into the Union, when this can be done with a due regard to the interests of the neighboring States; and I think this can be best effected by passing the bill as it came from the committee.

Before the question was taken, on motion of Mr EWING, of Ohio,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 3.

After the reception and reference of sundry petitions, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill declaring the admission into the Union of

THE STATE OF MICHIGAN.

The question pending was on a motion made yesterday by Mr. MORRIS, to strike out the preamble of the bill. This motion Mr. M. now varied, by moving an amendment to the preamble, (recapitulating the proceedings in Michigan under the act of the last session of Congress for the admission of the State,) which modified cation he was desirous of trying before the question should be taken on striking out the preamble.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, rose and addressed the Senate nearly as follows:

To the bill now before the Senate (said he) I have no other objection than that which I stated at the last session, viz: that I feel reluctant to admit a new State into the Union, unless she come in regularly, in accordance with a law of Congress previously enacted.

But I waived this objection in the case of Arkansas, because a precedent had been set by the admission of Michigan at the last session. Still, however, I think it wrong; the practice is loose, irregular, and calculated to lead to bad consequences. And I think it proper to say that in the present question, in any of its forms, the State of Ohio has no interest whatever; none in the preamble, none in the bill itself, save that interest which she shares in common with all the other members of the confederacy; and in voting on this question, I shall vote precisely as if Ohio were the most distant State in the Union from Michigan, instead of being separated from it only by a boundary line, which line was once disputed.

On this subject my colleague and myself entirely concur. Indeed, we have from the first differed but little in our opinion as to the controversy lately pending between our State and Michigan; but we here concur entirely as to the effect of this preamble upon her, and we may fairly assume that we speak the opinion and feelings of the State on that point. We hold this preamble untrue in fact, and of most dangerous tendency. Our State, for whose benefit gentlemen profess to have inserted it, has no interest in the thing. She does not ask for it; and if she had an interest, no matter how deep and vital, she would not consent that that interest should be subverted by stating, in a solemn act of legislation, that which is untrue.

Permit me to reiterate that there exists at this moment no controversy whatever between Ohio and Michigan, nor does there exist, at least on the part of the citizens of Ohio, the slightest feeling of enmity toward their neighboring fellow-citizens. There is no such feeling there; and I well know there is none here. The controversy which once agitated and excited them is now settled. Congress, by its act, has assented to the boundary claimed by Ohio in 1803, before Michigan was erected into a Territory; and unless the act of 1805 is irrevocable, there can never again be any controversy between Ohio and Michigan on the question of boundary. If it is pronounced irrevocable, then it is not in the power of Congress to modify or touch it, and the boundary therein specified will be declared by the Supreme Court to be the true boundary. But if that act is not irrevocable, we are so affected by it that it never can be revived against Ohio.

But I said the preamble to this bill asserts what is not a fact. I shall endeavor to make that position good. What is its language?

"Whereas, in pursuance of the act of Congress of June the fifteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled 'An act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed,' a convention of delegates, elected by the people of the said State of Michigan, for the sole purpose of giving their assent to the boundaries of the said State of Michigan, as described, declared, and established, in and by the said act, d.d. on the fifteenth of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, assent to the provisions of said act: therefore"—

Now, I take it that, in the insertion of this preamble, the Judiciary Committee meant to declare that the convention referred to was a legal convention; that it was such a convention as is contemplated in the act of Congress for the admission of Michigan into the Union; that it was a convention according to law. This is the fact asserted in the preamble, and this I controvert.

The evidence is well condensed in the recital which my colleague offered as an amendment to the preamble, and we have it more at large from the President, in his official communication now on our tables. From this it appears that a convention, called by an act of the Legislature of Michigan, did assemble, and, after deliberation, did refuse to enter the Union under the conditions of the act of Congress, and that their dissent was forwarded to the Executive. Now, it is said by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] this convention was not held according to the act of Congress; that Congress directed the people to meet; and that no reference was had in the act to the interposition of the Legislature of Michigan; but that a subsequent convention, which, it is said, afterwards assembled, alone satisfied the law. The question, then, is between the two conventions. If the first was legal, the last was not. If the first was not legal, then we may inquire into the legality of the second. Now, let me put one question to that honorable Senator; I ask him whether, had the first convention, instead of rejecting, accepted the conditions contained in the act of Congress, would he, in that case, have held that assent illegal? Would he then have said that it was a convention not held according to the act of Congress? I would almost venture to say that he would not; I rather think the convention would have passed pretty well. But if so, what has altered the matter? If that was a proper mode of calling a convention which assented, why was it not a proper mode of calling a convention which refused its assent? But after the convention assembled by the Legislature of the State of Michigan (for our act did recognise her as a State, though I think very improperly) had dissented, no attempt whatever was made by the constituted authorities of the State to bring together another; none whatever. But an assemblage of the people, in meetings which are familiarly denominated caucuses, was held in some of the counties, and mutually agreed to call a new convention. Committees got together, and, after consultation, publish a time and place at which it is to assemble. The whole matter was utterly unauthorized, save by party organization, and was the effect of such organization. Will any man dispute it? Will any man pretend that this latter convention was the effect of a simultaneous and spontaneous impulse of the whole people of Michigan? Is there any the least proof of such being the fact? The convention originated in county calls; and all the counties but two joined in the plan, and held elections for delegates. What evidence is there of any regularity in these elections?

Let us look at the papers. We have, to be sure, the act of the convention itself, giving the assent of the State to the act of admission, and which was transmitted to the President of the United States. And we have the certificate of General Williams, said to have been the presiding officer of the convention, and the names of the delegates. But there is not any official act or signature of any officer known to the laws, either of Michigan or of the United States; not the slightest proof of their election or qualification. That paper, containing the assent of Michigan in a matter so important, is not at all authenticated. Where do you find the law according to which it was conducted? There is none. It rests on nothing. There was a meeting of certain individuals held at a place called, I believe, Ann Arbor; and we have certain resolutions of theirs, which are to avail against the doings of a convention held in pursuance of a law of the State, and all whose acts are fully and legally authenticated. I cannot recognise such a paper. I must do violence to my own judgment, should I receive it. Even the chairman of the Judiciary Committee could not do it. He called upon the Senators elect (and whose admission here is to follow the passage of the bill) to say that every thing at this self-styled convention was well and duly conducted; and they do say so, and give the private letters of certain individuals to that effect. And they give, further—and that I understand to be the evidence principally relied on—an article from a Detroit newspaper, stating that such an election was had, such convention held, 3,000 more votes were given for the delegates to this last convention than for those who constituted the first convention. This, sir, is the evidence to support an organic law of a new State about to enter the Union! Yes, of an organic law, the very highest act a community of men can perform. Letters, referring to other letters! and a scrap of a newspaper!

I am not satisfied that the Government of my country, or of any portion of it, should stand on such a foundation. I am not willing that an organic law of a sovereign State should be thus made and thus authenticated.

But supposing that all the counties of Michigan did agree to the proposal, and did send delegates to this last convention, and we had the returns of the elections; yet who, I ask, presided at the polls? Who determined what votes should be received? How many votes was each man who favored the object permitted to give? Who voted? Was it the qualified electors, or was it all the men, women, and children, of Michigan and its vicinity?

The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. DANA] says we are not in the habit of going into town meetings to see whether the votes are regularly polled for members of Congress; and he asks why we should be so particular in this case. The gentleman seems to have no conception of the difficulty in which his party have involved themselves. It is true, we don't go into the doings of town meetings; and why? Because those meetings are held by regular authority; the officers who preside are appointed by the State, and their certificate is official and legal evidence of that which they certify. That certificate is submitted to a superior officer, appointed also according to law; that high officer of the State is known to the nation, and his certificate is evidence to us of all that it covers, thus constituting a regular chain of legal evidence and official authentication. But here there is no official, no legal evidence whatever—nothing but the certificates and statements of unauthorized and generally interested individuals.

In this case, therefore, if we aim at truth, we must go into detail; we must poll the votes; we must see for ourselves whether the people were called together, and how called, and whether they obeyed the call; because we have no regularly appointed chain of officers to ascertain these facts and certify them to us.

But the honorable Senator from Tennessee says, that though we may be without evidence which is strictly legal, yet we do possess such evidence as is made every day the basis of legislation; nay, that we often proceed on much looser evidence; and he seems to think that we may well dispense with that exact legal evidence on this occasion. And yet he says that the recital in the preamble of the bill, containing an assertion of facts of which we have no legal proof, will create a legal estoppel against Michigan, which will forever bar her from hereafter contesting the question of boundary with Ohio. Indeed! and what sort of an estoppel is this to bind a sovereign and independent community? The letters of A, B, and C, and a paragraph in a Detroit newspaper! Will the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate of the United States place himself upon this ground in a matter of such moment? He cannot, I am sure, have duly considered the matter; he could not deliberately wish to bind one of the States of this confederacy by an act resting on this loose assertion, without evidence.

It is said, however, that the law of Congress pointed out no particular mode in which the people of Michigan were to meet, in order to express their assent or dissent to the proposition contained in the law; that this was an omission on the part of Congress, and no fault in the people of Michigan. Agreed: I know it was a defect in the law. I saw it, too, at the time. I understood and suggested it, but to no purpose. But how was that bill passed? It was forced through the Senate by a majority of one vote; it was driven through late at night; and those who were opposed to it had not time allowed them to state and to support their objections, or even to counsel with the majority as to the mode of obviating them; and for the reason, if I rightly remember, that one of the Senators on the other side wished to make a short excursion of business or pleasure into the country.

I, for one, looked upon the third section of the act for the admission of Michigan as a perfectly nugatory provision. It seems to be supposed that the Senators from Ohio sought the insertion of this third section because they did not agree that the assent of the Legislature of Michigan and her Senators and Representative here to the conditions in the bill would be binding on the State. We did, it is true, hold that their assent would be invalid. We did, it is true, say that their assent would be nugatory; but we did not, therefore, ask for the third section authorizing a convention, and we held that the assent of such convention, if given, would be void also. And why? Because Congress had recognised the constitution of Michigan as that of a sovereign State; we had recognised her Senators as elected under it, and then proposed, by an act of Congress, to authorize the amendment of that constitution in another mode than that pointed out by the constitution itself. And if she were a State, as that law avers, I held, and I hold now, that we could no more touch her constitution by an act of Congress, than that of any other sovereign State. I indeed did not admit that she was a State; but gentlemen on the other side did aver it; that law assumed it, and an essential part of its provisions rested on the assumption. Gentlemen having taken their position, and sustained it by a vote of the Senate, had no right to change that position; and on the ground chosen by themselves we met them, and now meet them. The act, then, as it is now construed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, authorized the people of a State to meet in convention and amend their constitution; and, in the plenitude of our power and of our democracy, we pass by the Legislature of the State, and appeal directly to the people; we ask the people to act without organization, without law; and when they, or such part of them as will obey our call, have so acted, we pronounce the act valid, and the constitution of the State changed. You have the same right, sir, to set aside the regularly constituted authorities of Ohio, to pass by her constitution and her Legislature, and appeal to the people to change their organic law; and when the caucus which you have so called shall have met and changed it, you have the same right to recognise and hold it binding upon the State. The doctrine is monstrous, and of most mischievous tendency.

It has been said by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] that this is no party question. It is very true it ought not to be made one; so far as I have any feeling in the matter, it can only be thus far a party question. If the parties in this republic have resolved themselves into a constitutional and caucus party, I am of the party that goes for constitutions and constitutional government, against caucus and a government by caucus. And as this preamble goes directly to put down constitutional government, and put up in its place and legalize a government by caucus, I am opposed to it, and I belong to a party every member of which, if true to his principles, must also oppose it.

When Mr. EWING had concluded,

Mr. BUCHANAN rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: Judging from the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] this would seem to be a question big with the fate of the constitution and the country. According to him, the adoption of the preamble to the bill admitting Michigan into the Union, as it was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, would entail upon us evils as numerous and as deadly as those contained in Pandora's box, whilst hope would not even remain. After depicting in melancholy colors the cruel destiny of our country, should this precedent be established, he concludes by saying, that in such an event this Government would become "one of the most odious and despotic Governments that ever existed on the face of the earth."

I presume it is attributable to my colder temperament that I feel none of these terrors. In my opinion, they spring altogether from the Senator's ardent imagination and creative genius. Since I came into public life, I have known the country to be ruined at least twenty times, in the opinion of gentlemen; yet it would seem that the more we are thus ruined, the more we flourish. Experience has taught me to pay little attention to these doleful predictions.

The best answer which can be given to the Senator is to come at once to the question. To state it in its plain and simple character will at once dissipate every fear. Its decision will be attended with but little difficulty, because it involves no new principles; and as to its importance as a precedent, we shall probably never hear of it again, after the admission of Michigan into the Union.

What, then, is the question? On this subject our memories would seem to be strangely in fault. We cannot recollect from one session to the other. I wish to recall the attention of Senators to the fact. It was deemed of great importance at the last session to obtain the consent of Michigan to the settlement of the boundary between her and Ohio. To accomplish this purpose was then of so much consequence, in our opinion, that we offered to Michigan a large territory on her northern boundary, as a compensation for what she should yield to Ohio on the south; and we made her acceptance of this offer a condition precedent of her admission into the Union. We then believed, and I still believe, that this was the only mode of settling forever the disputed boundary between Ohio and Michigan, which has already involved us in so many difficulties, threatening bloodshed and civil war on that frontier. This was then deemed the only mode of obtaining an absolute relinquishment of all claim, on the part of the people of Michigan, to the territory in dispute with Ohio. It became my duty at the last session to investigate this subject thoroughly; and I had many conferences upon it with the then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. CLAYTON]—a man of as clear a head and as honest a heart as ever adorned this chamber. I am happy to state that, although we concurred in opinion that Michigan had no right to this territory under the compact of 1787, yet we also believed that the only mode of putting the question at rest forever was to obtain her own solemn recognition of the right of Ohio. For this very purpose, the third section was inserted in the act of the last session, declaring "that, as a compliance with the fundamental condition of admission" into the Union, the boundaries of the State of Michigan, as we then established them, "shall receive the assent of a convention of delegates elected by the people of said State, for the sole purpose of giving the assent herein required."

Shall we now, after Michigan has given this assent in the terms prescribed, release her from this obligation? Shall we now strike out the preamble by which we recognise the validity and binding effect of the assent given by the last convention of delegates, and thus throw the boundary question again open? Shall we undo all we have done with so much care at the last session, and admit Michigan into the Union as though we had never required from her any assent to this condition? I trust not. And here permit me to express my astonishment that the Senators from Ohio should both advocate this course. I have no right to judge for them, but it does seem to me they are willing to abandon the only security which we have against a repetition of the scenes which we have already witnessed on the frontiers of Ohio and Michigan.

To show that my fears are not vain, let me present the state in which this question will be placed, in case we do not adopt the preamble. I think I may assert, with perfect safety, that there are ninety-nine citizens of Michigan out of every hundred who firmly believe that the ordinance of 1787 fixes irrevocably the southern boundary of that State. If this were its correct construction, it will not be denied by any that no human power can change it without the consent of the people of Michigan. This ordinance, which is confirmed by the constitution of the United States, to use its own language, is a compact between the original States and the people and States in the said Territory, and must forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent. Hence the vast importance of obtaining the consent of Michigan to the proposed change in her boundary. The language of the ordinance under which she claims the disputed territory is as follows: "Provided, however, and it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three States (Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois) shall be subject so far to be altered that, if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of said territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan." Michigan contends that Congress having determined to form two States north of this line, the ordinance makes it irrevocably her southern boundary. Some of the most distinguished men in the country, we know, are of this opinion. Can any Senator, therefore, believe for a moment that, if we now leave this question unsettled, it will never be tried by Michigan? Can we believe that she will acquiesce in a decision of Congress which a vast majority of her people believe to have been unjust? Release her from the assent which she has given to the settlement of this question, and then it remains as open as it ever was. The point, then, to be decided is, whether the ordinance does fix her southern boundary or not. Admitting it did, it is manifest that the act of Congress repealing it, and giving the territory in dispute to Ohio, would be a violation of its provisions, and thus become a dead letter. Yes, sir, the consent of Michigan is all-important to the peace and quiet of the Union; and now, when we have obtained it, shall we cast it away by rejecting this preamble? That is the question which I shall now proceed to discuss.

Why, then, should we reject this preamble, which will forever terminate the dispute between these two States? Because, says the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] this convention of delegates, elected by the people of Michigan, was not authorized by a previous act of their State Legislature, and therefore their proceedings are a nullity. It is revolutionary, it is dangerous in itself to our rights and liberties, and still more dangerous as a precedent for future cases. If this be true, the people of Michigan are in a most unfortunate position. At the last session of Congress, if we had attempted to insert in the bill a provision to make the previous act of the Legislature necessary, it would then have been opposed as a revolutionary measure. It would have been demonstrated by Senators that the Legislature of Michigan was an unauthorized assembly, possessing no legitimate powers; that it was a body which we had never recognised; and, therefore, we could refer nothing to its decision. In making these assertions, I speak from the record.

It appears from the journals that, on the 26th of January last, the Vice President communicated to the Senate "the memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan," on the subject of their right to be admitted into the Union. On the motion of Mr. Hendricks, this memorial was referred, accompanied by a declaration "that the Senate regard the same in no other light than as the voluntary act of private individuals." Mr. Ruggles moved to strike out this declaration; and, on the yeas and nays, his motion was rejected by a vote of 30 to 12. Thus the Senate then solemnly determined that the Legislature of Michigan was a mere assembly of private individuals; and yet now we are told by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that, because this very Legislature did not pass an act to authorize the holding of the convention, all its proceedings are void and revolutionary. How will he reconcile this inconsistency? Truly, the people of Michigan are in a deplorable condition. They cannot avoid the whirlpool of Scylla without being engulfed in Charybdis. At the last session, their Legislature was a mere lawless assembly; but now they are so omnipotent that the sovereign people of the State cannot elect delegates to a convention without their previous authority. Let us proceed one step further with our evidence from the record. The bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union, when first reported by the committee, provided that the assent to the boundaries of the State, required by the third section, should be given by their Senators and Representative in Congress, and by the Legislature of the State. I speak from memory, but I feel confident I am correct. It would have been a vain attempt to support this provision in the face of the vote of the Senate to which I have referred. What, sir, refer to a body whom we had solemnly declared was composed merely of private individuals the question of assent to a condition for the purpose of binding the sovereign people of Michigan! This would have been as absurd as it was inconsistent. We should then have been told that there was no mode of escaping this difficulty but by at once dispensing with every intermediate agency, and referring the question directly to the original source of power, the people of Michigan in their primary capacity. This was done, and that, too, by a unanimous vote of the Senate. On the 1st of April last, Mr. Wright moved to strike out the provision to which I have referred, and to insert in its stead that the assent required should be given by "a convention of delegates elected by the people of the said State for the sole purpose of giving the assent herein required." Every Senator then in his place voted for this amendment, and by his vote decided that it was proper to submit the question to delegates elected by the people in their primary capacity. It was thus unanimously incorporated into the law.

How does the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] now attempt to evade the force of this argument? He cannot contend that the act of Congress refers to any action of the State Legislature as being necessary to the call of this convention. If he did, the act itself would stare him full in the face.

[Mr. CALHOUN here explained. He said he would not here argue the question whether Congress meant to make a previous act of the State Legislature necessary; but if it did not, the act of Congress would itself be unconstitutional, because we had recognised Michigan as a State, and Congress have no right to call a convention in a State.]

Mr. BUCHANAN resumed. I did not misunderstand the Senator. He contended that the act of Congress calling such a convention was unconstitutional; and to establish his proposition he said that Congress, under the federal constitution, could only call a convention upon the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States.

Does the Senator mean seriously to contend that the mere proposition made by Congress to the people of Michigan, for the purpose of obtaining their assent to a change of boundary, is a convention called under the authority of Congress within a State? Such an argument would be a perversion of terms. If you make propositions to any foreign Power, and suggest that their willingness to accept them may be ascertained by a convention of delegates elected by the people, how can this be construed into a convention called by your own sovereign authority? No, sir; this was a mere offer, on the part of the Government of the United States, to make a bargain with the people of Michigan. It presupposes a perfect equality, in this respect, between the parties. They had the same right to refuse that we had to offer. They may voluntarily consent to your terms, as they have done in this case, and then it becomes a contract which cannot afterwards be violated; but if they had dissented, the negotiation would have been at an end. This is what the Senator denominates a convention called by Congress within the limits of the State of Michigan. Surely no further argument on this point of the case can be necessary.

Congress might have proposed to Michigan that the question should be decided at the polls, by a vote of the people. It was better, however, to submit it to a convention of delegates, because they could deliberate. This was emphatically to be the act of the people in their sovereign capacity. It was a question whether they should be received as a member into our great family of nations upon the terms which we had proposed. It was to be the establishment of new political relations of the most important character, affecting them and their children for many generations. It was a question over which, under their own constitution, their servants, the members of the Legislature, had no control. To what other tribunal could we so properly have referred this question, as to that of a convention of delegates elected by the people?

There can, then, be no objection to the act of Congress, unless it be that the people are not competent, in the very nature of things, to give the assent required, without the intervention of the Legislature. But this would be to condemn the conduct of our ancestors. It would be at war with the most glorious events of our own history. Besides, the very conduct of the people of Michigan, upon this occasion, disproves the position. There was no tumultuous and lawless rising up of the people against a settled form of government, as one might suppose, judging from the arguments upon this floor.

They conducted the election with regularity and order, according to the established laws and usages of the State. Hear what General Williams, the president of the convention, says upon the subject, in his communication to the President of the United States: "The convention," says he, "originated through primary meetings of the citizens of the several counties, in ample time to afford notice to the whole State. Pursuant thereto, the elections, kept open for two days, on the 5th and 6th instant, (December,) have been held in all the counties except Monroe and Macomb; These elections were fair and open, and conducted in all respects as our other elections, and the returns made to the county boards, and canvassed as prescribed by the laws of the late Territory of Michigan in similar cases. The result has been a decided expression of the voice of a majority of the people, approbatory of the resolution enclosed."

Is there any doubt of this "decided expression of the voice of the majority of the people?" Can any Senator upon this floor question it? Has there been a single memorial, or even a single private letter produced, calling it in question? - Nay, more: has a single voice been raised in Michigan against entering the Union on the terms proposed? Not one, to our knowledge.

If it were necessary to place the claims of Michigan upon other grounds, it might be done with great force. Suppose we were to admit that their proceedings had been irregular, ought that to exclude her from the Union? On this subject we ought to act like statesmen acquainted with the history of our own country. We ought not to apply the rigid rules of abstract political science too rigorously to such cases. It has been our practice heretofore to treat our infant Territories with paternal care, to nurse them with kindness, and, when they had attained the age of manhood, to admit them into the family without requiring from them a rigid adherence to forms. The great questions to be decided are, do they contain a sufficient population? have they adopted a republican constitution? and are they willing to enter the Union upon the terms which we propose? If so, all the preliminary proceedings have been considered but mere forms, which we have waived in repeated instances. They are but the scaffolding of the building, which is of no further use after the edifice is complete. We have pursued this course in regard to Tennessee, to Arkansas, and even to Michigan. No Senator will pretend that their Territorial Legislatures had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part. And yet we have in all these instances waived this objection, and approved the constitution thus formed. We have admitted Tennessee and Arkansas into the Union, notwithstanding this objection; and I trust we shall pursue a similar course towards Michigan, especially as there can be no doubt but that her people have assented to our terms of admission.

The case of Missouri was a very strong one. Congress agreed to admit her into the Union upon the condition that her Legislature should substantially change a provision in her constitution touching a very delicate subject. Under her constitution the Legislature had no power to make this change; nor could it have been effected without a long and troublesome process. But Congress cut the gordian knot at once, and agreed to accept the engagement of the Legislature as the voice of the people. We have never had any occasion to regret this disregard of forms.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. EWING] has contended that the second Michigan convention had no power to assent, because the first convention which was held had refused.

[Here Mr. EWING dissented.]

Mr. B. I understood the Senator to state that, as the first convention had dissented, the power was spent, and a second could not be held.

[Mr. EWING said he had not touched this point.]

Mr. B. said, I should be glad if the Senator would re-state his position.

[Mr. EWING said he had asked whether, if the first convention had assented to the condition proposed by the act of Congress, there would have been any objection to this assent, because it had been called by virtue of an act of the Legislature?]

Mr. B. said, certainly not. It never could have been contended that this act of the Legislature had vitiated unanimous vote, the measure which the Senator now the subsequent proceedings of the convention. Although it was not necessary to give them validity, yet it would not destroy them. It could neither make the case better nor worse. I am confident it might be demonstrated that the people of Michigan, under the act of Congress, had the power to make a second trial, upon a failure of the first; but as this point has not been contested by the Senator, I shall not enter upon its discussion.

I now come, Mr. President, to speak upon subjects concerning which I should gladly be silent. The internal concerns of the States should never be introduced upon this floor when it can be avoided; but the Senators from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] and Ohio [Mr. MORRIS] have thought differently, and have rendered it necessary for me to make some observations in reply.

First, then, I would ask, what possible connexion can be imagined between the conduct of the Senatorial electors of Maryland, who refused to execute a trust for which they were elected, and that of the people of Michigan, who chose delegates to a convention upon the express invitation of an act of Congress? The Maryland electors refused to perform their duty under the State constitution; but the people of Michigan did give their assent to the condition which we had prescribed to them, and upon which alone they could enter the Union. There is as great a difference between the two cases as "between a hawk and a hand-saw." Standing here as a Senator, I have no right to pronounce judgment upon the conduct of these electors. They are responsible to the people of the State of Maryland, not to me.

The other Maryland question, to which the Senator adverted, is one of a very different character. It involves the decision of the important principle whether, under a settled form of constitutional government, the people have a right to change that form in any other manner than the mode prescribed by the constitution. If I were to admit that they did not possess this power, still the Senator is as much of a revolutionist as myself. He admits that if the Legislature of Michigan had passed a law authorizing this convention, and fixing the time and place of its meeting, then its proceedings would have been regular and valid. But who gave the Legislature of Michigan this authority? Is it contained in the constitution of the State? That is not pretended. Whence, then, shall we derive it? How does the Senator escape from this difficulty? Upon his own principles, it would have been a legislative usurpation; and yet, he says, if the Legislature had acted first, the convention would have been held under competent authority.

Now, for my own part, I should not have objected to their action. It might have been convenient, it might have been proper, for them to have recommended a particular day for holding the election of delegates and for the meeting of the convention. But it is manifest that, as a source of power to the convention, legislative action would have been absurd. The constitution of Michigan fixes the boundaries of the State. For this purpose, it refers to the act of Congress of the 11th of January, 1805, establishing the Territory. How could these boundaries be changed? If in no other manner than that prescribed in the constitution of Michigan, it would have been a tedious and troublesome process, and would have delayed, for at least two years, the admission of the State into the Union. First, such an amendment must have been sanctioned by a majority of the Senate and House of Representatives. Then it must have been published for three months. Afterwards it must have received the approbation of two thirds of both Houses of a Legislature subsequently elected. And, after all these prerequisites, it must have been submitted to a vote of the people, for their ratification. It was to avoid these very difficulties that the Senate, at their last session, adopted, by a unanimous vote the measure which the Senator now calls revolutionary, referred the decision of the question directly to the sovereign people of Michigan in their primary capacity. Then was the appropriate moment for the Senator to have objected to this course; that was the occasion on which to convince us that this was an unconstitutional and lawless proceeding. He suffered the precious moment to escape, and it is now too late to tell the people of Michigan that they shall be punished by an exclusion from the Union, because they thought proper to take us at our word. That would have been the time to have inserted an amendment in the bill requiring a previous act of the Legislature, prescribing the mode of electing the delegates. But the Senator was then silent upon this subject. There had then been no proceedings in Maryland, such as he now calls revolutionary. A word upon that subject. We are told in that sacred and venerated instrument which first proclaimed the rights of man to the world, that "all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed." But suppose the case of a State whose constitution, originally good, had, from the lapse of time, and from the changes in the population of different portions of its territory, become unequal and unjust. Suppose this inequality and injustice to have gone to such an extent that the vital principle of representative republics was destroyed, and that the vote of a citizen in one county of the State was equivalent to that of six citizens in another county. Suppose that an equal disproportion existed between taxation and representation, and that, under the organic forms of the constitution, a minority could forever control the majority. Why, sir, even under such circumstances I should bear with patience whilst hope remained. I would solicit, I would urge the minority, I would appeal to their sense of justice, to call a convention, under the forms of the constitution, for the purpose of redressing the grievances; but if, at last, I found they had determined to turn a deaf ear to all my entreaties, I should then invoke the peaceable aid of the people, in their sovereign capacity, to remedy these evils. They are the source of all power; they are the rightful authors of all constitutions. They are not forever to be shackled by their own servants, and compelled to submit to evils such as I have described, by the refusal of their own Legislature to pass a law for holding a convention. Whoever denies this position, condemns the principles of the declaration of independence and of the American Revolution. There is not one of the old thirteen States whose Government was not called into existence upon these very principles. It is now too late in the day, in our favored land, to contend that the people cannot change their forms of government at pleasure. The glorious experiment which we are trying in this country would prove a total failure, if we should now decide that the people, in no situation, and under no circumstances, can hold a convention without the previous consent of their own Legislature. It is not my province to say whether the proper time for this peaceful action of the sovereign people, in their primary capacity, has yet arrived, or will ever arrive, in Maryland. That question may safely be left to them; but I feel no terrors, my fancy conjures up no spectres from such doctrines as I have advanced.

I am exceedingly sorry that another topic has been introduced into this debate by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS,] which, if possible, has still less connexion with the question before us than the recent conduct of the senatorial electors of Maryland. The Senate will at once perceive that I refer to the letter of Mr. Dallas on the subject of the repeal of the bank charter. I regret that this letter has become the subject of debate here. We are abundantly able to settle all our local differences in Pennsylvania, and we are justly jealous of foreign interference. This is not the proper forum in which either to argue or decide the Pennsylvania bank question; and I call upon the whole Senate to bear me witness, that nothing but necessity compels me to speak here of the subject. The letter of Mr. Dallas has been denounced by the Senator from Ohio as incendiary, as revolutionary, and as calculated to excite the people to rise up in rebellion against the laws. Would I not then be recreant to my own character if I should not raise my voice in defence of a distinguished citizen of my own State against such an unfounded assault?

The letter of Mr. Dallas has been much and greatly misrepresented. Garbled extracts from it have been published throughout the whole country, without the context; and innumerable false commentaries have attributed to him sentiments and opinions wholly at war with its general tenor. In speaking upon this subject, I am fully sensible how liable I am myself to misrepresentation; but I shall endeavor so plainly and clearly to present my views, that at least they cannot be misunderstood by any person present.

In the first place, then, Mr. Dallas never did assert that the convention about to be held in Pennsylvania will possess any power to violate the constitution of the United States. He never did maintain the proposition that this convention would be the final judge, and could decide, in the last resort, that its own decrees were no violation of that sacred instrument. Why, sir, such propositions would be rank nullification; and although I have never had the pleasure of being on intimate terms with Mr. Dallas, I can venture to assert that he, in common with the people of Pennsylvania, is opposed to this political heresy. For my own part, I can say, that however much I may admire the apostles of this new faith, their doctrines have never found favor in my eyes. No, sir; Mr. Dallas has expressly referred to the Supreme Court of the United States as the tribunal which must finally decide whether the convention possesses the power to repeal the bank charter.

From what we have heard on this floor, it is manifest that public opinion is greatly in error as to the principles of the anti-bank party in Pennsylvania. I profess to be a member of that party; and I now propose briefly to state their principles. If I should err in presenting theirs, I shall at least place my own beyond contradiction.

The constitution of the United States declares that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." This is a most wise and salutary provision; may it be perpetual! It secures the private rights of every citizen, and renders private contracts inviolable. It imparts a sacred character to our titles to real estate, and it places the seal of absolute security upon the rights of private property.

Still the question remains, is a privilege granted by a State Legislature to a corporation, for banking purposes, a contract, within the spirit and intention of the constitution of the United States? In other words, is the authority which the Legislature of Pennsylvania has given to the Bank of the United States to create and circulate a paper currency of thirty-five millions of dollars, irrevocable by any human power short of an amendment to the federal constitution? My own convictions are clear that such an act of legislation is not a contract, under the constitution. It is true that this instrument speaks of "contracts" in general terms; but there is no rule of construction better settled than that of restraining the universality of general words, so as to confine their application to such cases as were exclusively within the intention of those by whom they were used. It would be useless to enumerate instances under this rule. Its extension will not be denied by any.

If, then, it can be made manifest that the framers of the constitution, by the use of the word "contracts," never could have intended to embrace the creation of such a bank by a State Legislature, then the question is decided. It would be an easy task for me to prove, from the history of this provision, that its object was to secure rights arising from private contracts; and that a State bank charter was not within the contemplation of those by whom it was inserted. But I forbear. My sole purpose, at present, is to state general principles.

SENATE.]

Admission of Michigan.

It never can be imagined that the sovereign States, who are the parties to the federal constitution, intended, by this prohibition, to restrain themselves from the exercise of those great and essential powers of government which vitally affect the general interests of the people, and the laws regulating which must vary with the ever-varying changes in society. If they have been guilty of this absurdity, they have acted the part of suicides, and have voluntarily deprived themselves of the power of rendering the people under their charge prosperous and happy.

I think, therefore, it may be stated as a general proposition, that the constitution of the United States, in prohibiting the Legislatures of the respective States from passing laws to impair the obligation of contracts, never intended to prevent the States from regulating, according to their sovereign will and pleasure, the administration of justice, their own internal commerce and trade, the assessment and collection of taxes, the regulation of the paper currency, and other general subjects of legislation. If this be true, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that if one Legislature should grant away any of these general powers, either to corporations or to individuals, such a grant may be resumed by their successors. Upon a contrary supposition, the legislative power might destroy itself, and transfer its most important functions forever to corporations. In these general principles I feel happy that I am sustained by the high authority of the late Chief Justice Marshall, in the celebrated Dartmouth College case.—4 Wheaton, pages 627, 628, 629, and 630.

I shall not consume the time of the Senate in reading the whole passage, but shall confine myself to the conclusion at which he arrives. He says: "If the act of incorporation [of Dartmouth College] be a grant of political power; if it create a civil institution to be employed in the administration of the Government; or if the funds of the college be public property; or if the State of New Hampshire, as a Government, be alone interested in its transactions, the subject is one in which the Legislature of the State may act according to its own judgment, unrestrained by any limitation of its power imposed by the constitution of the United States." He then proceeds to decide the case of Dartmouth College, on the principle that it is not a public, but a private eleemosynary corporation, and, therefore, within the prohibition contained in the constitution.

Here, then, the principle is distinctly recognised, that if a corporation created by a State Legislature "be a grant of political power, if it create a civil institution to be employed in the administration of the Government," then the charter may be altered or repealed at pleasure by the State Legislature. The distinct principle clearly deducible from this opinion, as well as from the nature of our Government, is, that contracts made by a State Legislature, whether with corporations or individuals, which transfer political power, and directly affect the general administration of Government, are not such contracts as the constitution intended to render inviolable. In other words, although these contracts may be within its general words, they are not within its intent and meaning. To declare that they were, would be to say that the people had surrendered their dearest rights into the keeping of the Legislature, to be bartered away forever at the pleasure of their own servants. This would be a doctrine utterly subversive of State rights and State sovereignty.

Let me now illustrate these principles by a few examples.

The judges of the supreme court of several of the States hold their offices under the State constitutions. They have abandoned the practice of a lucrative profession, and the State has entered into a solemn contract with them that they shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and receive a fixed annual compensation, which shall not be diminished during their term of office. Here is a solemn contract, founded on a valuable consideration; and yet, in all the changes which have been made in the constitutions of the different States, it has never, to my knowledge, been seriously contended that judges, under such circumstances, might not be removed, or have the tenure or salary of their office entirely changed. This has been done in repeated instances. And why? Because, although this be a contract, it is one not of a private, but of a public nature. It relates to the administration of justice, which is one of the most important concerns of Government; and the interest of the individual judge must yield to that of the whole community. It is, therefore, not a contract within the meaning of the constitution of the United States.

Again: suppose the Legislature of a State should create a joint stock company, with a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, and grant them the exclusive privilege of purchasing and vending all the cotton, the flour, the iron, the coal, or any of the other great staples of the State which might seek a market in their commercial metropolis, will any Senator contend that such a charter would be irrevocable? Must the great agricultural and manufacturing interests of the State, which may have been thus sacrificed by the Legislature, remain palsied by such an odious monopoly? Certainly not. The next Legislature might repeal the obnoxious law; because it concerned not private interests and private property merely, but those great and leading interests which vitally affect the whole people of the State. No one can suppose that the constitution of the United States ever intended to consecrate such a charter.

Again: if the Legislature of a State should transfer to a corporation, or to an individual, for a period of years, the power of collecting State taxes, and thus constitute farmers-general of the revenue, as has been done in other countries, would not this be a contract, in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, creating "a civil institution to be employed in the administration of the Government," and therefore a "subject in which the Legislature of the State may act according to its own judgment, unrestrained by any limitation of its power imposed by the constitution of the United States?"

Let us proceed a step further. One of the most essential powers and duties of any modern Government is that of regulating the paper currency within its jurisdiction. This is emphatically the exercise of sovereignty, and is in its nature a high political power. It is scarcely second in importance to the power of coining money; because the paper circulation represents the current coin. This power is now exclusively possessed by the State Legislatures, whether rightfully, or not, it is too late to inquire. By means of its exercise, they can raise or they can sink the value of every man's property in the community. They can make the man who was poor yesterday, rich to day. They can elevate or depress the price of the necessities of life and the wages of labor, according to their pleasure. By creating a redundant currency, they may depreciate the value of money to such a degree as to ruin our manufactures, depress our agriculture, and involve our people in rash and demoralizing speculations.

Admission of Michigan.

[SENATE.]

What use have these Legislatures made of this sovereign power? They have transferred it to a thousand State banks; they have yielded up all control over it; and, if the doctrine now contended for be correct, these banks cannot be disturbed in the exercise of this attribute of sovereign power by any human authority. They hold it under the sacred shield of the constitution of the United States. It is now deemed a matter of immense importance to restrain the issue of small notes, and substitute a specie circulation in their stead. But the banks can laugh you to scorn. The whole power of Congress, and that of all the Legislatures of all the twenty-six States of this vast Union, cannot prohibit the circulation of notes of a less denomination than five dollars. If this be the case, did ever so great an absurdity exist upon the face of the earth, under the Government of any people? Congress have, by some means or other, lost the control over the paper currency of the country. The States, to whom it belongs, have granted it to a thousand banking corporations; and, although the people of the States may change and modify their fundamental institutions at pleasure, yet this banking power remains unhurt amidst the general wreck. If this be true, the people of the United States are completely at the mercy of these institutions. The creature will give laws to the creator. But here the great and wise judge, and expounder of the constitution, interposes for our relief. He declares that, "if the act of incorporation be a grant of political power, the subject is one in which the Legislature of the State may act according to its own judgment, unrestrained by any limitation of its power imposed by the constitution of the United States." Who doubts but that the power to regulate the paper currency of a country is, in its very nature, a political power?

From what I have said, the Senate will perceive that there is no foundation whatever for the panic which has been excited lest the State might resume its grants of land, might violate the rights of private property, or take what belongs to one man, and give it to another. The prohibition contained in the constitution of the United States clearly embraces these cases.

It is not my intention here to discuss either the merits or demerits of the Bank of the United States, as rechartered by Pennsylvania. In my opinion, a large majority of the people of that State, and myself among the number, believe that the creation of this vast moneyed monopoly, with the privilege of issuing bank paper to the amount of thirty-five millions of dollars, is dangerous to our liberties and to our dearest interests. We desire to try the question before the supreme judicial tribunal of the land, whether its charter is protected by the constitution of the United States. It will be admitted by all that a more important question has never been presented for adjudication before any court. By what means, then, can we raise this question for decision? We must submit in silence, or the charter must be repealed either by the Legislature or the approaching convention. There is no other alternative. And because we are anxious to have this question decided, by the only means in our power, a deafening clamor has been raised against us, that we are revolutionists, radicals, violators of vested rights, and every thing else which is calculated to alarm the people. We wish to ascertain the truth of that which is taken for granted by our adversaries, whether the charter is a vested right, protected by the constitution of the United States, or not. This is the whole front of our offending. Is this not just, is it not reasonable, is it any thing but a fair appeal to the laws of the land?

Different opinions exist in Pennsylvania as to whether this repeal should be effected by the Legislature or the convention. For my own part, I decidedly prefer the latter; if it can be accomplished. The convention will possess no power but merely that of proposing amendments to the people, for their adoption or rejection. They can place this question before the electors distinctly, and detached from all other amendments. Each citizen, at the polls, will thus be enabled to vote upon the single question, bank or no bank. This is due to the bank; as well as to the people. I need scarcely add that no citizen of Pennsylvania with whom I have ever conversed upon the subject entertains a doubt of the propriety and justice of refunding the bonus which the bank may have paid, with interest and damages sufficient to place it in the very same situation it was when it received its charter. This might properly be made a constituent part of the question to be submitted to the people.

These desirable objects could not be secured by means of a repeal by the Legislature. So many questions, both of a political and local character, influence the election of its members, that the friends of the bank might complain that the people had not sanctioned the repeal. I would, therefore, be sorry if necessity should compel us to adopt this alternative as the only means left of trying the question.

Again: should the bank appeal from the decision of the people of Pennsylvania in their sovereign capacity, to the Supreme Court of the United States, the question will be presented before that tribunal in a more solemn and imposing form than if the repeal should be accomplished by an ordinary act of legislation. The people of the State of Pennsylvania, complaining that their legislative servants had despoiled them of one of the highest attributes of an independent Commonwealth, and had bartered away, for a period of thirty years, the political power which they enjoyed of regulating the paper currency within their own limits, would then be the party on the one side; and on the other, the Bank of the United States, contending that the transfer of this power has been irrevocably made to it, under the sanction of the constitution of the United States. Of the result I entertain not the slightest apprehension. Should it, however, be adverse, which Heaven forbid! I can tell the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] that we shall never resort to nullification as the rightful remedy.

Thus, sir, I have been drawn into a discussion utterly repugnant to my own feelings. I hope I may never again have occasion to allude to the subject on this floor. It is entirely foreign from the question in debate. Nothing could have urged me to make the remarks which I have done, but the unwarranted attack of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MORRIS] upon the party at home with which I am proud to act.

Mr. BENTON followed the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] and said he had risen for what might seem to be a very unnecessary purpose, that of sustaining the positions of that Senator. This certainly looked like a work of supererogation, seeing the able, perspicuous, and powerful manner in which that gentleman had sustained himself; and if he (Mr. B.) had nothing but argument to offer, he should not tender his aid; for the argument just delivered required no aid of that kind. But his aid was of another kind, that of authority and precedent, drawn from the venerable authority of our early history, and from the writings and opinions of the fathers of the republic, and from the approved action of State Legislatures. In this former he held himself excusable in tendering his aid, and should limit himself almost entirely to the production of the authorities to which he had reference. But before he did this, he must take leave to express his deep regret at the course followed yesterday by the Senators from South Carolina and Ohio, [Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. MORRIS,] in bringing the names of Pennsylvania and Maryland into this discussion, and in animadverting upon the conduct of citizens or parties in those States. He joined the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] in the expression of his deep regret at this course; and, like him, should avoid recrimination, and should limit himself to defensive observations in favor of those who were assailed, without impugning the conduct or motives of their adversaries in their own States.

Mr. B. did not consider the Senate of the United States as a suitable place for the denunciation of the citizens of the States, nor for the discussion of State measures, State parties, or State politics. The high privileges of debate secured to us by the constitution, and the latitude of discussion allowed by our rules, were intended to protect us in the discussion of national measures, and in the investigation of those subjects and matters which regularly came before us, and necessarily required our action. Acting on this conception of his duty, he should follow the example of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] He should abstain from all animadversion, or even expression of adverse opinion, upon the measures which agitate the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland. He should limit himself to some defence of those who were so unexpectedly dragged into this debate yesterday, and should endeavor to get rid of the whole subject as soon as possible. For one, he should endeavor to finish at this sitting, in order that it should not be known in Pennsylvania and Maryland that the Senate of the United States was engaged in discussing their affairs, until it was also known that that discussion was terminated.

Nominally, and upon the record, said Mr. B., this is a Michigan question—a question to admit the State of Michigan into the Union; in fact and in substance, it is now converted into a Pennsylvania and a Maryland question, to arrest or paralyze the proceedings against the United States Bank charter in the former, and to arrest or paralyze the proceedings in favor of a convention in the latter. This is the form given to it yesterday by the movement of the Senators from South Carolina and Ohio, [Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. MURKIN:] so that little Michigan, which had seemed to be the subject of discussion before the Senate, was suddenly found to be nothing but the tail to the kite, dangling in the air below, while all eyes were fixed upon the imposing apparition of the two Atlantic States, rising and hovering above. In this way, the young Michigan was suddenly eclipsed and lost sight of; and the lawless and revolutionary movement, as it was styled, in Pennsylvania, against the sanctity of a certain charter, and the lawless and revolutionary movement, as it was stigmatized, in Maryland, in favor of a convention of the people, became the engrossing theme of denunciation and vituperation. Greatly did Mr. B. rejoice that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] had followed no part of this unhappy example; that he had carefully eschewed all animadversion; that he had positively refused to take any part, or to have any share, in discussing State measures here; and had confined himself to the duties of defence imposed upon him by the novel and aggressive course pursued by others. That Senator's first care was to defend a gentleman of his own State, Mr. Dallas, who had been assailed here by name; and in that he had so acted as to effect what he (Mr. B.) had thought to be impossible: he had increased his high character for private worth, and had added to the exalted opinion entertained of the goodness of his heart; for this generous defence was volunteered in favor of one with whom it was not his fortune to be on terms of intimacy. He showed the injustice done to that gentleman by attributing to his letter meanings which did not belong to it, and drawing inferences as foreign to his character as they were to his writing. He (Mr. B.) had read that letter, but not since it had been the subject of animadversion; and it might be that his knowledge of the amiable character, purity of heart and purpose, and modesty of deportment of the writer, had prevented him from so scanning his words as to be able to find the deep mischief which they concealed; for certainly he had not seen the anarchical spirit attributed to it. In many things he agreed with him, especially in that which related to vested rights; in some things he did not; but where he did not agree, it was still the disagreement which left unimpeached the high character for public and private worth which Mr. Dallas brought with him, as a Senator from Pennsylvania, to this chamber, and carried back with him from this chamber to Pennsylvania.

Mr. B. then referred to Mr. Madison's writings, No. 44 of the Federalist, to sustain the opinion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] on the nature of the contracts which the clause in the constitution of the United States was intended to guard. He said it would be seen that Mr. Madison confined this clause entirely to private rights and personal security; and that not a word of what he said could be extended to chartered privileges, the granting of which had been twice refused in the convention which framed the constitution, and the preservation of which, therefore, could not come within the meaning of that instrument. Remarking upon the clause in the constitution which prohibits the States, among other things, from passing any law impairing the obligations of contracts, Mr. M. says:

"Very properly, therefore, have the convention added this constitutional bulwark in favor of personal security and private rights; and I am much deceived if they have not, in so doing, as faithfully consulted the genuine sentiments as the undoubted interests of their constituents. The sober people of America are weary of the fluctuating policy which has directed the public councils. They have seen, with regret and indignation, that sudden changes and legislative interferences, in cases affecting personal rights, become jobs in the hands of enterprising and influential speculators, and snares to the more industrious and less informed part of the community."

With this exposition from Mr. Madison, Mr. B. would submit that chartered privileges, although they might be sold for money, constitute no part of the contracts the inviolability of which are guaranteed by the constitution of the United States; and while this is plain upon the face of the words used in the Federalist, namely, "private rights," "personal rights," "personal security," it is still further confirmed by the words which follow, and which show that the clause, so far from being intended to secure enterprising jobbers and influential speculators in their ill-gotten advantages, was really intended to protect the industrious and less informed part of the community against their legislative machinations. Finally, and in full proof, that the clause could have no relation to incorporations and bank charters is proved by the fact that the federal convention which framed the constitution twice refused to grant the incorporating power to Congress, and consequently cannot be construed to protect the existence of a thing which it twice refused to create.

Mr. B. said this was the exposition of one of the fathers of the constitution, made before that instrument was adopted by the States. There had been many expositions of it since, both legislative and judicial, and out of the multitude Mr. B. would select one which, in all the essentials of time, place, subject, actors, and action, would claim a pre-eminent and omnipotent voice in this Pennsylvania question, so unexpectedly thrust in upon us here, and so vehemently plead on this floor in behalf of a certain bank, against the legislative and conventional power of the State. Mr. B. then sent to the Secretary's table a volume of the statutes of Kentucky for the year 1820, and requested that the Secretary should read an act which he pointed out to him. The Secretary read:

Admission of Michigan.

[SENATE.]

"An act to repeal the act entitled 'An act establishing independent banks in this Commonwealth,' and an act supplemental thereto." Approved, February 10, 1820.

"PREAMBLE.—Whereas, in the tenth article of the constitution of Kentucky, it is declared: First, that all freemen, when they form a social compact, are equal; and that no man or set of men are entitled to exclusive, separate, public emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services: And, secondly, that all power is inherent in the people, and all free Governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness. And whereas it is self-evident, according to those fundamental principles of government, that all laws which grant to a few the power to oppress the many are tyrannical in their nature, and adverse to the primitive rights of the people; and, therefore, repealable by the supreme authority. To say that a sale of the primitive rights of the people, by the Legislature, is to be perpetual, and unalterable, because there is a contract in the case, is to declare that error, and abuse of power, may consecrate themselves. Fraud vitiates all contracts. To effect the intention of the parties is the object of all laws regulating contracts. That a privilege granted shall be used for the destruction, or even to the disadvantage, of those who granted, never could be the intention of the parties. All legislative power is derivative—proceeds from the people, and is to be used for their prosperity and happiness only; consequently, all laws of a contrary tendency violate the intention of the social compact, and are subject, upon first principles, to the condition of being repealed, whether the evil springs from the nature of the privilege granted, or contract entered into, or from the abuse of either. A bank charter, from its nature, extends and necessarily confines the powers and privileges granted to a few, to the exclusion of the many. It therefore follows, as an unavoidable conclusion, that if the power and privileges granted in a bank charter operate against the public good, the people, by their Legislature, have the primitive right to revoke such a charter. To the end, therefore, that the good people of this State be delivered in future from the baneful effects of the power and privileges granted by the law establishing independent banks, which have been exercised in many instances, in the plenitude of tyranny, oppression, and abuse, to the great injury of the good people of this State."

When the Secretary had read to the end of the preamble, he paused and inquired whether the reading of the act itself was desired. Mr. B. answered, by all means. The preamble is good, and the act is better. It shows how the republicans of Kentucky dispose of vested rights in chartered privileges, and bonus contracts for oppressing a State with banks, and how compendiously they teach presidents and directors of banks to submit to the laws of the land, or to take the fines and forfeitures which resistance to the laws imposes upon insurgent and refractory spirits. It presents an authority and example which the friends of the Bank of the United States are bound to respect, and which may require all their ingenuity to answer, on this floor or elsewhere.

The Secretary then read the act:

"Sec. 1st.—Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That all power, right, or privilege, granted to the corporations established by an act entitled 'An act establishing independent banks in this Commonwealth,' approved January 26th, 1818, and an act entitled 'An act supplemental to the act establishing independent banks in this Commonwealth,' approved February 3d, 1818, to deal and trade in discounts, bills of exchange, or current money, or to issue notes or bills of credit, payable to bearer or otherwise, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed and revoked, from and after the first day of May next; and all other powers, rights, and privileges, granted to said corporations in said recited acts, are hereby repealed and revoked from and after the first day of January, 1823.

"Sec. 2d.—Be it further enacted, That any person or persons who may act as a president, director, or any other officer of any independent bank in this State, contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be subject to all the penalties, fines, and forfeitures, imposed by an act entitled 'An act to suppress private associations for the purpose of banking,' approved February 8th, 1812; which penalties, fines, and forfeitures, may and shall be imposed, recovered, collected, and distributed, according to the provisions of the said last-recited act.

"Sec. 3d.—Be it further enacted, That the bonus required from the independent banks, for the privilege of banking for the year 1820, shall be, and the same is hereby, remitted.

"Sec. 4th.—Be it further enacted, That so much of the act to incorporate Saunders's Manufacturing Company, which passed the 31st of January, 1818, and the supplemental act thereto, approved February 3d, 1818, which gives the said company banking privileges, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the second section of this act is hereby made applicable to the persons who may have the management of the said manufacturing institution."

Mr. B. said that this preamble and act, taken together, were both the declaration and the action of the Legislature of one of the principal States in the Union—a State fertile in many ways, and in none more so than in the production of able and patriotic men. A Legislature of that State, in our own day, and in our own time, and composed of many persons now living and acting, swept off a litter of banks at one blow, with the banking privileges of Lewis Saunders's cotton bagging factory to boot, even after they had been two years in operation, maugre all their cries about the bonus and the contract, and did so, not by virtue of reserved powers in charters, but by virtue of inherent and unalienable rights in the body politic. Mr. B. said he was cotemporary with this great act—this magna charta of the Kentucky Legislature. He remembered its passage, and the satisfaction which it gave to the State, and to the surrounding States, and to the whole Union. He remembered more: and that was the applause then bestowed upon this act of the Kentucky Legislature by presses, periodicals, newspapers, and registers, which are now foremost in denouncing citizens of Pennsylvania for proposing to imitate it in a case where alien foreigners, more than native citizens, are concerned, and where the reasons for acting are many ten thousand times greater than in the case of the independent banks, and Lewis Saunders's banking cotton-bagging factory. He recollected also that the doctrine of vested rights was then invoked by the stockholders in the hecatomb of banks which were subjected to the edge of the sacrificial knife; and that their invocation shared the same fate which the claim of the midnight judges of 1800 suffered when they claimed their seats and salaries as vested rights; the same fate which the tenants in tail and some of the eldest sons suffered, about the time of our Revolution, when entails were abolished, and the insolent prerogative of primogeniture, as Mr. Gibbon called it, was suppressed by law; the same fate which the friends of feudal rights suffered in France in 1789, when Lafayette moved, in the Assembly of Notables, the entire suppression of all those rights; the same fate which a clergy, loaded with property of this world, suffered in England, when all the statutes called mortmain were passed. In all these cases, as well as in the case of the independent banks, and Mr. Saunders's bag-factory bank, and the present United States Bank of Pennsylvania, the plea of vested rights was pressed into the service; but it happened to be addressed to those who could discriminate between the rights of property, which the public good requires to be held sacred and inviolate, and the pretensions of privilege which the same public good requires to be examined and controlled. The arguments now set up against the repealability of chartered privileges is nothing but the same plea set up in all ages, and in all countries, in favor of similar privileges; and Mr. B. must be allowed to say that there is no comparison between the style and composition of those arguments, as used in England and France, and also in the United States, on former occasions, and as used here now. The advocates for vested rights, that is, chartered privileges, in these days, do little more than shout; or, at best, indite a paragraph, pert and flippant, coarse and trite, or heavy and dull; whereas the old advocates composed elegant and scholar-like dissertations; and he would advise their followers, in these days, to hunt up their speeches and essays, and copy their style, and at least give us bad doctrines in good language.

Mr. B., with as much reluctance as he had felt in advertising to Pennsylvania affairs, must now advert to the Maryland branch of this question. It seems that there is a movement in Maryland to organize a convention, by the inherent and unalienable rights of the people, and, without a legislative act, to alter and change the constitution of the State. The convention held in Michigan is one of this kind, and, therefore, the recognition of an act done by that convention is resisted on this floor, by the friends of the anti-convention party in Maryland, for fear it may operate in favor of the convention party in that State. This is the way that Maryland politics are lugged into this debate, and made part of this discussion. Mr. B. said he had often seen gentlemen argue one question with an eye to another, but, usually, with the delicacy of not lugging in, by name, this other question, which had no place upon the record. But this delicacy has not been observed upon this occasion. Michigan alone is in the record before us; yet Pennsylvania has been dragged in by name; Maryland has been dragged in by name; and not only dragged in, but made the principal subject of debate, and the most furious denunciations levelled at a portion of their citizens. The advocates for the Maryland convention are, not incidentally and by way of innuendo, lashed and scourged here while lashing and scourging the Michigan convention, but they are singled out, seized upon, and dragged forcibly and violently into this chamber; and then denounced in such style that, no doubt, the question of the Maryland convention is considered as completely crushed by the force which assails it here. Be it so, said Mr. B., if the people of sovereign States are willing to have their affairs governed by denunciation here. It will certainly be a one-sided game on this floor; for it was manifest that there was one party at least here who would not attack the impending measures of any State, nor attack the conduct or motives of the citizens of any State, in acting as they pleased on what concerned themselves; there was one party, at least, here, who would limit themselves to the just defence of the absent and the assailed. The Maryland convention party, then, is arraigned and condemned here for proposing to do what Michigan has done, and the act of Michigan must be stamped with reprobation by Congress, lest it become a precedent, sanctioned by the approbation of Congress, for the justification of the convention party in Maryland. This is the state of the question before us; and Mr. B. would immediately proceed to vindicate, not by an argument of his own, but by example, authority, and precedent, drawn from our early history, and from the writings of the founders of the republic, and others which claimed respect, the act which Michigan has done, and which a party in Maryland proposes to do. Mr. B. then read and commented briefly upon several passages from the writings of Mr. Madison, Judge Wilson, of Pennsylvania, General Hamilton, and Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution. Mr. Madison, speaking of the alleged defect of powers in the convention of 1787, which formed the federal constitution, says:

"They (the members of the convention) must have reflected that, in all great changes of established Governments, forms ought to give way to substance; that a rigid adherence, in such cases, to the former, would render nominal and nugatory the transcendent and precious right of the people to 'abolish or alter this Government,' as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness," since it is impossible for the people spontaneously and universally to move in concert towards their object, and it is therefore essential that such changes be instituted by some informal and unauthorized propositions, made by some patriotic and respectable citizen, or number of citizens. They must have recollected that it was by this irregular and assumed privilege of proposing to the people plans for their safety and happiness, that the States were first united against the danger with which they were threatened by their ancient Government; that committees and Congresses were formed for concentrating their efforts, and defending their rights, and that conventions were elected in the several States for establishing the constitutions under which they are now governed. Nor could it have been forgotten that no little ill-timed scruples, no zeal for adhering to ordinary forms, were any where seen, except in those who wished to indulge, under these masks, their secret enmity to the substance contended for."—Federalist, No. 40.

Here (said Mr. B.) the authority of the people, in their original sovereign capacity, to abolish, alter, and change, their form of government, is fully and expressly set forth. The want of legislative authority to guide or direct them is directly waived; and some patriotic and respectable citizen or citizens are looked to, to commence the informal and unauthorized propositions which are to lead to a convention, and to end in the adoption of fundamental changes.

Such citizens are not considered by Mr. Madison as anarchists, disorganizers, disturbers of the peace, despoilers of property, &c., but as public benefactors, prompted by patriotism to take the lead in a work of public good and necessity. Mr. B. particularly noted, and read twice over, the concluding sentence of this extract from Mr. Madison. He said that Mr. M. was one of the most careful men in abstaining from personalities and the imputation of motives; but here was a keen cut, and a home thrust, at the old Tories of the Revolution—King George the Third's men, the conservatives of fifty years ago, who were indulging their secret enmity to the real rights of the people, under the mask of zeal for adhering to forms, and conscientious scruples against acting without authority. Mr. B. continued his readings:

"Permit me to mention one great principle, the vital principle I may well call it, which diffuses animation and vigor through all the others. The principle I mean is this: that the supreme or sovereign power of the society resides in the citizens at large; and that, therefore, they always retain the right of abolishing, altering, or amending, this constitution, at whatever time and in whatever manner they shall deem it expedient."—Vol. 1, page 17.

"Why should we not teach our children those principles upon which we ourselves have thought and acted? Ought we to instil into their tender minds a theory, especially if unfounded, which is contradictory to our own practice, built on the most solid foundation? Why should we reduce them to the cruel dilemma of condemning either those principles they have been taught to believe, or those persons whom they have been taught to revere?"—Vol. 1, page 20.

"As to the people, however, in whom the sovereign power resides: from their authority the constitution originates; for their safety and felicity it is established: in their hands it is as clay in the hands of the potter; they have the right to mould, to preserve, to improve, to refine, and to finish it as they please. If so, can it be doubted that they have the right likewise to change it?"—Vol. 1, page 418.

General Hamilton, vindicating the convention of 1787, which omitted to prefix to the federal constitution a bill of rights, says:

"It is evident, therefore, according to this (bill of rights) primitive signification, they have no application to constitutions professedly founded upon the power of the people, and executed by their immediate representatives and servants. Here, in strictness, the people surrender nothing; and, as they retain every thing, they have no need of particular reservations."—Federalist, No. 84.

Judge Story, speaking of the declaration of independence, says:

"It was not an act done by the State Governments then organized, nor by persons chosen by them. It was emphatically the act of the whole people of the united colonies, by the instrumentality of their representatives, chosen for that, among other purposes. It was an act not competent to the State Governments, or any of them, as organized under their charters, to adopt. Those charters neither contemplated the case, nor provided for it. It was an act of original, inherent sovereignty by the people themselves, resulting from their right to change the form of Government, and to institute a new Government, whenever necessary for their safety and happiness."—Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, vol. 1, page 198.

Judge Story, commenting on the origin and proceedings of the convention which formed the first General Government for the colonies, says:

"In some of the Legislatures of the colonies, which were then in session, delegates were appointed by the popular or representative branch; and in other cases they were appointed by conventions of the people in the colonies. The convention of delegates assembled on the 4th of September, 1774; and, having chosen officers, they adopted certain fundamental rules for their proceedings.

"Thus was organized, under the auspices and with the consent of the people, acting directly in their primary, sovereign capacity, and without the intervention of the functionaries to whom the ordinary powers of Government were delegated in the colonies, the first General or National Government.

"The Congress thus assembled exercised, de facto, and de jure, a sovereign authority, not as the delegated agents of the Government de facto of the colonies, but in virtue of original powers derived from the people."—Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, vol. 1, pp. 185, 186.

Having read these extracts, Mr. B. forbore to make any comments upon them, barely remarking that they were purposely taken from different political schools, to show that those who differed fundamentally on so many points, yet agreed perfectly on this most fundamental of all points, namely, the inherent and unalienable right of the people to meet in convention of their own mere will and motion, and change their form of government at their pleasure. He would next show that this great right was acted upon in the formation of the present constitution of the United States, and that this constitution owes all its force to the voluntary action of conventions springing from the people, not under the authority, but merely under the recommendation of the State Legislatures. Premising, what every person knew, that the deputies to the federal convention of 1787 were appointed to revise the articles of confederation, and not to frame a new Government, Mr. B. proceeded to read the first resolution of the convention, in communicating their work to the Congress of the confederation, and requesting the Congress to lay it before the State Legislatures, with a request that they would recommend it to the adoption of the people of the States in their conventions. He read:

"Resolved, That the preceding constitution be laid before the United States in Congress assembled, and that it is the opinion of this convention that it should afterwards be submitted to the convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its Legislature, for their assent and ratification," &c.

Here, said Mr. B., this great convention of 1787, knowing that they had no power to give or grant a constitution to the people of the States, merely express their opinion that it ought to be submitted to them; and, knowing that the State Legislatures had no authority to order conventions, they merely requested that they would recommend them; and knowing, further, that the sovereign power was in the people, they used the word people in preference to that of citizens, qualified voters, freeholders, tax-payers, or any thing else which might imply a convention not springing from the sovereign power of the people, but governed by existing laws and constitutions.

Mr. B. then traced the mode of acting under this recommendation by the States, and took the convention of Virginia as the one which would perhaps be admitted to be of the highest authority in this case. He showed that the General Assembly of Virginia first passed a "resolution," by which they "recommended" the people to hold a convention, and next passed an act "concerning" the convention, and providing for its accommodation, but assuming no authority over it. He then referred to the proceedings of the convention, to show that they had met according to the recommendation of the General Assembly, and that they decided the important questions connected with the qualifications and elections of the delegates according to what was satisfactory to themselves, as acting in their sovereign representative capacity, and not as according to the laws and constitution of the State, as if created by their authority. The history of their proceedings opens thus:

"In convention, Monday, the 2d of June, 1788. This being the day recommended by the Legislature for the meeting of the convention, to take into consideration the proposed plan of the Federal Government, a majority of the gentlemen delegated thereto assembled at the public buildings in Richmond," &c.

The first act of the convention, after organizing itself, was to appoint a committee of privileges and elections; and a most numerous, talented, and important committee it was. It consisted of twenty-eight members, among whom were the first names of Virginia and of America: Benjamin Harrison, Patrick Henry, George Mason, Governor Randolph, John Marshall, James Monroe, James Madison, George Nicholas, Paul Carrington, and others scarcely less distinguished. The business of this committee was to pass upon the validity of the elections, and to decide between contending parties for the same seat; and the words in which they make their reports, the evidence which they received in contested cases, and the disregard with which they passed over legal and constitutional qualifications, all proved that the convention judged for themselves, in their high capacity of representatives of the sovereign people, and independently of the laws and constitution of Virginia. The words used with respect to the returns of delegates are, not that they are found duly elected, or legally elected, but that they are "satisfactory;" the evidence received where certificates of election were not produced, were statements of citizens who said they were at the election, and heard the sheriff proclaim such and such candidates elected; and, in the case of qualification, where a petition was presented to vacate the seat of a delegate because he was not a freeholder within the Commonwealth of Virginia, the report was that the petition be rejected. All these reports of the committee on privileges and elections, Mr. B. said, were confirmed by the convention, and the tenor of their whole proceedings shows that they were acting in the high capacity of representing the sovereignty of the people, and did what was satisfactory to themselves, and not what might be conformable to the laws and constitution of Virginia. In fact, said Mr. B., the mere composition of every convention proves that they are independent of the laws and constitution of the State, for judges, Governors, and all officers of the State or Federal Government, may be members.

Mr. B. having shown, from the opinions of the most eminent men, and from examples of the highest character, that conventions were independent of State legislation, demanded how it was that State Legislatures assumed to have power to grant or withhold them? He wished to see their grant for the exercise of this authority? He wished to see how it was that they who were servants, and dressed up in a little brief authority, undertook to govern and direct the people in the exercise of an inherent and unalienable right? They could not get this authority from the people, for it assumed a supremacy over the people. There was but one way to deduce their title, and that was through divine right! and by the grace of God! Any thing short of this acknowledges the sovereignty of the people, and puts an end to the pretension; so that a Legislature which should now assume to authorize the people to hold a convention, if put to a derivation of their own authority, would have to adopt the style of those Kings of Europe who hold that God has put the people into their care, and endowed them with all authority for their protection and preservation. A legislative advice, counsel, or recommendation to the people to hold a convention, and an appropriation of money to defray its expenses, is certainly a convenience, but it is not a prerequisite; and conventions to change the form of government may be held by the people when they please; taking care to submit their work to a direct vote of the people themselves, or to a new convention elected for the express purpose of approval or rejection, as was done in the case of the constitution of the United States; and thus making sure of the approbation of a majority of the people before the new constitution is put in force.

Mr. B. had now finished his view of this question, and would make a brief application of the whole to the case of Michigan. The people there had held a convention, by their own power, to accept a fundamental condition of their admission into the Union. They have accepted the condition; and the objection is, that the convention was a lawless and revolutionary mob, and that law ought to be made to suppress and punish such assemblages in future. Mr. B. would hold a proposition for such a law to be the quintessence not of European, but of Asiatic despotism; and sure he was, it would receive no countenance by the vote of this chamber. In saying this, he spoke upon a recollection of the past, as well as upon a view of the present. At the last session of Congress all this denunciation of lawless and revolutionary mobs had been lavished upon the convention both of Arkansas and Michigan, because, being Territories, they had held conventions, and framed constitutions, without the authority of Congress. Our answers to these denunciations were the same that we give now, namely: 1. That they had a right to do so without our authority, and all that we could require was, that they should send us their constitutions, that we might see they were republican; and, 2. That these Territories had several times applied to Congress for an act to regulate the holding of their conventions, which were always refused by the political party which then held the supremacy in this chamber; and that to refuse them an act to regulate the holding of a convention, when they asked for it, and then to denounce them for holding a convention without law, was unreasonable and contradictory, and subjected ourselves to the reproach both of injustice and inconsistency. These were our answers then; and we added, that those who denounced the Arkansas and Michigan conventions for lawless and revolutionary mobs, would find themselves unsupported by the vote of the Senate; which turned out to be the fact, for the negative vote was exceedingly small; and Mr. B. would add, that the result would be the same now; and that, after all this denunciation of the convention in Michigan, the convention party in Maryland, and the disorganizing party in Pennsylvania, the vote would be about as it was at the last session, exceedingly small, and entirely too inconsiderable to give any countenance to their denunciations.

Mr. B. concluded by expressing the hope that the Senate would not adjourn until it finished this question. It was due to Pennsylvania and Maryland that we should stop a debate in which their concerns were improperly introduced; and it was due to Michigan herself that she should be relieved from this attendance at our doors. She has been debarred of her rights for years; she is a State, if not a State of the confederacy; she has a right to be admitted; and the admission of a State is a question of that dignity to be entitled, not only to a speedy decision, but to a preference over all other questions until it was decided. He repeated, what he had said some days before, that he had come with his cloak to camp on this floor until the vote was taken; and, that being his idea of what all ought to do, he would not consume time by speaking.

When Mr. BENTON had taken his seat,

Mr. PRESTON, of South Carolina, addressed the Senate, and observed that he was as anxious as any other Senator could be that Michigan should be admitted, without delay, into the Union. She is a sovereign State, recognised as such by Congress, (said Mr. P.) and her present position is extremely awkward; and as it seems, by the declaration of her Senators, that Ohio has no longer any interest in the enforcing of the condition required in the bill passed at the last session, I am disposed to waive that condition altogether. It was merely with a view to prevent difficulties between contiguous States that I voted for its insertion; but as the Senators from Ohio no longer consider it necessary as a security to that State on the question of boundary, I am ready to admit Michigan at once. Yet, while these are my feelings, I cannot bring my mind to vote for the whole bill, because I consider it as containing matter which is wrong both in fact and in principle. As the bill stands, it states a fact which the Senate does not know, and proceeds on principles which the Senate ought to repudiate.

[Mr. P. here gave way for a motion to adjourn; but the yeas and nays were demanded, and the motion was negatived: Yeas 16, nays 22.]

Mr. PRESTON resumed. I have said that the bill states a fact which the Senate does not know. And, pray, what knowledge has this body that the solemn condition imposed by the law of Congress has been assented to and complied with by a convention of the people of the State of Michigan? We have no authentication of the fact; none—none whatever. Yet the bill states it as a thing certain, and rests entirely on that assumption. When you turn your eyes towards our Northwestern territory, what is the spectacle which meets your view? What is it you see amidst the great lakes north of the State of Ohio? What do you see there? The State of Michigan. Can we look behind, or below, or above, that State sovereignty? Is there any thing which we dare to recognise except that State? No, sir. The State alone can be recognised, or hold relations with us; and if we break through its organized forms, to hold intercourse and make contracts with the people directly, it is a revolutionary proceeding. The State stands between us and the people of that peninsula. How can the citizens of that State make themselves known to us? How can you know them, but through their State organization? What do you know of this Mr. Williams, whose name is appended to a paper which has been submitted to us by the Executive of the United States? What assurance have you that he is not a mere man of straw? What testimony do you possess to prove his existence and authenticate his signature? None whatever. All that is presented is loose parol testimony, conjecture, hearsay, and scraps of a newspaper. And are you to bind a sovereign and independent State, and that in the highest exercise of sovereignty, viz: the cession of territory, on such testimony as this—testimony that would not be received in any court on the globe? Is such a deed as this to be put on record, and remain on your archives? How do you know that Michigan has assented to the condition of her admission? Does the State appear before you? Have you her great seal? Have you the authenticated signatures of her functionaries? Without these, I cannot take my seat in this chamber. Without these, the Senators from Michigan themselves cannot be admitted here. I therefore set out by affirming that the fact recited in the preamble of this bill is not within the knowledge of the Senate. How dare you look into the interior operations of the State of Michigan? What authority have you to go there? Who entitled you to pass by, to pass over, to supersede, the entire legislative authority of that State, to create an imperium in imperio, to the utter subversion of the Government of that State, and the overthrow of its constitution? Sir, it is perfectly monstrous.

But the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania asks, how does it lie in our mouths to say that this organism of the people is interposed between us and the Legislature of Michigan, when we refused in January last to recognise that body as a Legislature at all, and declined receiving a memorial from it as a Legislature? I will tell the Senator. When we refused to recognise the existence of that Legislature, we had not recognised the constitution of Michigan; and it was not till then that we sanctioned the use of the words States and Legislature. Where, then, is the monstrous inconsistency so triumphantly urged? Let gentlemen compare the dates, and they will see there is no inconsistency. When Michigan first asked to be admitted, there were important difficulties in the way, and we could consider her only as a Territorial Government, or a mere mass of individuals inhabiting a peninsula. But a change came over the mode of her existence; her State constitution was adopted in April, and a committee of this body reported that they had examined that instrument, and brought in a bill proposing the mode in which she should be admitted into the Union. On the 15th of June this bill became a law, acknowledging the Territory of Michigan to be erected into a State, and to be received into the confederacy on a certain condition. But mark you, sir, that condition applied solely to her admission, not to her recognition as a State. What are the words of the proviso?

"Provided, always, and this admission is upon the express condition, that the said State shall consist of and have jurisdiction over all the territory included within the following boundaries, and over none other, to wit: Beginning at the point where the above-described northern boundary of the State of Ohio intersects the eastern boundary of the State of Indiana," &c.

This proviso, as you perceive, applies, with cautious precision of language, only to the last clause of the preceding sentence. But, independent of the proviso, the law constitutes Michigan a free, sovereign, and independent State, capable of admission into the Union, and of performing every act of sovereignty. We constituted the State, and by a contemporaneous act we required the State thus constituted to perform certain conditions before becoming a member of the confederacy. Where, then, is the mighty inconsistency about which we have heard so much? Before he charged inconsistency upon us, why did not the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] turn to the journal? Michigan, it is true, was not a State in January, but she was a State in June—a State self-existing, and under the guarantee of the United States; and it is because this change was made, that we are incapable of holding any communication with her citizens in their individual capacity. The honorable Senator and myself have in this matter exactly changed sides. He was for recognising her before she was a State, and I was opposed to it; and now that she is a State, it is he that refuses to recognise her, and I who contend for it. I cannot consent to dissolve her State existence. You cannot do it. It is out of your power. She exists, independently of you. These, as I understand them, are the great and true principles of the State rights party, and but for this I should not have asked the attention of the Senate for one moment. This bill, in its present form, involves a gross violation of State rights; it goes to the utter prostration of all State Government, and involves the doctrine that the General Government has power to go below the State Government, and look beyond it. The gentleman talks of a convention of the people of a State. These are all complex terms; and in what sense does he use them? The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. STRANGE] said that the word "convention" had no technical meaning; that it applied to any assembly of the delegates of the people, no matter how they came together. Delegates of the people! How does he know that they are delegates? Here are we wielding the destinies and casting the deepest foundations of a State, without knowing the meaning of the word convention. The word is technical! It has a constant and well-defined meaning in the constitution of the United States and of the States. Am I to be told that any loose gathering of the population is a convention, within the legal meaning of that word? Why, sir, was the late Baltimore convention a convention of the people of the United States? Was that assemblage capable of giving laws to us? A convention of the people of the United States can upturn these seats and banish us all from these halls; can destroy the Senate, can abolish Congress. And was the Baltimore convention, a motley collection of postmasters, steam doctors, and God knows who, a convention of the people of the United States? Sir, I would not give this pinch of snuff for the tenure of my rights under this Government, if any such assemblage is to be so recognised. And do you know that the convention in Michigan was any thing more than that which met in Baltimore? The documents do not show that it was any thing more. They do not show that it was as much.

What is a convention? The constitution of the United

SENATE.]

Admission of Michigan.

States speaks of a convention of the States; and what is meant by the word in that place? I will tell you what it means. It means a regularly delegated body, coming from a known constituency, with a political organization, and endowed with sovereign powers over the matters intrusted to it. That is a convention in a technical sense. I know, indeed, that there is a popular impression that a convention is a sort of undefined or undefinable thing, which rises up like a mist from the people, without any known law, but with exceeding power. But this is not a convention in the sense of any statute or of the constitution. A convention is a political body proceeding from a known constituency, and regularly convened for a known and defined political purpose. Now, do you know what was the constituency in this case of Michigan? Have you any authentic evidence that it was not a mere vague accidental assembly of gentlemen, who got together and arrogated to themselves the highest rights of the people? What are the powers of a convention? If it is a convention of the elementary kind referred to by the gentleman from North Carolina, who shall restrain its powers or give bounds to its authority? When you have conjured up this all-powerful spirit, how dare you undertake to restrain it? If the gentleman once assembles the majesty of Michigan, can he put manacles upon its hands? No, sir, it is the great power of the State, and it mocks at all attempts to restrain it. Who is to limit its doings? The instructions of the people? I put it to the Senator from Pennsylvania. I ask him to tell me who are the constituency of this self-styled convention in Michigan? Will he tell me, the people? Let us, then, examine the word people—a name often invoked, about which great clamor is made by some gentlemen, and with whom we have been repeatedly threatened. Who are the people? It may be difficult exactly to define; but this I know, that I am one of them, and I do not look upon this thing, the people, as some great monster which must have garbage thrown to it to keep it quiet. God forbid that I should consider or speak of my fellow-citizens as a mob, having a will and purposes not to be ascertained through their constitutional organs—which some gentlemen appear to understand by the word people. No, sir, I am one of the people. What is good for them is good for me. What is right, and just, and proper for them, is proper, and just, and right for me, for you, sir, and for all of us. Ay, sir, the proudest Senator upon this floor is but one of the people; and when gentlemen appeal, in whatever candied phrase, from the organized will of the people, to what they may, for the occasion, choose to consider their will, it is done in an equally exaggerated conception of their cunning and the ignorance of their fellow-citizens.

Let us, however, look a little more closely to the matter in hand. Who are the people of Michigan, of whom the gentleman speaks? The men, women, and children? white and black? foreigners and all? Who make up the people? Who are they? Gentlemen cannot answer. I will tell you who they ought to be. They are that political body which is recognised by the constitution of a State; and there may be a dozen conventions held by the tag-rag and bob-tail within the peninsula, and yet not one convention of the people of Michigan. It must be the political people of Michigan who are represented in convention. Who is it that shall regulate this matter? Who is to declare who are the people and who not?

Sir, on this point I took, at the last session, high ground for Michigan. I held then, and I hold now, that it is her right, and hers alone, to say who the people of Michigan are, and Congress has no right to touch the question; till she has told you, you cannot know. And if the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall say that our admission bill, in requiring the assent of the people of Michigan assembled in convention, meant a gathering of all the men, women, and children, residing within the limits of that State, he advances a doctrine utterly subversive of the State. No, sir, the question of assent was referred by our act to a political body; the political people of Michigan, in regular convention assembled. And what proof have we that the recent assemblage was such a convention? None in the world. A newspaper paragraph! private letters! parol testimony! Is this evidence? Who voted? Did the women and children? We are told that there were more members than in the first convention, and a larger constituency. But how is this? Did not the matter concerning which the first convention assembled involve the very highest topic that can engross and agitate a community? Was it any thing short of war with Ohio, and nullification of the acts of Congress? Under this excitement, a certain number of voters turned out, and now gentlemen show us that the number has been nearly doubled. How is this to be accounted for? Has the excitement been increased? It has been diminished. How will these things look fifty years hence? That Congress received the acts of such an assemblage, in direct contradiction of those of their political constituents.

It might be considered incumbent on me to prove that Michigan is a State, for the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. STRANGE] has denied it. On this subject I belong to what has been deemed an extreme sect. But not in the very wildest of our excitement have I, for one moment, pushed the doctrine of State rights beyond the old Jeffersonian principles. Standing, where I have ever stood, on those principles, and upon them alone, I am here called to vindicate the State existence of Michigan. If the idea of the Senator from North Carolina is correct, then there is no existence for a State but in this confederacy. I will put a question to that honorable Senator. What was North Carolina before she came into the confederacy, and after the confederacy was formed? And yet he holds that Michigan is not a State, because she has not been admitted into it. If she is not a State, pray, what is she? She must either be a Territory, or else be in an elementary state, like the District of Columbia. When gentlemen once set out with these arrogations, there is no knowing where they are to end. No, sir, Michigan is a State. I vindicate her State sovereignty, and I am anxious, exceedingly anxious, that that sovereignty should not be tarnished in its very first act.

Then I say that there has not been a convention at Ann Arbor, that the people of Michigan have not been there represented. But here we are met by a reductio ad absurdum. We are asked, if the people of Michigan were not to meet so, how could they meet? Sir, if there is any one thing more dangerous than another, it is first to create a difficulty, and then to create a power in Government to meet it. It is dangerous in the extreme, with no other warrant than a phantom conjured up by ourselves, to call for weapons to destroy it, which are powerful enough to destroy liberty. What! are gentlemen to make powers? Are they to say a certain power is needed, and therefore we will create it? No; let them go to their masters. Let them go to the States and ask for it. But here there is no such necessity. You have the power already created.

A convention is provided for in the constitution of the United States and in the constitution of the State of Michigan—instruments which are obligatory on us and on that State. We have recognised her constitution, and it declares that a convention shall be called only in a certain way. Have you a right to subvert that constitution? Will you virtually repeal it in the very act of confirming it? I invoke the Senators who have been elected from Michigan to aid me in defending the rights of their State. Here is Congress proposing to repeal a part of their constitution, attempting to circumscribe their own Legislature. I call them to the rescue. Much has been said in this debate about the will of the people, and we have been reminded that their wish is paramount to all enactments. God forbid that I should subscribe to that doctrine in the sense here advanced. What? Do I hold my rights by the mere popular breath? Shall I trust the liberties of us the people to such a Government? No, sir. I look to the recorded will of the people—to the will of the people as they have embodied it in their political institutions. I look for the will of the people of Michigan in the constitution of Michigan. And they offend the rights of the people who look over that instrument to the voice of a mere popular assembly. The constitution, that is the people's will—their solemn, defined, recorded will. Tell me not that that is the will of the people which can be expressed by a mere transient party caucus movement. The people's will, I repeat it again, is the people's constitution, and I will not live in a society that recognises any other. Sooner turn me loose to the savage state, let me be armed to the teeth, and prepared to make war on every neighbor, rather than be under the government of mobs and caucuses. No convention, therefore, can be entitled by that name, unless it was held according to the constitution of the State of Michigan; and if you recognise any other, you subvert the constitution.

Now, I ask, how was the first convention formed? It assembled under the recommendation of the Legislature of Michigan, under an act which recognised the binding authority of the constitution. The acts were duly authenticated, and sent here with all the formulas of authentication upon them. It was the deliberate judgment of the people of Michigan, regularly expressed. But this will virtually goes to appeal from the entire authority of the people of Michigan, to the honorable chairman of our Judiciary Committee. He decides in the very teeth of the Legislature of Michigan, who must be supposed to understand their own rights and duties, and who passed a law for a convention—which convention did act, and duly certified its action. There was great point in the question put by the Senator from Ohio, [MR. EWING.] If the first convention had acceded to the terms, and then this new-fangled and self-created convention had met and rescinded the act of assent, how would the Senator from Pennsylvania [MR. BUCHANAN] have then decided between the two conventions? Would he for one moment have held up the latter against the former? No, sir. No, no. The Senator would have exclaimed, "Tell me not of the lawless proceedings of a disorganizing assemblage. Here is the act of a regular, a legitimate convention, held according to law; and what is the language of Michigan, if this is not?" In what terms of indignation would the Senator have rebuked us for paltering with terms, and casting the mantle of a convention over the unauthorized resolves of a lawless assembly? But circumstances alter cases. A convention regularly sanctioned by the Legislature has refused to accede to your terms. And how will you get out of the difficulty? By calling together a nameless body to controvert the will of the people, expressed through their own devised and constituted organs, to repeal official acts sealed and certified by their own functionaries? Shall we declare the act of their Legislature to be unconstitutional? Who gave us any such right? None dare do it.

But the gentleman from Mississippi [MR. WALKER] reminded us that the first convention itself declared its want of power to alter the constitution. Well, sir, if that convention had not the power, what right have we to give superior power to another body? If the Governor and Legislature of a State could not invest a convention with power to change the constitution of a State, can we? It is preposterous.

The honorable Senator over the way [MR. BUCHANAN] comes from the great State of Pennsylvania, and I from the little State of South Carolina. He comes from a non-slaveholding State; I from a slaveholding. Will he claim to go behind the act of my Legislature, and call upon the people of South Carolina? Intimations were once made, and from high quarters, that this General Government would look behind the constituted authorities of South Carolina for the will of the people; and what people will the gentleman from Pennsylvania select? The free white citizens, or black and white people, of the State of South Carolina? Will the gentleman consider the human beings or the white men of South Carolina her people? South Carolina alone can decide that for herself, and Michigan for herself; and this Government ought not, and cannot, for either. The gentleman perceives that I am deeply interested in this matter. There is a deep and a fearful reason why I shall not let him look behind the constitution and Legislature of a State. Sir, we talked much of conventions during the period of our late excitement in South Carolina. We had then the convention of a party, large and numerous, which sat from day to day, adjourned from time to time, appealed from the Legislature to the people, held, it was rumored, communications with this Government, and it was also rumored that officers of this Government threatened to consider it as South Carolina, and to obey its orders in wielding the sword at that moment held drawn against the State. The same dangerous and disorganizing principles are avowed in this bill. Sir, when once we get behind the Legislature, and get into conventions, who speaks the voice of the people? Who has got it? Each man says that he speaks it; but who is right? The party in power will always say that the voice which disapproves their acts is not the voice of the people. It is in this way they satisfy their conscience. And shall it be that on the will of the majority here repose all the powers of the constitution, and all the rights of the people of the United States? I trust such a state of things will never occur. Supposing that this was the State of Pennsylvania instead of Michigan, and there were two conventions, one at Philadelphia, and one at Harrisburg, expressing opinions directly the reverse of each other, which, in the opinion of the honorable Senator, would express the voice of the people? I can tell you, sir; it would be that which expressed his own sentiments. What I desire is, that we should not proceed on these resolutions passed at Ann Arbor as an act of the State of Michigan, but shall wait until we have the act of that State in a regular, organized form. What is a State? It is a political organization within a certain territory, and its political organization is the embodying of its rights in a constitution. If you look beyond this, there is no State; there may be a population, but there is no State. Sir, this bill has been characterized as revolutionary, and it is so. It is an appeal from the Government to the people, from written constitutions to unwritten, from organized systems of Government to disorganized. The very act of this Ann Arbor convention is itself an act of disorganization. It grants away the territory of Michigan, yet it is itself not known to State authority. Supposing that some of these Ann Arbor gentlemen should be arrested on criminal process, and tried for their proceedings, how would they fare before a judicial tribunal? Sir, they are guilty of treason. Could they plead the act of Congress? It would not avail them; Congress is not their Legislature. If asked, what brought you here? if called upon to show an act of the Legislature calling them there, what could they answer? To bring the question home, suppose the Legislature should disavow their powers, what can we say? Can we say that that assembly was paramount to the Legislature? Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania say to the people of Michigan, we will not listen to your Legislature; you shall be in the Union, and you shall be in it under the condition we prescribed? I think he would not. The Legislature might repeal the act of that convention to-morrow; and if the question came to a judicial investigation, how would that gentleman plead the powers of that convention? Suppose the territory should be disputed, and the courts of Michigan undertake to try an officer of the State of Ohio. He justifies under this convention, and we take ground that it had no power to act. How, I ask, would a court of justice decide? Will any gentleman say that the court in Michigan would consider itself as bound by such an act? I am greatly mistaken if there is any judge in the land who would not hoot at it. The State, to be sure, may acquiesce in it. That is possible; but we have no guarantee of it. And if not, your act will be laughed to scorn. Sir, it does strike me that this wholesale violation of charters—this wholesale nullification—goes infinitely beyond what we in the South ever thought of. We never applied the doctrine of nullification to the act of any Legislature within its own bounds; but the sweeping nullification of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee goes to the breaking down of all State powers and constitutions. This is nullification by Congress; it is nullification with a vengeance, under the patronage of the Congress of the United States. It is very dangerous. We in the South went on the ground that the General Government had transcended its powers, and that, so far, its acts were not binding; and our position was vindicated here, upon this floor, in 1832, with unanswered and unanswerable reasoning; and those who remember that affair may take occasion to sneer, but will never venture upon the argument again. Whatever was our doctrine or purposes, we came boldly out, and risked our property and life on the issue. We did not palter with public faith, upon flimsy subtleties, or stifle the voice of honesty by a pettifoggish technicality.

I trust there are interests in South Carolina which will always save her from the necessity of resorting to sophisms and subterfuges to vindicate an equivocal honesty, or to hide herself in misty generalities while she violates her charter.

The honorable Senator tells us that the principles recently avowed by leading men of his party in Pennsylvania have been misunderstood. I am glad to hear it; for, as I and the public have understood those principles, they are utterly revolting and abhorrent to my nature. I do not desire for one moment to live under a Government where such doctrines prevail—doctrines which go to dissolve the bond of society. I know, indeed, that extreme glosses are sometimes put on the language of men in party times, but, as I understand, that celebrated letter is a call upon pauperism to enlist against property, to violate contracts, to strike first at bank charters and then at land charters, until nothing safe is left in the community. It is said that the will of the people, as that will is ascertained by the great high-priests who minister continually in the presence of power, is to supersede every thing: corporations, bank charters, acts of a State Legislature, State constitutions—all, all are to go by the board. Sir, I start back in horror from such doctrine and its abettors. But I will not longer detain the Senate. I have stated my objections to the preamble of this bill; let these be taken out of the way, and I am ready to admit Michigan to-morrow. I shall be glad to see her take her place amongst the confederate States, and it will be a personal gratification to me to be officially associated with the worthy gentlemen who are waiting to take their seats as her Senators.

Mr. STRANGE said he was greatly flattered in having the few hasty and desultory remarks he had let fall the other day made by the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRÆSTON] so large a portion of the text of the very fervid and eloquent address he had just delivered. He had been so agreeably entertained as to be unwilling to interrupt him, even for the purpose of rescuing himself from misapprehension; but he now rose mainly for that purpose. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRÆSTON] has represented me as saying that a convention was an undefined something, rising, like a mist, from the popular mass, scarcely perceptible, but very powerful. What I meant to say, sir, and what I think I did say, was that there was no mode pointed out, either by the common law or by statute, by which a convention was to be assembled; and I distinctly stated that a convention was an assemblage of the people of any community, either in person or by their agents or representatives; and when so assembled its powers were vast, and, in a state of nature, unlimited. The Senator has asked, when Congress has called together a convention, who is to control it? and, in so doing, has plainly misapprehended me in another particular. I have never said that Congress has the power to convoke a convention in Michigan, or in any other State, or any where else, except in the cases specially provided for in the fifth article of the constitution; and am, therefore, not called upon to answer the Senator's question. I do not conceive the convention held in Michigan to have been in obedience to an act of Congress, or that it was called by Congress. In this matter I accord fully with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] that the act of last session was a mere offer on the part of Congress to the people of Michigan, which they might either accede to or reject, at their pleasure. Congress, in effect, says to the people of Michigan, we will create you a State of the Union upon certain conditions, which conditions are, that you shall meet in convention, and assent to certain territorial limits, which we have prescribed as those within which we are willing to create a State. The people of Michigan may either meet in convention, or decline it, at their pleasure; and being so met, they may either agree to the boundaries proposed, or refuse them; and the only consequences are, that in the one case they accept the terms offered them by Congress, and become a State, and in the other reject them, and remain a Territory, as they were before. The only question, therefore, which we have now to decide is, has Michigan accepted the terms proposed, or not? Objections are raised to the authority of Congress to enter into bargains or contracts with any State in this Union; but that objection proceeds upon the assumption of the fact that Michigan is now a State—the very point upon which the Senator from South Carolina and myself are at issue. I have denied, and do still deny, that Michigan is a State; and insist upon it that the very process is now going on to make her so, or rather to ascertain whether she is so or not. In my remarks the other day, I did not speak of any claim for Michigan to be a State by reason of the ordinance of 1784, declaring that the portions of country situated in the Northwestern territory should become States upon attaining a certain amount of population; nor is it necessary for me to remark upon that ordinance now, for I perceive that the Senator from South Carolina does not base his argument that she is a State upon that ordinance. On the contrary, he distinctly admits that in January last she was not a State, but became so by the action of Congress in June.

Now, sir, I deny that any thing took place in June to give to Michigan a different character from that which she bore in January, except that the act passed in June placed it in the power of the people of Michigan, by their own action, (to wit: according to the terms of the act of June,) to change their own character, and pass from territorial existence to that of a State. But it is said that Congress, in that act, speaks of her as a State, and accepts her constitution. I insist that that act of Congress is altogether conditional, and must be altogether inoperative to give her existence as a State, without at the same time receiving her into the Union. The only authority claimed, or ever exercised by Congress, or, at any rate, the only one she can lawfully claim or exercise, is derived from the 3d section of the 4th article of the constitution. Even under this clause, the power of creating States is only implied as incidental to the power of admission, and the independent power of creation is nowhere to be found. Under it, the incident merely accompanies the principal, and they must both constitute one entire act. But this construction is objected to, upon the ground that it would place the Senators and Representative from Michigan in a very awkward situation. I should be exceedingly sorry if this consequence should follow; but while I stand here in part representing a sovereign State, I must fearlessly perform my duty, and assert that which I believe to be true, without reference to whom it may serve or whom it may disoblige, and must therefore continue to insist that Congress has no power to create a State for any other purpose than reception into the Union; and, therefore, if Michigan is not already in the Union, she is not a State. Something like an argumentum ad hominem has been addressed to me by the Senator from South Carolina, for the purpose of showing that a State may exist, and yet not be a member of the Union. He refers to a period when, after the adoption of the federal constitution by all the other States except herself, North Carolina had still an existence as a State, though not within the Union. I humbly conceive the argument is fallacious. North Carolina was not formed from any territory belonging to the Union, which never had property in her soil, nor held over her any claim whatsoever. She was a free, sovereign, and independent State, owning no superior, and acknowledging no control but that of her own will. She had, in common with her sister States, thrown off the shackles of despotism, and had a right, in common with them, to seek her own interest and happiness, according to her own choice. With herself, therefore, was the decision, whether she would seek them alone or in federative union with the other States. Not so with Michigan; she belonged in territory to the Union, and her citizens owed it allegiance; the one could never be transferred, or the other dissolved, but by actual force sufficient to maintain the new State against the power of the Union, or the consent of Congress constitutionally given. The former is not pretended, and the latter I deny has been shown to have been properly expressed. So that the cases of Michigan and North Carolina are altogether dissimilar; and the accidents of the one can never be used to illustrate those of the other. As I said yesterday, Michigan is not a State until she complies with the terms imposed at the last session, and the question is whether she has done so. I have already stated what I conceived to be a convention, so far as Michigan, at least, is concerned; and can there be a doubt that the Ann Arbor convention is such an one?

Admission of Michigan.

Gentlemen inquire what we would have said if the first convention called by the Legislature had ratified the proposal of Congress. Would we have considered it valid? I answer, valid, most unquestionably. We say it is totally immaterial how the convention is convened, so it is a convention. The convention de facto is the one which we are to consider, without inquiring into its authority, just as we treat with the Governments of foreign nations. In this latter case, we do not ask how the Government is constituted, or by what authority it was formed. Our only inquiry is, is it, in point of fact, the existing Government? And so, also, of past acts of the Government. The inquiry is, was it at the time it acted in the possession of the sovereign power? and if so, its acts are valid, without any reference to the means by which that power was acquired. So with the convention. Had it an actual unresisted existence as the convention of the people? and if so, it possessed all the powers incident to a territorial convention. It is true, if Congress had in her act prescribed the mode in which the convention should have been convoked, no other convention but one called in that mode would have been a fulfilment of the act, or a compliance with its conditions. But, as Congress did not prescribe such mode, the people of Michigan were left to the broadest latitude; and if the first convention had yielded the assent required, all would have been well. But there were two conventions; and we are asked which was the voice of the people? I answer, both. The one spoke the voice of the people at one time, and the other at another; and the last is to be taken as the continuing voice of the people until they speak again. It is so with individuals. If a gentleman offers to sell me a horse, and I refuse to take him, that is my voice then; but I may return the next day and agree to take him, and that is my voice then; but the last voice closes contract, and there is the end of the matter. So with Michigan. An offer is made her; she refuses to accept it; that is her voice then: but another day she says I will accept it; that is her voice then, and the compact is ratified. But the Senator asks, can Congress call a convention in South Carolina? I believe I have already answered this question; but I will do it again. I say she cannot, and I deny that she has done so in Michigan. It is, therefore, unnecessary to review the picture of horrors which the gentleman has so eloquently portrayed as likely to ensue from such an act. But the course of Michigan is said to be revolutionary, unless she be a State. This might have been so if Michigan had acted without reference to the authority of the United States—if she had claimed the right of forming her constitution, and exercising other rights of sovereignty, without reference to the ratification of her acts by Congress. But this she has not done, but, on the contrary, is now seeking that very ratification at your hands, without for a moment intimating a desire of separation from you, or claiming an existence unsanctioned by your constitution. But it has been contended that Michigan, if a State, by holding this convention, has been guilty of a revolutionary movement, inasmuch as it was not called by the proper authority. In reply, I say that I have not only denied, but, as I think, shown that Michigan is not a State; but if she were, I insist that, so far as Congress has any thing to do with the matter, the act would not be revolutionary.

Every State in the Union, so far as Congress is concerned, has a right to hold conventions according to their pleasure, and, when assembled in convention, to prostrate their executive, legislative, and judicial bodies, and put up others in their stead, provided, in so doing, they adhere to the republican form of government. It is entirely a domestic matter, with which the other States have nothing to do. In this I am, as I think, fortified by one of the wisest and best statesmen who has ever adorned our country. "The authority," says Mr. Madison, in his celebrated report, "of constitutions over Governments, and of the sovereignty of the people over constitutions, are truths which are at all times necessary to be kept in mind." The only check possessed by the General Government over the sovereignty of the people of the several States must be found in the constitution, the charter of its own being. In the charter the General Government is required to guaranty to each State a republican form of government, and, while that is preserved, the interference of the General Government is uncalled-for and unauthorized. She has nothing to do with the matter.

But we have been asked, what will be the result, if we make this convention the subject of judicial inquiry? The question is, I think, altogether premature. The validity of this convention can only be drawn into judicial inquiry in a dispute between Michigan and a neighboring State, on the subject of boundary; and to put that difficulty at rest it is that Congress has herself incurred much difficulty, and imposed it upon others: but she cannot settle the matter judicially; neither can she, by any legislation, interpose any insurmountable barrier in the way of litigation. She has been endeavoring to induce Michigan to estop herself from setting up any claim to the disputed territory. If she has succeeded, all is well; and if she has not, matters are only left as they were. If Michigan chooses to make it a subject of judicial inquiry, it must always be in her power to do so. We may legislate as extensively and with as much complexity as we please, but the parties affected by our legislation will, whenever they think proper, apply to the judicial tribunals to decide what our legislation has accomplished. Congress has already passed a law prescribing the limits of the litigant States, thus expending all the power she possesses on the subject; but the efficiency of this, and all other powers, must be a question forever open to judicial investigation. We can pass no gag-law by which the parties interested shall be forbidden to litigate their claims before the courts of the country. But that a convention has been holden, as a matter of fact, I did not suppose would be disputed. [Mr. PRESTON. I do not deny it at all.] I am obliged to the Senator for the admission; and that the Ann Arbor meeting was not only a convention, but one of indisputable validity, I think is very satisfactorily shown by the fact, if there were no other in the case, that this matter has been agitated in Michigan in the newspapers, in fact every where, and that no person is found in this city, either in or out of Congress, lifting up his voice with authority to deny the validity of that meeting—that it was properly convened, and that its acts are perfectly legitimate.

Mr. MORRIS withdrew his proposition to recommit the bill with instructions, and submitted, as an amendment, a substitute for the preamble.

Mr. GRUNDY asked for the yeas and nays on Mr. MORRIS's amendment; which were accordingly ordered.

Messrs. CALHOUN and MORRIS addressed the Senate in favor of the amendment just offered.

Before Mr. MORRIS concluded, he gave way, and

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, moved that the Senate adjourn; which question was decided in the negative: Yeas 16, nays 16.

After a few remarks from Mr. MORRIS,

Mr. WALL moved that the Senate adjourn; which motion was lost: Yeas 19, nays 19.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Linn, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wright—19.

After a few more remarks from Mr. MORRIS,

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, moved that the Senate adjourn; which motion was carried: Yeas 21, nays 17—as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Dana, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wright—17.

So the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4.

ADMISSION OF MICHIGAN.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union; the question being on the motion of Mr. MORRIS to amend the bill.

After Mr. MORRIS had made a few supplementary and explanatory remarks,

Mr. BAYARD said: In taking part in the present discussion, and in the vote which he should feel himself compelled to give on the subject now under consideration, he was actuated by no feelings of ill will towards the new State of Michigan; on the contrary, he would cheerfully extend to her the hand of fellowship, and heartily welcome her admission into this great confederacy. But, sir, I cannot conscientiously do so under the circumstances and in the manner that is proposed. Nor, sir, have I any pride of opinion to maintain in the course I pursue, as I had not the honor of a seat here when the act of Congress was passed which is the remote cause of the present proceedings. A seat in this body imposes the duty of consulting the welfare of the whole Union, as well as of preserving the great principles of the constitution; and I feel, sir, that I am influenced by no other motive. I am happy to find that one of those little mists which might have obscured the subject has been dissipated by the communication which has just been made by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the share of the surplus revenue to which Michigan would be entitled if now a State of the Union will be reserved for her, unless its distribution should be ordered by Congress. If, sir, this course had not been adopted by the Secretary, I should have cheerfully and promptly given my support to a law for that purpose. It is agreed, too, on all hands, that there is no party purpose to be promoted by our present action on the subject, and that we are thus at liberty to exercise a fair, impartial, unprejudiced judgment in its decision.

In my opinion, sir, the present bill involves a monstrous political heresy, and gives its sanction by implication to a doctrine which would subvert all regular government. It is true, sir, that upon its face there is nothing exceptionable, but you cannot strip it of its contemporaneous facts, you cannot blot from the page of history its concomitant circumstances. The message of the President and other documents are now matters of record. What, then, sir, is the case before us? Not a single insulated act, but a matter which, in the web of human affairs, involves consequences which cannot be trammelled up. The effect, sir, of to-day becomes the cause of to-morrow, and it behooves us to look warily to the principles which we establish. The case is simply this: the people of a part of Michigan Territory, without waiting for a previous act of Congress assigning the boundaries of their State, and authorizing the formation of a constitution and State Government, undertook, on the 11th May, 1835, to form a constitution and State Government, and applied for admission into the Union at the last session. Congress passed an act on the 15th June, 1836, accepting, ratifying, and confirming, the constitution and State Government, but provided, as a condition precedent to her admission, that the assent of a convention of delegates, chosen by the people, should be given to the boundaries prescribed in the act. I say, sir, the people of a part of Michigan Territory undertook to do this, because, at that time, Michigan Territory embraced not only the peninsula of Michigan, but the whole of the present Territory of Wisconsin, and contained within its limits 177,000 square miles, or nearly three times the area of the great State of Virginia. The peninsula of Michigan, which had previously formed a part of Indiana Territory, was separated from that Territory and established as an independent one by the act of Congress of the 11th January, 1805. Subsequently to this period, Indiana in the mean time having been formed into a State, an act of Congress was passed, (on the 18th April, 1818,) authorizing the formation of a constitution and State Government for Illinois, and the 7th section of that act added to the peninsula of Michigan the rest of the Northwestern Territory, comprising the present Wisconsin Territory, which it declared should be attached to, and made part of, Michigan Territory, subject, however, to be disposed of by Congress according to the right reserved in the 5th article of the ordinance of July 13, 1787.

When the immense territory on the north of the Ohio river, formerly called the Northwestern Territory, was ceded to the United States by Virginia, the 5th article of the ordinance of the 13th July, 1787, which was declared to be a compact between the original States and the people and States of the said Territory, provided that it should be divided into not less than three nor more than five States, and proceeded to parcel it out into three States, whose boundaries it fixed, with the express provision, however, that those boundaries might be altered, and that Congress should have the authority to form one or two States in that part of the territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan. At first, this whole region of country passed under one name, that of "the Territory northwest of the river Ohio," and was subject to a single Territorial Government. In the year 1800, by the act of Congress of the 7th May, it was divided into two parts, for the purpose of temporary government, by a line beginning at the Ohio, and opposite the mouth of the Kentucky river, and running thence to Fort Recovery, and thence north until it intersected the territorial line between the United States and Canada. That portion of it which lay on the eastern side of the division line retained the name of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, and that on the western side of the line was called Indiana Territory. The peninsula of Michigan was thus divided between these two Territorial Governments. When, subsequently, in the year 1802, the State of Ohio was, by the act of Congress of the 30th April, in that year, authorized to form a constitution and State Government, and the boundaries of that State were established, the balance of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio, that is to say, the other portion of the peninsula of Michigan, was attached to Indiana Territory. By act of Congress of the 11th January, 1805, this Territory of Indiana was again divided, and the peninsula of Michigan established as a separate Territory. From the year 1805, then, until the year 1818, the Territorial Government of Michigan extended only over the peninsula of that name. When, however, in the latter year, by act of Congress of the 18th April, Illinois was authorized to form a constitution and State Government, and the boundaries of that State were established as they had been of the State of Indiana, by the act of April 19, 1818, the remaining portion of the old Northwestern Territory was added to the peninsula of Michigan, and the whole subjected to one Territorial Government. This immense region of country, covering an area of 177,000 square miles, was subject, however, by the express provision of the ordinance of the 13th July, 1787, to be formed by the authority of Congress into one or two States. Such, sir, was the state of things when the inhabitants of the peninsula of Michigan, disregarding this authority of Congress, undertook to form a constitution and State Government for themselves. The preamble to their constitution is in these words: "We, the people of the Territory of Michigan, as established by the act of Congress of the 11th of January, 1805, do agree," &c.; which description embraced only the inhabitants of the peninsula of Michigan, which had, as has been stated, in the first instance been made a separate Territory by that act of Congress. In doing so, these people professed to act in conformity with the ordinance of July, 1787, and to derive their authority from that ordinance; which, as has been seen, expressly reserves to Congress the right to form one or two States in the Territory as it then existed. As both Congress and the inhabitants of that peninsula could not have the same right, it is perfectly clear that the act of those people was unwarranted by any provision of law, and a mere nullity. This was the view taken of the subject at the time of their application to Congress at the last session, and hence, sir, the resolution of the 26th of January, 1836, referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] "that the Senate regard the memorial purporting to be from the State of Michigan in no other light than as a voluntary act of private individuals." But, sir, consent takes away error, and Congress thought proper, at a subsequent period, by the act of the 15th June, 1836, to accept, ratify, and confirm, the constitution and State Government which had been formed by the inhabitants of the peninsula, with this proviso, however, that the limits of the State should embrace not merely the peninsula, but likewise a region of country lying on the northwest of Lake Michigan; thus adding to the proposed new State both territory and population, and requiring, as a condition precedent to her admission into the Union, that the assent of a convention of delegates chosen by the people should be given to the boundaries prescribed in the act. The simple question, then, would seem to be whether this condition has been complied with. Congress, not doubting but that such assent would be cheerfully and promptly given, further provided that, as soon as such assent should be given, the President should announce the fact by proclamation, and "that, thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into the Union, as one of the United States of America, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be considered complete, and the Senators and Representatives who have been elected by the said State, as its representatives in the Congress of the United States, shall be entitled to take their seats in the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, without further delay."

It is thus seen, sir, that not only the fact of assent is provided for, but also the evidence by which that fact is to be established. It is clear that the President is made the judge of that fact, and that he might have bound the United States at least by his proclamation. We could not have controverted the fact, and the Senators from Michigan might have taken their seats on this floor. But, sir, although the President might have assumed this responsibility, he has, at least in this instance, wisely abstained from trampling on the law and constitution. I cannot see how it was possible for him, under the circumstances of this case, to have declared that a convention of delegates, chosen by the people of Michigan, had given its assent to the boundaries prescribed by the act of Congress. Whatever may have been his motive for this course, no proclamation has been issued, but the whole matter is referred to Congress by his message of the 27th of December, 1836. By that message and the accompanying documents it appears that a convention of delegates assembled on the 26th of September, 1836, at Ann Arbor, in conformity with an act of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, passed on the 25th of July, 1836, and resolved "that this convention cannot give their assent to the proposition contained in said proviso; but the same is hereby rejected." By the same message and documents, it further appears that another convention of delegates assembled on the 14th of December, 1836, at Ann Arbor, without any previous law of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, but which originated from the resolutions and proceedings of primary meetings of the citizens in the several counties, which assumed to be a convention of delegates chosen by the people in compliance with the act of Congress, and this convention gave its assent to the condition. As the case stands, the simple question is, whether the condition has been complied with; or, in other words, has a convention of delegates, chosen by the people, given its assent? The act which we have now under consideration, in its preamble, declares that such assent has been given in compliance with the law.

It may be here remarked that the matter now under consideration does not involve the question of the right of Congress to impose such a condition. The bill which we are now to pass upon supposes that right to exist, is based upon it, and declares that the condition has been complied with. I have not a doubt myself, sir, as to the right. But, sir, as to the fact, is it true that a convention of delegates, chosen by the people, has given its assent? As no proclamation has been made, which was the evidence contemplated by the act, and by which we should have been bound, we must now look into the whole case; we must examine the evidence of the fact, as furnished in the message and documents. What, then, is the evidence laid before us? 1st. The proceedings of the convention held on the 26th of September, 1836, at Ann Arbor, under the authority of the law passed by the Legislature of the State of Michigan, on the 25th of July, 1836. 2d. The proceedings of the convention held on the 14th of December, 1836, without any previous act of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, but convened by virtue of the resolutions and proceedings of primary meetings of the citizens in the several counties. The first-mentioned convention positively refuses its assent. The second convention gives that assent. If the matter stood alone upon the acts of the second convention, stripped of its concomitant history and circumstances, and we were called upon simply to give credit to the proceedings of that convention, on the faith of its assumed character, and the attestation of its president and secretaries, we might, sir, be content with the evidence, and look no further into its character and authority. And this, sir, I take it, is the position assumed by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE.] But, sir, such is not the case; we cannot shut our eyes to the fact stated in the letter of the president of the convention, (Mr. Williams,) accompanying its proceedings, and stated, also, in the message of the President of the United States, in which this matter is referred to us, and which are now both part of the records of this transaction, that the convention was assembled without authority of any previous law of the State of Michigan, but originated in primary meetings of citizens in the several counties.

Are we, then, sir, prepared to say that here has been a compliance with the act of Congress, as is affirmed in the preamble of this act? What did Congress mean by a convention of delegates chosen by the people? Did they mean an idle ceremony, or did they mean a convention which could bind the people of Michigan; or, in other words, a convention which should possess the sovereign power of the State when assembled? If such is their meaning, can it be pretended that this convention, assembled under the authority of voluntary meetings of citizens in different counties, is possessed of the sovereign authority of the State? And yet, sir, if you pass this bill, with or without its preamble, you do virtually declare that this proposition is true. You declare, sir, for you cannot get rid of the facts and circumstances of the transaction, that voluntary meetings of citizens in different counties of a State, in a time of profound peace, and as a measure of regular government, may call a convention, which shall possess the sovereign power of the State, and may, therefore, alter or abolish the existing Government. The proposition is too monstrous to be tolerated for a moment. If the people of Michigan were in a state of nature, lege solutus, without any social institutions whatever, and had assembled as a body in some grand campus martius, those who were present could have bound only themselves, since there would be wanting the assent, either express or implied, of those who were absent, and which assent is the sole foundation of authority in a republican Government.

But such, even, was not their case; a constitution and form of government had been adopted by them on the 11th of May, 1835, which was accepted, ratified, and confirmed, by the act of Congress of June 15, 1836, and which was in existence and active operation at the time of this pretended convention. The very end of government is the protection of the weak against the strong, of the guileless against the crafty; and no portion of the people have a right to bind the rest of the community, but in the mode provided in the constitution, which is the compact of their association, the compact which every man enters into with every other man, and which is, for that reason, the source and measure of the authority of the Government organized by it.

Upon any question affecting the general interest, and which falls within the scope of the legislative power, that power alone is the true exponent of the public will. The term people embraces every individual in the community, or, in a more confined and political sense, every individual who enjoys the franchise of a vote, and is not to be confined to a few busy demagogues, who affect to embody in themselves the majesty and authority of the people; while the compact, which each man has entered into with every other in adopting a constitution which vests the legislative power in a particular body, is, that the Legislature shall be the exponents of the public will in all cases not prohibited by the constitution. This results from the very nature of things, and is true of every species of government. Where the people have themselves formed the constitution, it is they who have declared, in such a case, that they will not collectively, nor in any portions of society, great or small, attempt to exercise legislative power in any other mode. The question then arises, whether there existed in Michigan a Government, possessing legislative power under a constitution formed by themselves, and whether that legislative power was competent to call a convention. Her condition was the same after the act of June 15, 1836, as if she had been authorized in the first instance to form a constitution and State Government, and had done so in conformity with such previous authority, but which had provided that her admission into the Union should depend on the performance of some condition precedent. In this state of things there was nothing unusual or unknown to our institutions and practice. The State of Indiana was authorized, by act of Congress of April 19, 1816, to form a constitution and State Government, and was not admitted into the Union until the 11th day of December following. Illinois was, in like manner, authorized by act of Congress of the 18th of April, 1818, and was not admitted into the Union until the 3d of December following. Mississippi was authorized by act of March 1, 1817, and admitted on the 10th of December following. In these different instances, the State Governments were organized and in active operation before the admission of the respective States; they passed laws, and elected their respective Senators and Representatives. It is, therefore, a proposition which is undeniable, that a people may have a State Government before admission into the Union. This circumstance explains the reason why Congress made no provision as to the mode in which a convention should be convened, in order to give the required assent. It was because there existed in Michigan a State Government, accepted, ratified, and confirmed, by the very act which required the assent of a convention, which was competent to call one, and settle the time and place of its assembling, and the details of its election. But it is said that the Legislature had, by the constitution of the State, no power to call such a convention, because the purpose of such convention was to alter the boundaries of the State as established by the constitution, and that instrument had provided a different mode of proceeding in cases of amendment or alteration. This objection assumes it to be true that the boundaries of the State were settled by the constitution, which, in point of fact, is not so. There is no reference, either express or implied, to the boundaries of the State, in any part of the instrument, except the preamble, which is in these words: "We, the people of the Territory of Michigan, as established by the act of Congress of the 11th of January, 1805, &c., do, by our delegates in convention assembled, mutually agree to form ourselves into a free and independent State, by the style and title of the State of Michigan, and do ordain and establish the following constitution for the government of the same."

It must be recollected that, at the time of forming this constitution, the Territory of Michigan was composed, as I have stated, of the whole of the remaining portion of the Northwestern Territory, embracing the present State of Michigan and the Wisconsin Territory, and covering an area of 177,000 square miles; that the peninsula of Michigan had been subjected to a separate Territorial Government by the act of the 11th January, 1805, and had so continued up to the year 1818, when, on the creation of the State of Illinois, the balance of the Northwestern Territory had been incorporated with it. The people of the peninsula of Michigan wishing to form themselves into a State, instead of describing themselves as inhabitants of the peninsula, in terms adopted an equivalent form of expression, namely: "We, the people of the Territory of Michigan, as established by the act of the 11th January, 1805," which was precisely the peninsula of Michigan.

This is nothing more than a description of the people who proposed to form themselves into a free and independent State, as contradistinguished from the other inhabitants of the then existing Territory of Michigan. It is the natural and proper mode of describing a people or nation, namely, by the place or country of their residence; but it does not import any limitation of boundaries, any more than the phrase "We, the people of the United States," in the preamble to the constitution of the United States, limits the boundaries of the United States to those which existed at the time of its adoption. If it were otherwise, how came we at this moment to possess the immense region on the western side of the Mississippi, or how came we to possess Florida? It is very unusual and unnecessary to settle boundaries in the constitution, and I question whether there are more than half a dozen cases to be found among the different States of this Union. In the cases of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, it became necessary to do so, because the act of Congress which authorized the formation of their respective constitutions required that it should be done.

The word State has a double meaning: in the one it indicates the people who compose the community, in the other the territory inhabited by them. In forming a constitution it is the people who form themselves into a sovereign State, and their identity would be the same, whether they continued to occupy the same territory or not. The reference, by way of description, to the region of country they inhabit, is no more of the essence of the compact than a description of an individual in a deed, as A B, of the District of Columbia, would be of the essence of his contract, requiring that he should, in all time to come, reside in the District of Columbia, in order to avail himself of its provisions. But, sir, there is another and a conclusive answer to this objection; which is, that the inhabitants not having possessed the right at all, in the first instance, to form a constitution and State Government, the same is binding and valid only so far as it was ratified by the act of Congress of June 15, 1836; and that act having refused to confine the new State to the peninsula of Michigan, but having required that it should embrace a region of country on the northwestern side of the lake, it follows that if it were true that the preamble established the boundaries of the State, it was in that particular vacated by the act of Congress. For it must be recollected that the ordinance of 1787 gave to Congress the right to erect one or two States in the then existing Territory of Michigan, which was the remaining portion of the old Northwestern Territory. The result, sir, then, is this: that to call a convention to express its assent to the boundaries established by Congress, is not to call a convention to amend or alter the constitution, since the constitution, neither in point of fact nor in point of law, established any boundaries; and, consequently, that the enlargement or diminution of its territory became a matter of ordinary legislation, a power which is exercised every day by the Legislatures of the respective States, in cessions made by them to the United States.

But if it be true that the enlargement or diminution of the territory is a matter of ordinary legislation where the boundaries are not fixed by the constitution, a fortiori, it is a matter of ordinary legislation to call a convention to enlarge or diminish the territory, where the duty to do so is imposed by competent authority. The right of a Legislature to call a convention at any time must depend on the constitution of the State; and the powers of the convention, when called, will depend on the provisions of the law under which it is assembled; because the people, in voting for such a convention, cannot be understood to invest it with any other power than that which they have previously agreed it should have in the passage of the law to which they have, through their Legislature, given either their express or implied consent. The people are the source of all power. When assembled in a state of nature, lege solutus, in their sovereign capacity, their power is without any practical limitation. It is the whole will of the community, sustained by its whole force. But, as they cannot meet en masse when spread over a large country, recourse is had to the principle of representation; and, when the sovereign power is delegated, a constitution becomes necessary in order to limit the powers granted. If the whole legislative power were delegated, without restriction, then the Legislature, who are the depositaries of that power, would possess it in as absolute a degree as that in which it belonged to the whole community, assembled in its sovereign capacity; that is, without any practical limitation. The constitution of a State is not, therefore, generally a mere grant of power to a particular body; it does not consist in an enumeration of certain powers which are granted, but, vesting at once the whole legislative power in a particular body, it provides for limitations on its exercise. Hence the necessity for bills of rights and reservations in favor of individual liberty and security; hence the provisions in relation to trial by jury, to the power of arrest, to the habeas corpus, to freedom of conscience in religious matters, and freedom from unreasonable seizures and searches; hence the necessity of guarding the existence of the executive and judicial powers by constitutional provision, which might otherwise be absorbed by the legislative power. All this results from the very nature of legislative power, which, whether it resides in the whole community or is delegated by that community to a particular body, is without practical limitation other than that provided for in the constitution of the society. And herein, sir, consists the great and essential difference between the constitution of a State and the constitution of the Federal Government. The first has all the powers that are not prohibited, the latter has no powers but those which are granted. The principle is all-important in the construction of the two instruments. The Federal Government is one of enumerated powers. There is no general delegation of the whole legislative power of the community, restrained merely by exceptions and limitations; but the delegation is of "all legislative powers therein granted." It is true that the same language might be used in a State constitution, and, in such case, would require the same construction. But when, as in the case of the constitution of Michigan, it is declared that "the legislative power shall be vested in a Senate and House of Representatives," it is the legislative power of the whole community, and has no practical limitation but what is to be found in other parts of the constitution. I mean, of course, as a rule of construction growing out of its own provisions. There is, also, as respects the States of this Union, another limitation, namely, the constitution of the United States. But the principle is the same, for the constitution the United States, having received the assent of the same people, may be considered as incorporated with, and forming, for the purpose of construction, a part of the State constitution, in the limitations it imposes on the exercise of State sovereignty. As it appears, then, that the object of calling a convention in Michigan was not to amend or alter the constitution, but to give its assent to what the legislative power might itself have assented to, namely, the enlargement of its territory, it follows that the power to call such a convention is a mere act of ordinary legislation, and the duty having been imposed by Congress to do so, it was the business and right of the Legislature of that State to perform that duty. It was the duty and right of the Legislature of Michigan to call the convention, because the people of Michigan, when they formed their constitution, declared that the Legislature alone should possess the right of expressing and binding the public will in matters of ordinary legislation. Upon the question whether a convention should be called, the time and place of its assembling, the mode of its election, the qualification of its electors, no portion of the community had the right to dictate to any other portion; nor could the will of the community be ascertained on those points in any other mode than that agreed upon in the constitution. And why, sir? Because the people of Michigan had previously agreed, each man with each and every other, when they adopted their constitution, that the Legislature should be the exponents of the public will in such a case. That any portion of the community, be it great or small, should call itself the people, and affect to express and bind the public will, under such circumstances, is a fraud upon the rights of every man in it, and a gross and manifest infraction of the social compact into which he entered when he agreed, with others, to form a sovereign State, and delegate the legislative power to a particular body. I say, then, sir, without the fear of contradiction, that when the people themselves, who cannot act in mass, delegate to their representatives, by their constitution, the legislative power of the community, each and every man of them parts with the right to express and bind the public will in any other mode than through their Legislature, in relation to matters falling within the scope of that power. Such is the compact, and it is they themselves who establish it.

The case of revolution has been appealed to as establishing and illustrating the right of the people to alter or modify their Government, and control, by voluntary meetings, the will of the community. Nobody, sir, doubts that where, in the language of the declaration of independence, "any form of government becomes destructive of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, the people have a right to alter or abolish it." But is it not an insult to the understanding of any man to cite such an authority as a warrant for the proceedings in Michigan? Is it not the very point of the objection which is made to the present bill, that the principle involved in it is revolutionary, while it professes to be an act of regular government? Does the case of Michigan present one in which the people, laboring under grievous oppression upon the part of their Government, which, in its form and practice, is destructive of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, are seeking to alter or abolish that form of government? No, sir. The question simply is, whether portions of the people of that State, having a regular Government, in which is vested the legislative power, have the right, by assembling in voluntary meetings, to call a convention empowered to bind the State in a time of profound peace, and as a measure of regular government. To state the question correctly is to refute it. And yet, sir, we have had an appeal made to the sacred right of revolution; and we who oppose the measure have been taunted as being opposed to the fundamental rights of the people, and to the principles of our great Revolution. We have had an effusion of the wildest and most incoherent notions of popular liberty, and our principles denounced as those of the Stuarts and of the Bourbons. And what, sir, after all, is the position for which we contend? It is, that voluntary meetings of citizens, which may be nothing more than the proceedings of a few turbulent demagogues, have not authority, in a time of peace, and as a measure of regular government, to call a convention, which shall possess the sovereign authority, and be capable of binding the whole community. The converse of this proposition, I say, sir, is the principle involved in the case before us, and against which I shall contend at all times, and under all circumstances. The case of revolution supposes an end to all regular government, and its illustrations and its arguments have nothing to do with the one before us. And now, sir, we are called upon, here, here in the Senate of the United States, to sanction a principle which would be subversive of all regular government, and that, too, at a time when a spirit of misrule is abroad, when the country is full of scenes of personal violence, and we have seen men in a neighboring State insensible to the ties of social duty, willing to break down the whole social edifice, to subvert the entire Government, in order to accomplish a mere party purpose. It may be asked why Congress required the assent of a convention, since it had the power to establish the boundaries by its own authority. The answer would seem to be that, as the constitution presented by Michigan, and the desire to be admitted into the Union as a State, purported to proceed merely from the inhabitants of the peninsula, and as Congress did not think proper to grant the request that the peninsula alone should constitute a State, but added both population and territory, it became a matter of propriety to refer the subject back again to the people, to ascertain whether, under these circumstances, they still desired to become a sovereign State, and, as such, a member of this Union. But that is not now the question; the bill before us supposes that the provision was right, and affirms it to be true that the condition has been complied with. Is this true? What makes the matter still worse is, that the first convention called by the legislative authority expressly refused its assent, and we are now called upon to say that the second convention, assembled under the authority of voluntary meetings of citizens in some of the counties, was a legal convention, capable of binding the State, and that the assent has been given which is required by the act. The resolution of the 26th January, 1836, referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] can have no bearing whatever on the present question, as indicative of the opinion of the Senate in relation to the power of the Legislature, since, at that time, there was clearly no legal authority on the part of Michigan to establish a State Government; but the act of the 15th of June, 1836, altered the case, by accepting, ratifying, and confirming, the constitution and State Government, and thus giving to both a legal existence.

In the view which I have taken of this matter, numbers are nothing. But it is contended that there were more votes given in favor of a convention at the elections held under the authority of the voluntary meetings than were given both for and against the former convention. And what does this prove? Might there not have been a great number of illegal votes given at the second election, when there was no authority of law for the government of those who undertook to conduct it? But as to the fact, which is paraded as a matter of moment, that there were at least eight thousand votes given for the second convention, does that prove, with reference to the mere weight of numbers, supposing that none voted but those who had a right to do so, that the people of the State, or a majority of the people, desired that a convention should be called, and were in favor of giving the assent required by the act of Congress? Far from it, sir. Upon turning to the census which was taken in the year 1834, it will be found that there was, in that year, in the peninsula of Michigan, a population of 87,273 souls, of whom there were upwards of 22,000 free white males above the age of twenty years, so that there must have been, at that time, at least twenty thousand voters. At the present time it is probable that there are at least thirty thousand voters; and yet eight thousand votes given without authority of law, and without the certainty that they were those of persons who had a right to vote at all, are here represented to be the voice of the people; and it is seriously contended that they had a right to elect a convention representing the sovereignty of the State, and capable of binding the whole community. This very case is itself the strongest proof of the danger and folly of departing from the true principles of the social system, and attempting to introduce and establish any other standard of the public will than that which the people themselves, in the formation of their constitution, have declared shall be the exponent of that will, namely, the legislative power. In the one case, which is that of the regular action of Government, there can be no danger; and the people, having it always in their power to change their representatives, may secure a faithful assertion of their will; but in the other, which concedes to a portion of the people the right, by voluntary assemblies, to call and elect a convention capable of controlling the whole community, the very end of all government is defeated, by giving to the strong and the crafty the means of controlling the weak and the timid without their consent; and while their proceedings boldly and insolently assume the form and the tone of public sentiment, they may in truth be nothing more than the machinations of designing demagogues, and prove in the end the worst species of tyranny. What, then, it may be asked, is to be done? There are two courses, either of which may be taken, and with either of which I shall be content. The one is to leave the matter to the further action of the State of Michigan. Let the Legislature of that State call another convention, and then, if it be true that the majority of the people are now in favor of coming into the Union upon the proposed terms, there cannot be a doubt but the required assent will be given. This course will require a little delay, but that will be attended with no material inconvenience. The other is to repeal the third section of the act of June 15, 1836, which imposes the condition, and admit her at once. I have no apprehension of difficulty on the score of boundaries, having the most perfect conviction of the power of Congress to settle them, and that has been done by the express provisions of the act. But, sir, it will not do to pass this act, either with or without the preamble, unless in the latter case the third section of the act of June be repealed, because that provision still subsisting, to admit under the present circumstances would imply that Congress was satisfied that the condition had been fulfilled. This, sir, would be virtually to recognise and sanction the doctrine against which we contend, and which, if established, would in the end subvert all regular government; and which, while it preserved the form of republican institutions, and affected to be based on the principle of popular rights and popular liberty, would involve in its practice the most odious tyranny.

Mr. BROWN said it had not been his intention to participate in the debate which had arisen on the question then under consideration; but some doctrines had been advanced in its progress which challenged their most serious consideration, and which he, as a member of that body, would not permit to pass without giving utterance to the sentiments of strong disapprobation with which they had been heard by him. He almost despaired, after the eloquent display of the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who had just taken his seat, of saying any thing that would interest them, or of being able, in the course of his remarks, to gain that attention which that gentleman had so justly merited, as well from the matter as the manner of his address.

The admission of Michigan as a member of the Union had (said Mr. B.) been resisted mainly by those who oppose it on the ground that she is, at this time, a sovereign State, and that the convention which assembled in December last, and gave its assent to the terms proposed by the act of the last session of Congress, was not called into being by a law of the Legislature of Michigan, and is therefore to be considered as irregular and revolutionary in its nature, by assuming to act without such authority. He thought it required but a very slight examination of the subject for them to arrive at the conclusion that, on all questions of legislation by Congress touching her condition, she is to be contemplated and regarded as a Territory, and not as a State. Not having complied with the terms of the act of Congress passed at the last session for her admission into the Union, she is not a confederate State. If she exists, then, as a State at all, it must be in the character of a foreign and independent sovereignty. To maintain a doctrine so absurd as this was, and so utterly subversive of the authority of the General Government over its territory, its advocates must, of necessity, be driven to admit the right of the people of a Territory to throw off the power of the General Government without its consent, and to establish an independent Government at their own will and pleasure. Whether a State may rightfully secede from the Union or not, is a question about which the ablest statesmen have differed; but that a Territory, having in itself no sovereignty, may rightfully withdraw from the authority of the Federal Government, (unless by that right acquired by successful revolution,) is a proposition so disorganizing in its tendency as to find scarcely a single advocate. It is true that Michigan has, for some time past, exercised the powers of a State, preparatory to her admission into the Union, which were simply permissive, and not by virtue of any rights she had as a State, independent of the authority of the General Government. She is, then, for all practical purposes, to be regarded in our legislation as still remaining in her territorial condition. If this opinion be correct, then the sanctuary of State rights, for which so many apprehensions have been expressed, will not be invaded by our recognising the acts of the late convention, giving the assent of the people of Michigan to the terms proposed by the act of Congress. The honorable Senator from Delaware had argued to show that the legislative branch of a Government was to be regarded as the depository of the public will, and that in the States all power not prohibited by their constitutions might be exercised by their Legislatures; and deduces, as a consequence from the principles which he contended for, that the assembling of a convention in Michigan, without authority from her Legislature, was irregular and of revolutionary tendency. This doctrine (said Mr. B.) was, in his opinion, radically wrong, and had led to many of the erroneous conclusions which had characterized the present discussion. The legislative branch of a State Government was to be considered the depository of the public will of the people, represented by it only for certain purposes, and to the extent of the powers conferred on it by the constitution under which it acted. All other powers resided in the great body of the people, in which exists the ultimate authority and sovereignty of a State. The constituted authorities of a State, no, not even a convention itself, possess no inherent power of sovereignty, and each are but the mere agents of the people, who constitute the sovereignty. It is therefore derogating rather too much from this power of the people of a State to claim for their Legislature the right to direct them when and how they shall proceed to assemble in convention. It strips the sovereign power of one of its highest and most powerful attributes, and leaves it at the will of the agent created by it to decide when it may rightfully exercise that power. In some of the States the power is expressly given to their Legislatures to decide when a convention shall be called, and to provide for the manner of calling the same. This, of course, is a restriction by the people of those States, imposed by themselves, on their original right to assemble in convention through the instrumentality of primary assemblies, and which they are constitutionally bound to observe. But no such restriction can be alleged as existing in the constitution of Michigan, to prevent her people from assembling in convention spontaneously, for the purpose of expressing her willingness to come into the Union on the terms proposed by Congress. Her constitution points out the manner in which future amendments to that instrument are to be made; but no mode is prescribed by it as to the manner in which her people are to assemble in convention for the purpose of being admitted into the Union as a State. As her people never have conferred on any of her public functionaries this power, it, of course, remains among them, as belonging to that class of residuary powers with which she has never parted. If, sir, (said Mr. B.,) this reasoning be correct, the people of Michigan have rightfully exercised the power of calling a convention through their primary assemblies—a right consecrated by the principles of the Revolution, and from the exercise of which some of the oldest, if not the wisest, State constitutions had sprung into existence. In determining this question, he thought it their duty, as statesmen, to disencumber it of mere questions of form, and to ascertain substantially what was the will of the people of Michigan in reference to their admission into the Union. All the facts before them went to prove, most conclusively, that it was not only the will of a majority of them to obtain admission into the Union, but that there was almost entire unanimity of sentiment among her citizens in favor of it. Had a single remonstrance been presented from any part of that Territory against the proceedings of her convention? No, not a single voice had been heard from that quarter opposed to it. Her citizens, therefore, could not feel otherwise than greatly indebted to those who had come forward as her guardians here to protect her from the dire calamities of being admitted to a participation of the benefits of our happy Union! For himself, he had always been taught to consider it as a measure of no ordinary advantage to the people of a Territory to be raised from a state of territorial dependence to the elevated condition of a sovereign State of our confederacy. If we were about to do an act which might operate to restrain the privileges of her people, then it would behoove us to construe strictly the powers under which we act. While the rule of construction which he had just laid down was applicable to such a case as the one adverted to, the opposite rule of giving a liberal interpretation to our powers was equally obligatory where the object was to enlarge the privileges of the citizen. In other words, he considered it to be not only a safe rule in practice, but one demanded by our free institutions, in deciding on questions in which the rights of the citizen are involved, whether in courts of justice or legislative bodies, to give a construction to the power under which they act that will rather favor than abridge the rights.

Mr. B. said that the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] and his honorable coadjutor from Ohio, [Mr. MORRIS,] had expressed great horror at the proceedings of the convention in Michigan, and, coupling them with some other proceedings which have lately occurred in several of the States, have denounced each in no very measured terms. They think they see, in what they have chosen to characterize as tumultuary assemblages of the people, the overthrow of law and order, and the prostration of all regular government. The Senator from Ohio told us that he had heard here many very extraordinary things in the course of this debate; and he (Mr. B.) would take leave to add that the Senator had also said some very extraordinary things in the course of the observations which he had made. He did not himself entertain the same fears of the great body of the people which seemed so much to excite the alarms of some honorable gentlemen. On the contrary, it had been proven, not only by experience in this country, but in almost every other civilized nation, that the great body of the people are, in most instances, more inclined to acquiesce in wrongs than to resist them; and that, in nine times out of ten, when driven to physical resistance, it is because every other means of redress have failed. The doctrines which had been advanced were identical with those in which had originated the alien and sedition laws.

The federal party of that day, as now, (though under a different name at the present day,) believed, or affected to believe, that popular liberty would degenerate into licentiousness, and prove incompatible with the existence of regular government. In this distrust and jealousy of the great body of the people, by the federal party, originated that celebrated law. Although its authors had long since been expelled from power, and their doctrines stamped with public reprobation, the same spirit yet existed, and he regretted that it had made its appearance again in this debate. It was but the revival of the exploded heresies of that day, brought forward under new auspices, and under new party names. The party of that day, as their disciples now do, arrogated to themselves all the intelligence and wisdom of the country, and expressed all the apprehensions from popular violence to our institutions that we now hear. When the famous judiciary law, passed by the federal party in the last moments of their expiring authority, was about to be repealed under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, the same fears were expressed which we now hear, that constitutional liberty would fall a victim to popular violence. The people did repeal the law, through their representatives, and yet the country had continued to enjoy all the rights secured to it by the constitution, and none of the evils predicted had been realized. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) to those who are in the habit of speaking disparagingly of the intelligence of the great body of the people, it is sufficient to point them to the condition of the country to disprove the charge. It is to that public intelligence that we are indebted for what it is. It is under the guidance of that public will that it has attained its present unexampled prosperity. In instituting a comparison between that public intelligence which is so often derided and the political wisdom of that party who underrates it, a marked superiority must be acknowledged as due to the former. On the one hand, the party claiming a monopoly of all the wisdom of the country, as numerous instances attest in our history as a nation, have often attempted to ingraft on our institutions principles hostile to our form of government; while, on the other, the patriotism and intelligence of the American people have constantly interposed to preserve them in every great emergency. What, he would ask, would have been the condition of our country, in all probability, at this day, if its political destinies had been continued in the keeping of that party who, in their own imagination, have all the sagacious statesmen, and are almost exclusively endowed by Providence with the gifts of intellectual greatness? Let the systematic efforts made by their leading statesmen, when in power, to introduce a system of administration into our Government, modelled on the plan of the English monarchy, answer. Let the fate of those countries in which the energy of the popular will had been broken down by the ascendancy of titled orders answer. From the picture of what it most probably would have been under such auspices, the friends of republican government were cheered and animated in contemplating what it is under the safer and wiser auspices of that general intelligence which, united, forms the public will.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] has expressed, in strong terms, his abhorrence of the doctrine contained in a letter lately published in the newspapers of the United States, and written by a distinguished gentleman, recently a member of this body. He had characterized them as disorganizing and of revolutionary tendency. In this he has been followed, much in the same strain, by the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] Mr. B. could not but feel some surprise at their course in bringing into discussion questions having no bearing on proceedings here, and such as were connected alone with the domestic strifes of the States in which they had originated. He felt more especially surprised that gentlemen professing such a sacred regard for, and claiming, as some of them seemed to do, almost the exclusive guardianship of State rights, should be found invading the limits of Pennsylvania and Maryland, for the purpose of mingling in controversies which they were in no way called on to decide. He must be permitted to say that their course on this occasion was but a poor practical commentary on their doctrines. In the remarks which he should make on this subject, he but followed the example which had been set him. The gauntlet had been thrown down, and he, for one, was ready to join issue with gentlemen on the important question raised in the letter which had been so strongly denounced. He had the pleasure not only of a personal acquaintance with Mr. Dallas, the writer of the letter, but he flattered himself that he also enjoyed a portion of his personal friendship. Little could he have supposed that a gentleman universally respected for his mild and urbane manners in private life, and distinguished for wise and prudent deliberation as a statesman, would have been held up, here or elsewhere, as a revolutionist. Had it come to this: that a citizen of this republic could not express an opinion in favor of the right of the people of a State to abolish a bank charter, acting through a convention, in their sovereign capacity, without subjecting himself to the charge of aiding to produce a revolution? Were bank corporations to be considered as embodying in themselves the sovereign authority of the State, that it was thus dangerous to call in question their rights to existence, independent of the will of the people, whose legislative agents had created them? Gentlemen who entertain such exalted opinions of their attributes, he would say, carried their reverence much further than he could agree to do. They were opinions better suited, he would say, to the subjects of arbitrary Governments than to the citizens of a free republic.

Mr. B., without undertaking to defend all the arguments contained in this much-denounced letter, some of which he did not then recollect, not having the letter before him, would take occasion very explicitly to declare his hearty and entire concurrence in the main conclusion drawn from them. That conclusion asserted the right of the people of Pennsylvania, acting through a convention, in their sovereign capacity, to annul and abrogate the charter lately granted by the Legislature of that State to the Bank of the United States, for the term of thirty years. He well knew the ingenious subterfuge by which professional astutenes had sought to escape from the force of this, to his mind, plainly-established conclusion, by endeavoring to take shelter under that part of the constitution of the United States which declares that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." To maintain that bank charters are "contracts," and thus to draw them within the meaning of that term, as employed in the constitution of the United States, the advocates of the doctrine that they are irrevocable by any authority have been driven to advance subtleties and refinements better suited to that age of ecclesiastical ingenuity in which the statutes of mortmain were sought to be evaded by that order of men, to perpetuate their ascendancy, than to the present day of enlightened constitutional freedom. He did not believe that any of the eminent writers on law in England, in defining the nature and powers of corporations, had ever considered their charters in the nature of contracts between the sovereign authority granting them and the individuals of which they were composed. On the contrary, they had been uniformly treated by them as artificial bodies, to whom certain privileges and franchises are granted, for the purpose of doing that which they could not do in their individual capacities. Nor did he believe that any authority could be found among the American law writers, previous to the adoption of the present federal constitution, which maintained the doctrine that bank charters granted by the States were in the nature of contracts between the States and the individuals to whom they were granted. The universally received opinion before, that they were mere privileges or franchises, granted by the State or sovereign, is a most conclusive proof to show that the modern invention of the doctrine that they are contracts is an afterthought, a mere device, intended, by a change of phrases, to suit the case to the terms of the constitution, and to bring it to bear against State authority, in favor of the perpetuity of corporations. Mr. B. said, to his mind, the doctrine that a State, in its high and sovereign capacity, was absolutely impotent to rid itself of a great moneyed corporation, chartered for a term of thirty years, was a monstrous heresy, and, in his judgment, better suited to the notions of popular rights which prevailed in the arbitrary reign of the Stuarts, or to those of the Polignacs of France, than to an American statesman. No matter how absolutely certain they may be that such an institution may insinuate its power into every part of their State, and, when firmly fixed, prove utterly destructive to their liberties, yet, according to this doctrine, they have no power to relieve themselves, and their condition is irremediable, save only what is to be accomplished by the tardy efflux of time. In other words, it draws after it the startling consequence, that the mere temporary agents of the people, appointed to legislate for them, may contract away the rights of the supreme power of the State, and that supreme power, no matter how improvident the act, no matter how ruinous in its consequences, no matter how much in opposition to the public will, yet submission to it, without the hope of peaceable redress, is to be their unalterable doom! If this can be done for thirty years, why not for five hundred? If for five hundred, why not in perpetuity? Such are the absurd consequences into which the advocates of this doctrine are inevitably driven; a doctrine the practical effect of which is to put aside the will of the supreme authority of a State, and to substitute in its place a Government of corporations! Nothing, he said, appeared to his mind more strikingly preposterous than the idea that a State, which may change or abolish its fundamental law at pleasure, which may pull down and reconstruct, in such way as it chooses, the legislative, executive, or judiciary departments of its Government, cannot exercise the power of abolishing a charter created by an act of its Legislature. It has often been contended that a judge appointed during good behaviour held his office in the nature of a contract between himself and the State, he, on his part, undertaking to perform certain duties in consideration of a fixed salary, to be paid by the State; yet few, if any, had been bold enough, in any of the States, to deny that a convention of the people could abolish the office, if it was their pleasure to do so. If they possessed the power to do the one, which power had been in many instances exercised in different States, it seemed to follow, as a necessary consequence, that they were competent to do the other.

Mr. B. said, conceding for a moment to the advocates of this doctrine, that privileges granted to banking corporations were in the nature of contracts, yet he contended that it was of the very essence of those contracts, and an implied condition which entered into them when made, that the people in their sovereign capacity could dissolve them when they saw fit so to do. This original right of the people of a State to judge of and abolish such measures as they may deem destructive of their liberties or happiness, is a principle which lies at the root of popular institutions; and, if surrendered, converts the Government of a State substantially into an oligarchy. If this doctrine were once established, then the citizens of a State, under our confederacy, would be, in that respect, in an infinitely worse condition than the subjects of the English monarchy. There the Parliament may dissolve corporations, in virtue of its legislative power; when, in its opinion, they are of mischievous tendency in respect to the public interests. And yet in no country on earth had the doctrine in favor of vested rights been carried further than in that. There the subject may be relieved, by the power of Parliament, from the burden of a corporation deemed ruinous to the public interests; but here the citizen, according to this modern doctrine, can find no relief, not even in a convention of the people.

No, one, he said, entertained a more sacred regard for the rights of private property than himself. It was the imperative duty of Government to protect it against either fraud or violence. The power contended for, to revoke charters, involved no such consequence. An act granting charters of incorporation was not a grant of property to the corporations, but simply a grant of privilege. Its repeal did not take from them their money or other property, but took from them merely the privilege to use it in a corporate capacity. It was undoubtedly the duty of the State to restore, in such events, whatever sum of money may have been paid it for such privilege.

While he felt the most sacred regard for the rights of private property, and believed that in no country was it more secure than in this, yet he could not but express his strong repugnance to the extravagant and alarming claims set up in behalf of individuals holding official stations, and in behalf of chartered companies, under the plea of vested rights. If the extravagant extent which is contended for it of late is acquiesced in, it was quite clear to his mind that the people, under this ingenious device, would soon be divested of the greater portion of their rights. In proportion as the wealth of the country increased, the advocates of this doctrine were becoming more and more emboldened in their claims to power. Doctrines scarcely ventured to be hinted at some years ago are now openly asserted, and those who consider it their duty to oppose them are denounced with overweening insolence as disorganizers and revolutionists. It is but an exhibition here of the same spirit that is to be found making war against popular rights on the other side of the Atlantic. It is the same spirit here, advocating the extension of the doctrine of vested rights, that is heard raising its voice there in behalf of prescriptive rights, established church, and titled orders. An alarm is attempted to be gotten up by the advocates of these extraordinary doctrines, (said Mr. B.,) by raising the cry that the rights of property are in danger. How, he would ask, and by whom, are they endangered? The great body of the agricultural community are infinitely more interested in the value and amount of property owned throughout the country, than all the stockjobbers and moneyed corporations put together. The great body of the people are therefore, at least, as much concerned in preserving law, order, and the rights of property, as those who vainly imagine that they themselves constitute the country. If there be any class of revolutionists in this country, it is not those who stand up in behalf of its ancient rights, against the new claims to power set up under the plea of vested rights, but they are the practical revolutionists who endeavor to subject the Government of the people to a Government of corporations.

The remedy proposed by Mr. Dallas was in strict accordance with law and order. It was neither revolutionary in its principles, nor did it in the remotest degree resemble nullification. It did not maintain that a convention, in deciding on the powers of corporations, would execute its own decisions, independent of all other authority. On the contrary, it expressly looked to and acknowledged the Supreme Court of the United States as the tribunal possessing competent power to settle and adjudicate the case which might arise out of this question. This much, Mr. B. said, he had deemed his duty to say, in defence of principles that he considered of vital importance, not to one State alone, but to all, and in defence of an absent gentleman, whose opinions he thought had been most uncourtously and unwarrantably assailed on that floor. He had too much respect for himself, as well as the State of Pennsylvania, to volunteer any opinion of his as to the course she ought to pursue. He had only argued to show what power a State might exercise rightfully in such a case; he had not expressed an opinion as to what she ought to do.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] and most of those who had followed him on the same side in this debate, after characterizing the proceeding which he had just reviewed as revolutionary and disorganizing, and likely to lead to the overthrow of regular government, endeavored to trace back the causes to the doctrines of the party friendly to the present administration, and to hold them accountable to the country for the consequences. Mr. B. said that he must be permitted to say that lectures from that quarter on law and order came with no very good grace. From whom, he would ask, were the friends of the administration to be now instructed in the propriety of good government, and the necessity of maintaining law and order? If he mistook not, some of the same gentlemen now kindly proffering this instruction took upon themselves the character of political missionaries in the memorable panic session; and, leaving their seats in this chamber, were heard in the cities of Philadelphia and Baltimore, encouraging popular assemblies to open resistance to the constituted authorities of the country, by the most impassioned appeals to their feelings. It was on those occasions that the Chief Magistrate of the nation was denounced as a "usurper" and "lawless tyrant." It was on those occasions that it was declared that there were no "Sabbaths in revolutions," and the constituted authorities held up more as objects fit for public vengeance, than deserving respect and obedience. He congratulated gentlemen on their recovery of notions more favorable to regular government and good order, and trusted that the change would not prove of momentary duration, but permanent. He, however, must protest, for one, against instructions from that quarter, either as to the one or the other.

Mr. B., in conclusion, begged pardon of the Senate for having digressed, in the course of his remarks, into the discussion of questions not strictly relevant to the subject before them. The introduction of these topics by gentlemen on the other side of the question, and the important bearing they had sought to give them, would, he trusted, furnish his apology, and acquit him and his friends of having on this occasion gratuitously introduced them.

Mr. NILES said that he hoped the Senate would not be alarmed at his rising, as he had no intention of going into a general discussion of the subject before the Senate, which, he had reason to suppose, was tired of the debate, and anxious for the question. It was not his purpose to detain the Senate by any regular argument, even upon what appeared to him to be the real question before them, and much less to discuss the numerous topics which had been drawn into the debate. Of the politics of Pennsylvania, or Maryland, he had no wish to speak; his only object was to submit a few remarks on one point, somewhat connected with the subject before the Senate, and which involved a fundamental principle in our institutions. Mr. N. said he had witnessed the course this debate had taken with some surprise; great principles had been drawn into discussion, not necessarily belonging to the subject, and sentiments expressed, and doctrines maintained, which he had heard with no small degree of astonishment and regret; he could hardly realize that he was in the American Senate, and at this enlightened period when the principles of free Governments were supposed to be well understood and well settled. In view of what he had witnessed in this debate, he felt it his duty to allude to a fact which, whether agreeable to hear or not, he believed ought not to be entirely overlooked. Sir, said Mr. N., for some years past the American Senate, the most important branch of this Government, a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, and possessing a portion of the executive and judicial authority, has not enjoyed the confidence of the people of the United States; and he feared, greatly feared, that what had taken place on the bill before us was not calculated to increase or strengthen the public confidence. Are we to be told that the people have decided inconsiderately, rashly, and unjustly? This will not do. Unless he was entirely mistaken, the principles which had been asserted, and the doctrines that had been so strenuously maintained, would be received with some astonishment by the people of this country.

The question before the Senate he regarded a very simple one; it was really a question of fact; merely, whether the condition of the act of Congress of last session, providing for the admission of Michigan into the Union, had been complied with. In considering this question, gentlemen had gone into the first principles of government, and made what he regarded a bold attack on popular power, on the fundamental principle of popular sovereignty, which lies at the foundation of all our institutions. These doctrines were rather antiquated; they belonged to the school of the restoration in England, and the political writings of Sir Robert Filmore; they were the present doctrines of the conservatives in all the Governments in Europe, of the advocates of arbitrary power, and of existing abuses, however flagrant. But in this country it was not necessary to trace them so far; it was not necessary to go back beyond the memorable period of '98; they were the doctrines of that day, of the period in our political history which has been appropriately called the "reign of terror." Is it supposed that the principles and spirit of '98 and '99 can be revived? Is it supposed that, instead of having advanced, we have retrograded in political intelligence, and in a just understanding of the principles of free government?

What were the doctrines of that day—the doctrines to which the alien and sedition laws, and other kindred measures, owed their origin? He would refer the gentlemen to them, and the speeches by which they were attempted to be maintained. The speeches we have heard are of the same character, maintaining the same principles and breathing the same spirit; but it will be no disparagement to any one who has taken part in this debate to say, that the heresies of that day have not been defended with more spirit or ability now than they were then. Then their advocates were able, experienced, talented, distinguished, and illustrious men; one of them bearing an intimate relation to the Senator from Delaware. They put forth their whole strength, and staked their all, politically—the ascendancy of their party and their individual prospects—on the support of the same doctrines we have heard mentioned on these occasions. But they failed, and the cause of democracy triumphed.

And what were those doctrines? They were, that the people could not be trusted; that they were their own worst enemies; that all the disorders, real or imaginary, that prevailed, were attributable to a wild spirit of democracy—to popular phrensy. An honest but fearless expression of opinion, concerning men and measures, was denounced as a spirit of insubordination, disorganization, and rank jacobinism. A distinguished leader of that party, now no more, belonging to a neighboring State to his own, a gifted son of genius, a brilliant star in the constellation of that day, whose impassioned, fervid, and glowing eloquence has never been surpassed in the halls of Congress, declared what were the evils and the remedy. I allude, (said Mr. N.,) to Fisher Ames. He declared that the disease which threatened general and universal ruin to our institutions and our future prospects was rooted deep; that it had found its way into the very hearts of the people. This disease was democracy; it was the will and sovereignty of the people. "It was not that the skin was blistered, but their very bones were carious." Yes, the people were corrupt, even to their bones. In his fertile and vivid imagination, he conjured up and predicted greater evils for his country, which were to flow from this wild spirit of democracy, than have been portrayed on the present occasion. His country was to be visited with all the horrors of the French revolution; anarchy, confusion and bloodshed, were to desolate the land; and, in the federal visions of that day, the ghosts of Robespierre, Danton, and Marat, were seen flitting through our atmosphere. The disease of that period was democracy; the people were said to be rising up to overthrow the Government, and destroy those noble institutions which they themselves had established. And it was the aim of those in authority to put down that wild spirit of democracy by the strong arm of power, and to maintain their authority, not through the public will, and as an emanation from it, but in opposition to it—in defiance of it. It was for this purpose that the alien and sedition laws were passed. And why is it (said Mr. N.) that these laws, and particularly the latter, have become a stench in the nostrils of the people; that for nearly forty years they have borne the stamp of universal reprobation upon their face—the deep and indelible stamp of infamy, which will go down to the latest posterity, or as long as there is a single spark of liberty in the hearts of the American people? Is the execration in which those laws are held to be charged to their being unconstitutional?—Far from it. A large portion of the legislation of Congress has been charged with being in violation of the constitution; and the alien and sedition acts were declared to be constitutional, not only by Congress, but by the Executive and Judiciary. No; the infamy which has attached to those obnoxious acts did not proceed from their being unconstitutional, whether they are so or not. The people do not form opinions so unreasonably or unjustly. We must look for the cause of opprobrium to a different source—the true character and design of those laws. They were regarded as a premeditated and high-handed attack upon popular power; a deadly blow at the sovereignty of the people; a bold and daring attempt to overthrow the public will, to put down the popular opinion, and to rule the country regardless of it. They were considered as an attempt to change the very element of the Government, which is founded on public opinion, and convert it into a Government of force.

But that great scheme failed; and are its exploded, reprobated doctrines now to be revived? Are we now to be told that there is no political power remaining in the people? that, having established and put in operation Governments, they have parted with all political power whatever; that they cannot revise or new-model this form of government they have themselves established, unless in pursuance of a provision in the constitution, or in accordance with a law of the Legislature? This is maintaining that sovereignty resides in the constituted authorities, and not in the people at large; it is raising the creature above his creator, the agent above the principal. It is exalting the Legislature above, and making it independent of, the constituent body.

The constitutions of most of the States contain some provision for altering or amending them; some through the agency of a convention, and some otherwise. But such constitutional provision is not inconsistent with and cannot take away the right and power of the people, acting in their primarily original capacity, to change their system of government. This is a right which they have not delegated, and which, of course, must abide with the people at large. Conventions of the people may be called, and often are, in pursuance of a law of the Legislature; yet this is a mere matter of convenience. But does the law confer on them their power? That is the question. If it does, then a Legislature can grant to another body greater power than it possesses itself; even the power to change or destroy those very forms under which it exists; a power to destroy the Legislature itself. This is preposterous, and shows the absurdity of the principle contended for. If a convention does not derive its power from the Legislature, from whence can it derive it, except from the people? What is a convention? Is it not a body representing the people in their primary, elementary capacity, and wholly independent of the Legislature and constituted authorities? If this is not a true idea of a convention of the people, he should like to be informed what a convention is. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PIERCE] asks, who and what are the people? He was surprised at such an inquiry from any quarter, and still more that it should come from one who has had so much to do with conventions, and attempts to call forth the latent energies of State rights and popular power. He did not understand the Senator's answer to his own question, further than his declaration that he himself [Mr. P.] was one of the people. The inquiry, however, was, he thought, easily answered. The people, in one sense, are the whole population of a State; but in a political sense, the people were that portion of the population which possessed the political power in a State: it did not mean women nor children, but the whole body of citizens with whom the political power of a State resided.

He believed this to be the true theory of our Government; and he deemed it of the utmost importance that first principles should not be perverted. Is there any danger from this theory, which recognises the sovereign power as abiding in the people at large? On this point our judgment was not left without a guide, or forced to rest on arguments only. The State Governments had been in operation sixty years, and the Federal Union nearly half a century, which had shed a flood of light on the principles and tendencies of free institutions. Are we to shut our eyes against their influence, and still grope our way in the dark? Is the question settled, or is it yet in controversy, whether the people are safe depositories of power? On this question he would appeal to the experience of the last fifty years. Is the danger on the side of the people, or on the side of their political agents? Is power more dangerous with the many, or in the hands of the few? He would appeal to the history of the country the last half century to settle these questions. Are we to heed every false cry of alarm? One says, Lo! here is danger! Another says, Lo! there is danger! But what says experience? He who gives a wrong direction to the public mind, in regard to the source from whence danger is to be apprehended, does a real injury to the cause of freedom. From whence have come the evils which have existed, and the dangers that have threatened us? Have they sprung from the people, or from the abuse of the power and confidence intrusted to their agents, the constituted authorities, which we have just been told were the only safe depositories of power? Sir, said Mr. N., there have been periods of danger to our institutions, if not to the liberties of the country—periods of doubt, darkness, and gloom; when clouds springing up in the East, which spread until their length and breadth darkened our whole horizon, and charged with gathering and fearful thunderbolts, which threatened to burst upon our country with desolating fury. We have heard much in this debate of conventions of the people, of the Baltimore convention, of caucuses, and of the danger of these popular movements; but we have heard nothing of conventions not originating with the people; we have heard nothing of the Hartford convention. Sir, whatever may have been the guilt or the danger of that convention, and he believed there was much of both, it did not spring from the people, but from the Legislatures, the constituted authorities, those only safe depositories of power, of four or five States of this Union, where the people are distinguished for their sober, moral, and religious character. Shall we be told that the people approved and encouraged these proceedings? This, he knew, had been said; but the whole truth should be told. So far as the people did participate, they were stimulated and goaded on by their leaders, who composed the constituted authorities. Their passions were inflamed, their fears aroused, their cupidity stimulated, their prejudices appealed to, and every art and artifice resorted to, aided by a formidable array of talents, wealth, and official station, to deceive, mislead, and hurry along the people into their violent and factious measures. The people were not to blame; the guilt, be it more or less, must rest on the heads of those who deceived and betrayed them. Sir, it was the people, a minority of the people, who, more than any other cause, arrested these rash and dangerous measures, moderated their violence, and checked their excesses. During that dark and gloomy period of the late war, that bold and honest minority (despised, insulted, and abused as it was) breasted the storm of faction at home, rallied around your Government here, and strengthened the arm of power, when weakened by wide-spread disaffection and frightful dissensions. He was proud to say that he was one of that minority.

Sir, (said Mr. N.,) at a more recent period there have been clouds in another quarter, which have lowered over us, portending evil to the republic. There have been disorders and conventions at the South; conventions originating from the State authorities, those safe depositories of power. He might speak of the character and danger of those proceedings, but he forbore. The bare allusion to them answered his purpose. He could speak with more freedom of transactions in his own section of the Union.

The doctrine which he was combating was at war with the great principles of the glorious American Revolution; and, if true, these States ought still to be colonies, and all of us subjects of Great Britain. He knew that was regarded as a revolutionary movement, but it was a revolution founded on the great principle of the right of the people to "throw off the forms to which they had been accustomed, and to provide new guards for their security"—the right to change or abolish their Government, and institute one more in conformity to their present wants. What is to be feared from the people? What motives have they to abuse the sovereign power? The danger to our institutions and liberties is not from the people, but from their agents, the constituted authorities, where alone it is said the sovereign power can safely be reposed. The danger is here, in these halls, and in the halls of the State Legislatures.

In regard to the particular question before the Senate, he had but a word to say. If there has been any thing wrong or dangerous on the part of the people of Michigan, the wrong originated here, and the blame is justly chargeable upon Congress. What they have done has been in pursuance of our own law. The act of last session, providing for the admission of Michigan into the Union, prescribes a condition, which was, that the boundaries we had given to the State should be assented to by the people of Michigan, through a convention of delegates to be chosen for that purpose. It is true the word "State" is used, but that was only descriptive, for Michigan was not then a State, in the ordinary sense of the term, although she was a State for certain purposes. The assent was to come from the people, and through a convention of delegates, to be chosen by them for that purpose. The act required to be done was altogether a popular act; it was to be an act of the people in their primary, original, elementary capacity, without any reference to any action on the part of the existing authorities of Michigan. Had the assent been given by the first convention called by the Legislature, he concurred with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] in the opinion that it would have been valid, and a compliance with your law. The interference of the Legislature did not change the character of the convention; it was a convention of the people, and its assent would have been the assent of the people. But the interference of the Legislature was a mere matter of convenience or form; it did not alter the substance of the proceeding, for the convention could derive none of its powers from the Legislature; they came from the people, as the fountain and source of all political power. Your law had referred the question to them; and whether they held a convention according to a rule prescribed by the Legislature, or in some other mode, is of no importance. In either case, the question, and he thought the only question, is, have the people of Michigan given their assent? This is a mere question of fact. Was the convention of Ann Arbor a convention of the people of Michigan, and authorized to express their assent to the boundary? Of this he could see no reason to doubt; we have at least prima facie evidence that it was; there is, indeed, much stronger evidence of the fact. The circumstance that there is no opposition, no remonstrance, from any portion of the population of Michigan, was, to his mind, the strongest evidence that the second convention did emanate from, and truly represent, the people of Michigan, and had rightfully and properly given their assent to the boundary, as required by the act of Congress. He would apologize for having detained the Senate much longer than he intended, and thanked them for their attention.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said that this was the only bill he had seen in that Senate, during his term of service, which had a preamble attached to it. It was his opinion that it was wholly unnecessary. However, it was deemed necessary by some gentlemen, for the sake of some argument or elucidation, to insert the preamble; but why, or wherefore, he did not apprehend. Did this preamble, he asked, vary and alter the construction of the law? Was it not the same with or without it? Had he been present when the bill was reported, he would have opposed the adoption of the preamble, because it did not tell the truth, and the whole truth. It bore upon its face what the lawyers called a suppressio veri. Now, if the Senate were right in supposing that the convention of December last was a legitimate and constitutional assembly, and that its proceedings were valid and binding, did the striking out or retaining of the preamble affect the deliberations of the convention, one way or the other? He thought not. Michigan had precluded herself from no right by it, and a right would be binding upon her, whether the preamble should be retained or not. Was not that very clear? Then, why retain it? Gentlemen had much better lay it aside, and, by making no allusion to it, they would avoid all the questions upon which they had been so long debating. If there was to be a preamble at all, it was proper, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MORRIS] had said, that it should contain a true and complete history of the whole proceeding. He (Mr. C.) would vote for the preamble, provided all the facts were introduced; or, if the question should be made, he would vote for striking it out. He thought that all parties might consistently do that. He expressed his anxiety for the speedy admission of Michigan into the Union, and said that he was then prepared to vote for the bill, and trusted that gentlemen would concur with him in opinion, that there was no necessity for the insertion of a preamble.

Mr. FULTON said: Mr. President, it is not without reluctance that I ask the indulgence of the Senate at this late hour. After the full and able discussion to which I have been an attentive listener, and from which I have derived so much instruction, I feel incapable of shedding any new light upon the subject. But before the vote is taken upon the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio to the preamble to the bill upon your table, I feel it to be my duty to state the grounds upon which I am compelled to vote for the bill, with the preamble proposed by the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

I owe my thanks, sir, to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, for bringing us back to the subject under discussion; and as I shall confine myself strictly to the points involved in the consideration of the bill upon the table, I desire not to occupy much of the time of the Senate, when its patience must be so nearly exhausted, in presenting the grounds which shall determine my vote upon the question. My reason, sir, for preferring the original preamble to the bill is, because I consider that in this matter the United States stand in the attitude of a mediator between the sovereign State of Michigan on the one hand, and the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, on the other. I believe, sir, that the intervention of Congress at the last session, whether rightful or otherwise, has been the means of bringing to a happy termination a most alarming and difficult dispute on the subject of boundary between sovereign States, and which it is now our duty to maintain, by all the means in our power. If, sir, the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio shall prevail, it will, to say the least of it, produce a doubt as to the binding force of the act of the State of Michigan, in which she has given her consent to the settlement of the boundary, as proposed to her by Congress. Believing, sir, that the sovereign power is in the people of Michigan, I hold them to be capable of making an entire new constitution; and to be able to do so without following the plan pointed out in her present constitution for amending that instrument. If the people of any State in this Union have adopted a constitution, by which they afterwards find they are grievously oppressed, it is their right, it is their duty, to annul it, in a peaceable manner if possible, and to adopt such a form of government as they may approve of. No people are free, no Government is democratic, when the great body of such people are forced to submit to be oppressed. But, sir, even admitting that such a change of Government as I have mentioned be considered revolutionary, yet is it not susceptible of being sanctioned and adopted by the sovereign power of the State; and all the validity given to it, as if it were lawful in its origin?

SENATE.]

Admission of Michigan.

But, sir, I consider that the settlement of this boundary question has not changed the constitution of Michigan. It is true that the territory within which that constitution is to operate, as also the people to be governed by it, are somewhat changed; but the form of the Government itself is not altered in any respect whatever. I believe, sir, that it is in the power of a State to settle a question of boundary by commissioners, or in any other manner which she may authorize; and that, in the present instance, the people of Michigan have acted upon the question in their sovereign capacity, and have solemnly determined, by their delegates in convention, to surrender a disputed portion of her territory upon their southern border to the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and have acquired a tract of country upon their northern border, over which the constitution of Michigan is now operating in full force; and that the country and the people included within the limits established by the last convention now constitute the State of Michigan. I am at a loss to perceive the object aimed at, in wishing to give importance to the proceedings of the convention which refused to act upon the boundary question. Its being convened by the majority of the representatives of the people cannot make it a more valid convention than the one convened by the authority of the people themselves. And, certainly, the last act of the people is the one which we ought to regard as most obligatory upon them at this time. I am aware, sir, of the difficulties which existed. This boundary question had well nigh involved the contending parties in civil war. The Federal Government had interposed, and had endeavored, by all the means in her power, to prevent bloodshed. She, perhaps, even claimed more power than she possessed, if she attempted to fix the boundaries of either a State or Territory, if such boundary had been previously established. She, however, was performing the part of a peacemaker, and in that sacred character we should regard her acts with the utmost liberality. I am, therefore, prepared to give to the act of the last session of Congress all the force it is possible to give it. Under existing circumstances, it is not to be wondered at that the people of Michigan at first refused to yield their consent. Excited as they were, and unwilling to give up a portion of territory they were anxious to hold, their consent to the change was difficult to obtain. After cool and mature deliberation, they did at last give their consent to the establishment of the boundary as it had been proposed to them. And, sir, can it now be questioned that the people of Michigan consider themselves bound by the act of the last convention which fixed their boundaries? Do we hear a murmur from any quarter? Have any portion of the people, however small, protested against the proceedings of that convention? Is there a single citizen of Michigan who asks us to disregard the boundaries it has established? Not one, sir, as far as I am informed.

Now, sir, believing, as I do, that Michigan was a sovereign State from the moment that Congress acknowledged her as such, and that she has been induced for the sake of peace, and also to obtain her weight in the councils of the nation, to consent to the establishment of the limits by which an unfortunate dispute is forever put to rest between her and three of her sister States, I am anxious that every thing shall be done on our part to secure the maintenance of the boundaries so established, and to quiet forever this distracting question. I wish to hold Michigan on the terms she has consented to, and to bind her to the observance of her limits, as established by the convention held at Ann Arbor. I am, therefore, extremely anxious that in the present action of Congress upon this subject we should show to the State of Michigan, (for, sir, I consider her in all respects an independent State, and capable of performing every act of sovereignty which the other States of this Union are capable of,) that we intend to hold her to the boundary she has now established. Michigan has fixed her boundaries as an independent State, and it therefore becomes our duty so to act in passing the bill to entitle her representatives to take their seats in Congress, as to prove to her that we consider her bound to adhere to the boundaries she has established. With these views, I shall support the preamble attached to the bill presented by the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

The question of boundary was one which properly belonged to the States and the Territory of Michigan, (if her boundaries had been permanently fixed,) who were interested in the question. But as the northern boundary of Michigan had not been established, Congress had the right to define her boundaries at any time before her independence was acknowledged. After that acknowledgment this right would have ceased but for the condition prescribed in the act of the last session of Congress; and, sir, the wisdom of that act is now fully proved by the happy consequences which are about to result from it.

I entertain some views, Mr. President, in relation to the admission of States into the Union, which perhaps are different from those of others. The territory of the United States comprehends all that portion of country included within the limits of the United States, and all the inhabitants within those boundaries are American citizens, and citizens of the Union. Whenever a portion of this territory, with the people inhabiting it, are organized into a territorial form of government, a dependent State is created by the Government of the United States. These citizens lose none of their rights as American citizens, excepting that they consent, by submitting to be citizens of a dependent State, to a temporary denial of certain privileges which they would have a right to exercise if they were citizens of an independent State. They are formed into a separate community; their limits are, or ought to be, defined, and the right of jurisdiction within those limits is surrendered to them; they are vested with legislative power, and, by degrees, are invested with all the powers of self-government. A compact is thus entered into between the parent Government and the dependency, by which the rights and privileges of the citizens of the latter become so completely vested, that any act on the part of the parent Government, changing the limits or abridging those rights, powers, and privileges, secured to them by the compact, or organic law, would be such an act of injustice as would justify resistance on the part of the dependency. This embryo State, sir, the moment the parent Government releases her from the obligations imposed by the organic law, and authorizes her to form for herself her fundamental law, and establish her own form of government, becomes an independent State; and being within the limits of the United States, and her citizens being American citizens, she becomes also a member of the confederacy. The United States have only to see that her form of government is republican, and the State, in making her constitution, forms it as a member of the confederacy, under the obligations imposed by the constitution of the United States.

To admit a foreign State, Congress could not act upon the subject unless she presented herself with a republican form of government; but of what avail is it for Congress to examine the constitution of a State composed of American citizens, who owe allegiance to the Federal Government, and who are bound, in forming their constitution, to make it in strict conformity to the requirements of the federal constitution? A State, in making or altering her constitution, does so at her peril; and our only security against a violation of the constitution in this particular by any of the States of this confederacy is, that the United States are bound to see that the constitutions of all the States are republican.

I consider, Mr. President, that the delay which has taken place, in the acknowledgment by Congress of the rights of Michigan, is an act of great injustice to her. I consider, sir, that we have nothing to do but to acknowledge her rights, and that every moment this is delayed we are threatening the integrity of the Union. If we reject her now, or longer refuse to her Senators and Representative their right to their seats in the two branches of Congress, we will be guilty of an act calculated to bring about a dismemberment of this happy Union. We have surrendered to her the right of dominion, and the sovereignty of the soil within her limits; and if we continue to persist in an attempt to bind her by laws which she has no part in making, she will be justified in setting herself up as an independent foreign Power; and in claiming the right of property to all the public lands within her limits, and in throwing open her ports to all the world. This, sir, is the dilemma in which we will place ourselves, by refusing to acknowledge the rights of Michigan. Let us, then, hasten the final action upon this subject, and pass, without further delay, the bill upon your table.

The question was then put on Mr. MORRIS'S amendment to the preamble of the bill, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 18, nays 23.

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Sevier, Southard, Swift, White—18.

So the amendment to the preamble was rejected.

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to strike out the preamble; which motion was rejected: Yeas 16, nays 25—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, Knight, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, White—16.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to strike out the preamble, and insert, in lieu thereof, a section repealing the conditions imposed on Michigan by the act of the last session, as to her assent to the boundary prescribed in that act.

On submitting this motion, Mr. CALHOUN moved that the Senate adjourn, in order to allow him an opportunity of addressing the Senate in its support the next day.

This motion was lost: Yeas 13, nays 24—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Davis, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Parker, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift—13.

The question was then taken on Mr. CALHOUN'S amendment, and it was lost: Yeas 12, nays 25—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Davis, Kent, Knight, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, White—12.

Mr. WHITE, of Tennessee, said that when this bill had been before the Senate at the last session, he had voted against it; but at that time a bill was pending before the other House to settle the northern boundary of the State of Ohio; and as the same line which constituted the northern boundary of Ohio would be the southern boundary of Michigan, he was one of those who thought that Michigan ought not to be admitted as a State till that boundary was settled. While Michigan remained a Territory, Congress had power to settle the dispute, and assign her limits, but let her once be admitted as a State, and Congress would lose that power. As it could not be known with certainty whether the bill then pending in the House of Representatives would become a law or not, and as he was obliged to vote in the meanwhile, he could not reconcile it to his views of propriety to receive Michigan while the boundary question remained open.

The bill settling the boundary, however, did pass, eventually, into a law, and was approved on the 23d June. He approved of that bill, because he believed that Congress had power to fix the boundary, and that it was wise to do it. That question having been settled, the case now presented itself under a different aspect. He had been opposed to the preamble of the present bill, because, to say the least, he considered it doubtful whether the facts there recited were really so. He had been in favor of the first amendment of the preamble. That having been rejected, he had then voted to strike the preamble out of the bill, but had failed in that also. Having then recorded his vote against the reasons put forth by the majority in the preamble in support of the bill, he was now called upon to vote on the question of its final passage, and unless he saw further reason to change his opinion, he should vote in the affirmative. He should receive Michigan, however, not for the reasons contained in the preamble, for that was no part of the law, nor did he agree to those reasons; but on grounds which, entirely independent of that preamble, were such as satisfied his mind. The only effect of the preamble was to try to bind the State of Michigan by her own consent; but, for himself, he believed that Congress having settled the boundary line, it was vain to attempt to compel the new State to receive it against her consent. He believed that a majority of the people, if free from duress, would never consent to that boundary; he hoped, however, that the State being once admitted, the dispute would end. If, however, she should unhappily renew the contest, it seemed a hopeless case. Yet it appeared to him unjust to bind a State, in the act of its admission, to consent to that to which, if left free, the State would never agree. Having thus explained the reasons of his vote, he should give it in favor of the bill.

The question being thereupon taken, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading: Yeas 27, nays 4—as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Davis, Prentiss—4. The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 5.

ADMISSION OF MICHIGAN.

The engrossed bill to admit Michigan into the Union having been read a third time, and the question pending being upon its passage,

Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill.

I have (said Mr. C.) been connected with this Government more than half its existence, in various capacities, and during that long period I have looked on its action with attention, and have endeavored to make myself acquainted with the principles and character of our political institutions, and I can truly say that within that time no measure has received the sanction of Congress which has appeared to me more unconstitutional and dangerous than the present. It assails our political system in its weakest point, and where, at this time, it most requires defence.

The great and leading objections to the bill rest mainly on the ground that Michigan is a State. They have been felt by its friends to have so much weight, that its advocates have been compelled to deny the fact, as the only way of meeting the objections. Here, then, is the main point at issue between the friends and the opponents of the bill. It turns on a fact, and that fact presents the question—is Michigan a State?

If (said Mr. C.) there ever was a party committed on a fact, if there ever was one estopped from denying it, that party is the present majority in the Senate, and that fact, that Michigan is a State. It is the very party who urged through this body, at the last session, a bill for the admission of the State of Michigan, which accepted her constitution, and declared in the most explicit and strongest terms that she was a State. I will not take up the time of the Senate by reading this solemn declaration. It has frequently been read during this debate, and is familiar to all who hear me, and has not been questioned or denied. But it has been said there is a condition annexed to the declaration, with which she must comply, before she can become a State. There is, indeed, a condition, but it has been shown by my colleague and others, from the plain wording of the act, that the condition is not attached to the acceptance of the constitution, nor the declaration that she is a State, but simply to her admission into the Union. I will not repeat the argument, but, in order to place the subject beyond controversy, I shall recall to memory the history of the last session, as connected with the admission of Michigan. The facts need but to be referred to, in order to revive their recollection.

There were two points proposed to be effected by the friends of the bill at the last session. The first was to settle the controversy, as to boundary, between Michigan and Ohio, and it was that object alone which imposed the condition that Michigan should assent to the boundary prescribed by the act, as the condition of her admission. But there was another object, to be accomplished. Two respectable gentlemen, who had been elected by the State as Senators, were then waiting to take their seats on this floor; and the other object of the bill was to provide for their taking their seats as Senators on the admission of the State; and for this purpose it was necessary to make the positive and unconditional declaration that Michigan was a State, as a State only could choose Senators, by an express provision of the constitution; and hence the admission was made conditional, and the declaration that she was a State was made absolute, in order to effect both objects. To show that I am correct, I will ask the Secretary to read the third section of the bill.

[The section was read accordingly, as follows:

“SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That as a compliance with the fundamental condition of admission contained in the last preceding section of this act, the boundaries of the said State of Michigan, as in that section described, declared, and established, shall receive the assent of a convention of delegates elected by the people of said State, for the sole purpose of giving the assent herein required; and as soon as the assent herein required shall be given, the President of the United States shall announce the same by proclamation; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into the Union, as one of the United States of America, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be considered as complete, and the Senators and Representative who have been elected by the said State, as its representatives in the Congress of the United States, shall be entitled to take their seats in the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, without further delay.”]

Mr. CALHOUN then asked, Does not every Senator see the two objects—the one to settle the boundary, and the other to admit her Senators to a seat in this body; and that the section is so worded as to effect both, in the manner I have stated? If this needed confirmation, it would find it in the debate on the passage of the bill, when the ground was openly taken by the present majority, that Michigan had a right to form her constitution, under the ordinance of 1787, without our consent; and that she was, of right, and in fact, a State, beyond our control.

I will (said Mr. C.) explain my own views on this point, in order that the consistency of my course at the last and present session may be clearly seen.

My opinion was, and still is, that the movement of the people of Michigan, in forming for themselves a State constitution, without waiting for the assent of Congress, was revolutionary, as it threw off the authority of the United States over the Territory; and that we were left at liberty to treat the proceedings as revolutionary, and to remand her to her territorial condition, or to waive the irregularity, and to recognise what was done as rightfully done, as our authority alone was concerned.

My impression was, that the former was the proper course; but I also thought that the act remanding her back should contain our assent in the usual manner for her to form a constitution, and thus to leave her free to become a State. This, however, was overruled. The opposite opinion prevailed, that she had a perfect right to do what she had done, and that she was, as I have stated, a State, both in fact and right, and that we had no control over her; and our act accordingly recognised her as a State, from the time she had adopted her constitution, and admitted her into the Union on the condition of her assenting to the prescribed boundaries. Having thus solemnly recognised her as a State, we cannot now undo what was then done. There were, in fact, many irregularities in the proceedings, all of which were urged in vain against its passage; but the presidential election was then pending, and the vote of Michigan was considered of sufficient weight to overrule all objections, and correct all irregularities. They were all accordingly overruled, and we cannot now go back.

Such was the course and such the acts of the majority at the last session. A few short months have since passed. Other objects are now to be effected, and all is forgotten as completely as if they had never existed. The very Senators who then forced the act through, on the ground that Michigan was a State, have wheeled completely round, to serve the present purpose, and taken directly the opposite ground! We live in strange and inconsistent times. Opinions are taken up and laid down, as suits the occasion, without hesitation, or the slightest regard to principles or consistency. It indicates an unsound state of the public mind, pregnant with future disasters.

I turn to the position now assumed by the majority, to suit the present occasion; and, if I mistake not, it will be found as false in fact, and as erroneous in principle, as it is inconsistent with that maintained at the last session. They now take the ground that Michigan is not a State, and cannot, in fact, be a State, till she is admitted into the Union; and this on the broad principle that a Territory cannot become a State till admitted. Such is the position distinctly taken by several of the friends of this bill, and implied in the arguments of nearly all who have spoken in its favor. In fact, its advocates had no choice. As untenable as it is, they were forced on this desperate position. They had no other which they could occupy.

I have shown that it is directly in the face of the law of the last session, and that it denies the recorded acts of those who now maintain the position. I now go further, and assert that it is in direct opposition to plain and unquestionable matter of fact. There is no fact more certain than that Michigan is a State. She is in the full exercise of sovereign authority, with a Legislature and a Chief Magistrate. She passes laws; she executes them; she regulates titles; and even takes away life—all on her own authority. Ours has entirely ceased over her; and yet there are those who can deny, with all these facts before them, that she is a State. They might as well deny the existence of this hall! We have long since assumed unlimited control over the constitution, to twist, and turn, and deny it, as it suited our purpose. And it would seem that we are presumptuously attempting to assume like supremacy over facts themselves, as if their existence or non-existence depended on our volition. I speak freely. The occasion demands that the truth should be boldly uttered.

But those who may not regard their own recorded acts, nor the plain facts of the case, may possibly feel the awkward condition in which coming events may shortly place them. The admission of Michigan is not the only point involved in the passage of this bill. A question will follow, which may be presented to the Senate in a very few days, as to the right of Mr. Norvell and Mr. Lyon, the two respectable gentlemen who have been elected Senators by Michigan, to take their seats in this hall. The decision of this question will require a more sudden facing about than has been yet witnessed. It required seven or eight months for the majority to wheel about from the position maintained at the last session, to that taken at this, but there may not be allowed them now as many days to wheel back to the old position. These gentlemen cannot be refused their seats after the admission of the State, by those gentlemen who passed the act of the last session. It provides for the case. I now put it to the friends of this bill, and I ask them to weigh the question deliberately—to bring it home to their bosom and conscience before they answer—can a Territory elect Senators to Congress? The constitution is express. States only can choose Senators. Were not these gentlemen chosen long before the admission of Michigan, before the Ann Arbor meeting, and while Michigan was, according to the doctrines of the friends of this bill, a Territory? Will they, in the face of the constitution, which they are sworn to support, admit as Senators on this floor those who, by their own statement, were elected by a Territory? These questions may soon be presented for decision. The majority, who are forcing this bill through, are already committed by the act of the last session, and I leave them to reconcile, as they can, the ground they now take with the vote they must give when the question of their right to take their seats is presented for decision.

A total disregard of all principle and consistency has so entangled this subject, that there is but one mode left of extricating ourselves without trampling the constitution in the dust; and that is, to return back to where we stood when the question was first presented; to acquiesce in the right of Michigan to form a constitution, and erect herself into a State, under the ordinance of 1787; and to repeal so much of the act of the last session as prescribed the condition on which she was to be admitted. This was the object of the amendment that I offered last evening, in order to relieve the Senate from its present dilemma. The amendment involved the merits of the whole case. It was too late in the day for discussion, and I asked for indulgence till to-day, that I might have an opportunity of presenting my views. Under the iron rule of the present majority, the indulgence was refused, and the bill ordered to its third reading; and I have been thus compelled to address the Senate when it is too late to amend the bill, and after a majority have committed themselves both as to its principles and details. New as such proceedings are in this body, I complain not. I, as one of the minority, ask no favors. All I ask is, that the constitution be not violated. Hold it sacred, and I shall be the last to complain.

I now return to the assumption that a Territory cannot become a State till admitted into the Union, which is now relied on with so much confidence to prove that Michigan is not a State. I reverse the position. I assert the opposite, that a Territory cannot be admitted till she becomes a State; and in this I stand on the authority of the constitution itself, which expressly limits the power of Congress to admitting new States into the Union. But if the constitution had been silent, he would indeed be ignorant of the character of our political system who did not see that States, sovereign and independent communities, and not Territories, can only be admitted. Ours is a Union of States, a federal republic. States, and not Territories, form its component parts, bound together by a solemn league, in the form of a constitutional compact. In coming into the Union, the State pledges its faith to this sacred compact; an act which none but a sovereign and independent community is competent to perform; and, of course, a Territory must first be raised to that condition before she can take her stand among the confederated States of our Union. How can a Territory pledge its faith to the constitution? It has no will of its own. You give it all its powers, and you can at pleasure overrule all her actions. If she enters as a Territory, the act is yours, not hers. Her consent is nothing without your authority and sanction. Can you, can Congress, become a party to the constitutional compact? How absurd.

But I am told, if this be so, if a Territory must become a State before it can be admitted, it would follow that she might refuse to enter the Union after she had acquired the right of acting for herself. Certainly she may. A State cannot be forced into the Union. She must come in by her own free assent, given in her highest sovereign capacity, through a convention of the people of the State. Such is the constitutional provision; and those who make the objection must overlook both the constitution and the elementary principles of our Government, of which the right of self-government is the first; the right of every people to form their own Government, and to determine their political condition. This is the doctrine on which our fathers acted in our glorious Revolution, which has done more for the cause of liberty throughout the world than any event within the record of history, and on which the Government has acted from the first, as regards all that portion of our extensive territory that lies beyond the limits of the original States. Read the ordinance of 1787, and the various acts for the admission of new States, and you will find the principle invariably recognised and acted on, to the present unhappy instance, without any departure from it, except in the case of Missouri. The admission of Michigan is destined, I fear, to mark a great change in the history of the admission of new States, a total departure from the old usage, and the noble principle of self-government on which that usage was founded. Every thing, thus far, has been irregular and monstrous connected with her admission. I trust it is not ominous. Surrounded by lakes within her natural limits, (which ought not to have been departed from,) possessed of fertile soil and genial climate, with every prospect of wealth, power, and influence, who but must regret that she should be ushered into the Union in a manner so irregular and unworthy of her future destiny.

But I will waive these objections, constitutional and all. I will suppose, with the advocates of the bill, that a Territory cannot become a State till admitted into the Union. Assuming all this, I ask them to explain to me how the mere act of admission can transmute a Territory into a State? By whose authority would she be made a State? By ours? How can we make a State? We can form a Territory; we can admit States into the Union; but, I repeat the question, how can we make a State? I had supposed this Government was the creature of the States—formed by their authority, and dependent on their will for their existence. Can the creature form the creator? If not by our authority, then by whose? Not by her own: that would be absurd. The very act of admission makes her a member of the confederacy, with no other or greater power than is possessed by all the others; all of whom, united, cannot create a State. By what process, then, by what authority, can a Territory become a State, if not one before admitted? Who can explain? How full of difficulties, compared to the long-established, simple, and noble process which has prevailed to the present instant. According to old usage, the General Government first withdraws its authority over a certain portion of its territory, as soon as it has a sufficient population to constitute a State. They are thus left to themselves freely to form a constitution, and to exercise the noble right of self-government. They then present their constitution to Congress, and ask the privilege (for one it is of the highest character) to become a member of this glorious confederacy of States. The constitution is examined, and, if republican, as required by the federal constitution, she is admitted, with no other condition except such as may be necessary to secure the authority of Congress over the public domain within her limits. This is the old, the established form, instituted by our ancestors of the Revolution, who so well understood the great principles of liberty and self-government. How simple; how sublime! What a contrast to the doctrines of the present day, and the precedent which, I fear, we are about to establish! And shall we fear, so long as these sound principles are observed, that a State will reject this high privilege—will refuse to enter this Union? No; she will rush into your embrace, so long as your institutions are worth preserving. When the advantages of the Union shall have become a matter of calculation and doubt, when new States shall pause to determine whether the Union is a curse or blessing, the question which now agitates us will cease to have any importance.

Having now, I trust, established, beyond all controversy, that Michigan is a State, I come to the great point at issue—to the decision of which all that has been said is but preparatory—had the self-created assembly which met at Ann Arbor the authority to speak in the name of the people of Michigan, to assent to the conditions contained in the act of the last session, to supersede a portion of the constitution of the State, and to overrule the dissent of the convention of the people, regularly called by the constituted authorities of the State, to the condition of admission? I shall not repeat what I said when I first addressed the Senate on this bill. We all, by this time, know the character of that assemblage; that it met without the sanction of the authorities of the State, and that it did not pretend to represent one third of the people. We all know that the State had regularly convened a convention of the people, expressly to take into consideration the condition on which it was proposed to admit her into the Union, and that the convention, after full deliberation, had declined to give its assent by a considerable majority. With a knowledge of all these facts, I put the question—had the assembly a right to act for the State? Was it a convention of the people of Michigan, in the true, legal, and constitutional sense of that term? Is there one, within the limits of my voice, that can lay his hand on his breast, and honestly say it was? Is there one that does not feel that it was neither more nor less than a mere caucus—nothing but a party caucus—of which we have the strongest evidence in the perfect unanimity of those who assembled? Not a vote was given against admission. Can there be stronger proof that it was a meeting got up by party machinery, for party purpose?

But I go further. It was not only a party caucus, for party purpose, but a criminal meeting—a meeting to subvert the authority of the State, and to assume its sovereignty. I know not whether Michigan has yet passed laws to guard her sovereignty. It may be that she has not had time to enact laws for this purpose, which no community is long without; but I do aver, if there be such an act, or if the common law be in force in the State, the actors in that meeting might be indicted, tried, and punished, for the very act on which it is now proposed to admit the State into the Union. If such a meeting as this were to undertake to speak in the name of South Carolina, we would speedily teach its authors what they owed to the authority and dignity of the State. The act was not only in contempt of the authority of the State of Michigan, but a direct insult on this Government. Here is a self-created meeting, convened for a criminal object, which has dared to present to this Government an act of theirs, and to expect that we are to receive this irregular and criminal act as a fulfilment of the condition which we had prescribed for the admission of the State! Yet, I fear, forgetting our own dignity and the rights of Michigan, that we are about to recognise the validity of the act, and quietly to submit to the insult.

Admission of Michigan.

[SENATE.]

The year 1836 (said Mr. C.) is destined to mark the most remarkable change in our political institutions, since the adoption of the constitution. The events of the year have made a deeper innovation on the principles of the constitution, and evinced a stronger tendency to revolution, than any which have occurred from its adoption to the present day. Sir, (said Mr. C., addressing the Vice President,) duty compels me to speak of facts intimately connected with yourself. In deference to your feelings as presiding officer of the body, I shall speak of them with all possible reserve, much more reserve than I should otherwise have done if you did not occupy that seat. Among the first of these events, which I shall notice, is the caucus of Baltimore; that too, like the Ann Arbor caucus, has been dignified with the name of the convention of the people. This caucus was got up under the countenance and express authority of the President himself; and its edict, appointing you his successor, has been sustained, not only by the whole patronage and power of the Government, but by his active personal influence and exertion. Through its instrumentality he has succeeded in controlling the voice of the people, and for the first time the President has appointed his successor; and thus the first great step of converting our Government into a monarchy has been achieved. These are solemn and ominous facts. No one who has examined the result of the last election can doubt their truth. It is now certain that you are not the free and unbiased choice of the people of these United States. If left to your own popularity, without the active and direct influence of the President, and the power and patronage of the Government, acting through a mock convention of the people, instead of the highest, you would in all probability have been the lowest of the candidates.

During the same year, the State in which this ill-omened caucus convened has been agitated by revolutionary movements of the most alarming character. Assuming the dangerous doctrines that they were not bound to obey the injunctions of the constitution, because it did not place the powers of the State in the hands of an unchecked numerical majority, the electors belonging to the party of the Baltimore caucus who had been chosen to appoint the State Senators refused to perform the functions for which they had been elected, with the deliberate intention to subvert the Government of the State, and reduce her to the territorial condition, till a new Government could be formed. And now we have before us a measure not less revolutionary, but of an opposite character. In the case of Maryland, those who undertook, without the authority of law or constitution, to speak and act in the name of the people of the State, proposed to place her out of the Union by reducing her from a State to a Territory; but in this, those who in like manner undertook to act for Michigan have assumed the authority to bring her into the Union without her consent, on the very condition which she had rejected by a convention of the people convened under the authority of the State. If we shall sanction the authority of the Michigan caucus, to force a State into the Union without its assent, why might we not here sanction a similar caucus in Maryland, if one had been called, to place the State out of the Union?

These occurrences, which have distinguished the past year, mark the commencement of no ordinary change in our political system. They announce the ascendancy of the caucus system over the regularly constituted authorities of the country. I have long anticipated this event. In early life my attention was attracted to the working of the caucus system. It was my fortune to spend five or six years of my youth in the Northern portion of the Union, where, unfortunately, the system has so long prevailed. Though young, I was old enough to take interest in public affairs, and to notice the working of this odious party machine; and after reflection, with the experience then acquired, has long satisfied me that, in the course of time, the edicts of the caucus would eventually supersede the authority of law and constitution. We have at last arrived at the commencement of this great change, which is destined to go on till it has consummated itself in the entire overthrow of all legal and constitutional authority, unless speedily and effectually resisted. The reason is obvious: for obedience and disobedience to the edicts of the caucus, where the system is firmly established, are more certainly and effectually rewarded and punished, than to the laws and constitution. Disobedience to the former is sure to be followed by complete political disfranchisement. It deprives the unfortunate individual who falls under its vengeance of all public honors and emoluments, and consigns him, if dependent on the Government, to poverty and obscurity; while he who bows down before its mandates, it matters not how monstrous, secures to himself the honors of the State—becomes rich, and distinguished, and powerful. Offices, jobs, and contracts, flow on him and his connexions. But to obey the law and respect the constitution, for the most part, brings little except the approbation of conscience—a reward indeed high and noble, and prized by the virtuous above all others, but unfortunately little valued by the mass of mankind. It is easy to see what must be the end, unless, indeed, an effective remedy be applied. Are we so blind as not to see in this why it is that the advocates of this bill—the friends of the system—are so tenacious on the point that Michigan should be admitted on the authority of the Ann Arbor caucus, and no other? Do we not see why the amendment proposed by myself to admit her by rescinding the condition imposed at the last session should be so strenuously opposed? Why, even the preamble would not be surrendered, though many of our friends were willing to vote for the bill on that slight concession, in their anxiety to admit the State.

And here let me say that I listened with attention to the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CURTIS.] I know the clearness of his understanding, and the soundness of his heart, and I am persuaded, in declaring that his objection to the bill was confined to the preamble, that he has not investigated the subject with the attention it deserves. I feel the objections to the preamble are not without some weight; but the true and insuperable objections lie far deeper in the facts of the case, which would still exist were the preamble expunged. It is these which render it impossible to pass this bill without trampling under foot the rights of the States, and subverting the first principles of our Government. It would require but a few steps more to effect a complete revolution, and the Senator from North Carolina has taken the first. I will explain. If you wish to mark the first indications of a revolution, the commencement of those profound changes in the character of a people which are working beneath, before a ripple appears on the surface, look to the change of language; you will first notice it in the altered meaning of important words, and which, as it indicates a change in the feelings and principles of the people, become in turn a powerful instrument in accelerating the change, till an entire revolution is effected. The remarks of the Senator will illustrate what I have said. He told us that the terms "convention of the people" were of very uncertain meaning, and difficult to be defined; but that their true meaning was, any meeting of the people in their individual and primary character, for political purpose. I know it is difficult to define complex terms, that is, to enumerate all the ideas that belong to them, and exclude all that do not; but there is always, in the most complex, some prominent idea which marks the meaning of the term, and in relation to which there is usually no disagreement. Thus, according to the old meaning, (and which I had still supposed was its legal and constitutional meaning,) a convention of the people invariably implied a meeting of the people, either by themselves, or by delegates expressly chosen for the purpose, in their high sovereign authority, in express contradistinction to such assemblies of individuals in their private character, or having only derivative authority. It is, in a word, a meeting of the people in the majesty of their power—in that in which they may rightfully make or abolish constitutions, and put up or put down Governments at their pleasure. Such was the august conception which formerly entered the mind of every American when the terms “convention of the people” were used. But now, according to the ideas of the dominant party, as we are told on the authority of the Senator from North Carolina, it means any meeting of individuals for political purposes, and, of course, applies to the meeting at Ann Arbor, or any other party caucus for party purposes, which the leaders choose to designate as a convention of the people. It is thus the highest authority known to our laws and constitution is gradually sinking to the level of those meetings which regulate the operation of political parties, and through which the edicts of their leaders are announced, and their authority enforced; or, rather, to speak more correctly, the latter are gradually rising to the authority of the former. When they come to be completely confounded, when the distinction between a caucus and the convention of the people shall be completely obliterated, which the definition of the Senator, and the acts of this body on this bill, would lead us to believe is not far distant, this fair political fabric of ours, erected by the wisdom and patriotism of our ancestors, and once the gaze and admiration of the world, will topple to the ground in ruins.

It has, perhaps, been too much my habit to look more to the future, and less to the present, than is wise; but such is the constitution of mind, that when I see before me the indications of causes calculated to effect important changes in our political condition, I am led irresistibly to trace them to their sources, and follow them out in their consequences. Language has been held in this discussion which is clearly revolutionary in its character and tendency, and which warns us of the approach of the period when the struggle will be between the conservatives and the destructives. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] as holding language countenancing the principle that the will of a mere numerical majority is paramount to the authority of law and constitution. He did not indeed announce distinctly this principle, but it might fairly be inferred from what he said; for he told us the people of a State, where the constitution gives the same weight to a smaller as to a greater number, might take the remedy into their own hand; meaning, as I understood him, that a mere majority might at their pleasure subvert the constitution and Government of a State, which he seemed to think was the essence of democracy. Our little State has a constitution that could not stand a day against such doctrines, and yet we glory in it as the best in the Union. It is a constitution which respects all the great interests of the State, giving to each a separate and distinct voice in the management of its political affairs, by means of which the feeble interests are protected against the preponderance of the greater. We call our State a republic, a commonwealth, not a democracy; and let me tell the Senator it is a far more popular Government than if it had been based on the simple principle of the numerical majority. It takes more voices to put the machine of Government in motion, than in those that the Senator would consider more popular. It represents all the interests of the State, and is in fact the Government of the people, in the true sense of the term, and not that of the mere majority, or the dominant interests.

I am not familiar with the constitution of Maryland, to which the Senator alluded, and cannot, therefore, speak of its structure with confidence; but I believe it to be somewhat similar in its character to our own. That it is a Government not without its excellence, we need no better proof than the fact, that though within the shadow of executive influence, it has nobly and successfully resisted all the seductions by which a corrupt and artful administration, with almost boundless patronage, has tempted to seduce her into its ranks.

Looking, then, to the approaching struggle, I take my stand immovably. I am a conservative in its broadest and fullest sense, and such I shall ever remain, unless, indeed, the Government shall become so corrupt and disordered that nothing short of revolution can reform it. I solemnly believe that our political system is in its purity not only the best that ever was formed, but the best possible that can be devised for us. It is the only one by which free States, so populous and wealthy, and occupying so vast an extent of territory, can preserve their liberty. Thus thinking, I cannot hope for a better. Having no hope of a better, I am a conservative; and because I am a conservative, I am a States rights man. I believe that in the rights of the States are to be found the only effectual means of checking the over-action of this Government; to resist its tendency to concentrate all power here, and to prevent a departure from the constitution; or, in case of one, to restore the Government to its original simplicity and purity. State interposition, or, to express it more fully, the right of a State to interpose her sovereign voice, as one of the parties to our constitutional compact, against the encroachments of this Government, is the only means of sufficient potency to effect all this; and I am, therefore, its advocate. I rejoiced to hear the Senators from North Carolina [Mr. BROWN] and from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] do us the justice to distinguish between nullification and the anarchical and revolutionary movements in Maryland and Pennsylvania. I know they did not intend it as a compliment; but I regard it as the highest. They are right. Day and night are not more different—more unlike in every thing. They are unlike in their principles, their objects, and their consequences.

I shall not stop to make good this assertion, as I might easily do. The occasion does not call for it. As a conservative, and a States rights man, or, if you will have it, a nullifier, I have and shall resist all encroachments on the constitution, whether it be the encroachment of this Government on the States, or the opposite; the Executive on Congress, or Congress on the Executive. My creed is to hold both Governments, and all the departments of each, to their proper sphere, and to maintain the authority of the laws and the constitution against all revolutionary movements. I believe the means which our system furnishes to preserve itself are ample, if fairly understood and applied; and I shall resort to them, however corrupt and disordered the times, so long as there is hope of reforming the Government. The result is in the hands of the Disposer of events. It is my part to do my duty. Yet, while I thus openly avow myself a conservative, God forbid I should ever deny the glorious right of rebellion and revolution. Should corruption and oppression become intolerable, and cannot otherwise be thrown off; if liberty must perish, or the Government be overthrown, I would not hesitate, at the hazard of life, to resort to revolution, and to tear down a corrupt Government that could neither be reformed nor borne by freemen; but I trust in God things will never come to that pass. I trust never to see such fearful times; for fearful, indeed, they would be, if they should ever befall us. It is the last experiment, and not to be thought of till common sense and the voice of mankind would justify the resort.

Before I resume my seat, I feel called on to make a few brief remarks on a doctrine of fearful import, which has been broached in the course of this debate—the right to repeal laws granting bank charters, and, of course, of railroads, turnpikes, and joint stock companies. It is a doctrine of fearful import, and calculated to do infinite mischief. There are countless millions vested in such stocks, and it is a description of property of the most delicate character. To touch it is almost to destroy it. But, while I enter my protest against all such doctrines, I have been greatly alarmed with the thoughtless precipitancy (not to use a stronger phrase) with which the most extensive and dangerous privileges have been granted of late. It can end in no good, and, I fear, may be the cause of convulsions hereafter. We already feel the effects on the currency, which no one competent of judging but must see is in an unsound condition. I must say (for truth compels me) I have ever distrusted the banking system, at least in its present form, both in this country and Great Britain. It will not stand the test of time; but I trust that all shocks, or sudden revolution, may be avoided, and that it may gradually give way before some sounder and better-regulated system of credit which the growing intelligence of the age may devise. That a better may be substituted I cannot doubt, but of what it shall consist, and how it shall finally supersede the present uncertain and fluctuating currency, time alone can determine. All I can see is, that the present must, one day or another, come to an end, or be greatly modified, if that, indeed, can save it from an entire overthrow. It has within itself the seeds of its own destruction.

Mr. STRANGE said he was gratified that the Senator from South Carolina had addressed the Senate; for he had a very high respect for his abilities, and, from some intimations he had casually thrown out, he was apprehensive that, in retaining the preamble, the Senate was falling into some unperceived but dangerous error. But we have now heard all that the Senator has to say upon this important subject, and he has utterly failed to convince us of error in a single proposition about which we differed. This was not for want of ability in the honorable Senator, but was entirely owing to the cause he advocated—to his being on the wrong side of the question. The most powerful intellect can never long make head against truth. Mr. S. said he had as high a regard as the gentleman, for the institutions of their common country—admired as much the wisdom of their organization, and cherished toward them as deep an affection. He was far from believing time mispent in this body which was employed in the discussion of great constitutional questions, and was never sorry to see the talent of the Senate arrayed upon different sides of interesting propositions. The having them presented in all their various bearings and points of view, and sifted and examined with care and ability, was very friendly to the ascertainment of truth. It had been adverted to in this House that some of its members had been recently transferred hither from judicial stations in their respective States, and he had himself the honor to be among the number; and he would take the liberty of stating, as one of the results of his official experience, that the failure of an able lawyer was nearly as good evidence of the unsoundness of his position, as the strength of argument brought to bear against it by the opposing counsel; and so, on the present occasion, having listened to the unsuccessful efforts of the able Senator from South Carolina to overthrow the positions he had assumed in the early part of this debate, had but inspired him with renewed confidence in their soundness.

The Senator has in the first place assailed the preamble to this bill on account of its inconsistency with the votes, at the last session of Congress, of its present advocates. Upon this point Mr. S. had nothing to say. Those of whom this predicament was supposed were doubtless well able to vindicate themselves; but for his part, he had not then had the honor of a seat in this body, and consequently stood entirely uncommitted to any of its doings. But it was further urged that Michigan was a State, and that those who disputed it did so in the face of a record; for that the act of Congress, passed at the last session, expressly declared her to be a State. But, said Mr. S., I still deny her to be a State, without any apprehension of being overborne by any such record as that referred to by the gentleman. If there was such an act as the one described by the Senator, he would not question its existence, nor would he indeed put him to the proof that there was such a record. But what the record would prove, when produced, was an altogether different matter; and he denied that any act of Congress, however broadly it might assert it, could prove the existence of a State under the circumstances stated in the case of Michigan: it was altogether incompetent to the proof of such a fact. Here Mr. S. took leave to remark that it was with great reluctance he had embarked so deeply in this debate; but he had been induced at an early period to state a few propositions which had been denounced as dangerous and revolutionary in their tendency. He would never venture on this floor to state any thing as his deliberate conviction which had not been duly considered by him. He might sometimes throw out crude suggestions, with a view to draw out others, or bring their attention to the subject; but on such occasions he would always present them as mere hasty impulses of the passing moment; but when he had gone so far as to make a deliberate assertion, he trusted he should always be found ready to maintain his position. He had asserted that Michigan was not a State, and this he stood ready to prove. It is not denied that the land covered by Michigan was once the property of this Union; and it is a principle of law which he presumed no Senator would deny, that things continuous in their nature are always presumed to remain the same, unless the contrary is shown. If, then, the territory embraced in Michigan was once the property of this Union, it continues to be so until gentlemen show us the where, the when, and the how, of its cessation. They say it ceased to be so by virtue of the act of Congress of last session. I deny the authority of Congress to pass such an act. If they have passed such a one, it is a nullity. When an act of Congress comes in collision with the constitution, it comes in contact with a power which annihilates it. It is as though it had never existed. It is a dead letter. The constitution gives authority to Congress to create a State for no other purpose but admission into the Union; and whenever Congress passes an act creating a State, without at the same time admitting it into the Union, that act is a nullity. Indeed, if the matter were res integra, if it were a new question, it might be seriously debated whether Congress can create a State, even for the purpose of admission into the Union. But I will not deny that it has been the practice to do so, and I am not now disposed to question its correctness. I had occasion heretofore to call the attention of the Senate to the only clause of the constitution relating to that subject, and defied any one to produce any other authority for Congress to create a State, or to contend that the power under that clause was any thing more than implied.

[Here Mr. CALHOUN interrupted Mr. S., to explain himself, and said that he had not declared Congress competent to create a State, either in or out of the Union; but by withdrawing its jurisdiction from a given Territory, that Territory was then at liberty to form itself into a State.]

SENATE.]

Admission of Michigan.

Mr. S. said he did not think the Senator's explanation had materially varied his proposition. That there could be but little difference between creating a State out of the territory of the Union and suffering it to create itself; as in both cases Congress relinquished a trust confided to her by the Union, which she had no right to relinquish but in one special case, and that was, when by the same act she formed the State and admitted it into the Union; so that the act of Congress of the last session, not executing any power possessed by Congress, is a nullity.

But the Senator from South Carolina insists that to deny Michigan to be a State is a denial against the actual and obvious fact that Michigan is now really exercising all the powers of sovereignty: she has formed her constitution, elected her Legislature and members of Congress; and her Legislature has actually assembled, and elected her Senators to Congress. But (said Mr. S.) the question is not what Michigan has done, but what she has a right to do. Although these things, I admit, may be prima facie evidence of her legal existence as a State, they are susceptible of being met by the proof of what is, in fact, her true condition. When one is found acting sui juris, exercising all the privileges of a freeman, it may be prima facie evidence that he is what the performance of the act implies; but if it be susceptible of proof that he is in fact a slave, the inference no longer exists that he is free. And so in this case we show that Michigan was once subject to the United States, and demand the proof that she has ever been emancipated. In vain was the wisdom of our forefathers employed in devising plans for the happiness and perpetuity of this nation; in vain did they inculcate the doctrine of union, and repudiate the idea of separate sovereignties or multiplied confederacies, if the doctrine of the Senator from South Carolina is to prevail. If Michigan can exist as a separate State for a single hour, she may for days and years, and might ultimately refuse to come into the Union at all. During this time she may have her own army and navy, declare war, form alliances, and do all those acts which our forefathers were so anxious to bring within the control of a power representing the common interest of all the States. The idea is too preposterous, too inconsistent with all their plans and purposes, to suppose that they contemplated it for a single moment. The whole confederacy would be in continual danger of dissolution from such a cause operating in its vicinity; and yet, according to the Senator's theory, there is no mode of preventing this evil, but, after we had rashly given her a separate existence, constraining her by the terror of the sword and the bayonet, or the application of them, to become an unwilling party to our national compact; a state of things which no one can suppose to have been planned by wisdom, or desirable either upon the score of interest, patriotism, or humanity. But to enforce his position, the Senator has supposed that it is necessary she should first have a separate existence ere she can become a member of our Union, which he insists is altogether federative, and even urges that she must be of age. Now, I humbly conceive that the Senator has suffered himself to be misled by a metaphor, a figure of speech. The age of the Territory or State is a matter of perfect indifference; it is enough if the inhabitants are of age to make contracts; for with them, if with any one, the compact is formed. The idea of the necessity of a separate, anterior existence as a State is altogether fallacious; the incident of being a member of the Union is a portion of the very law of her existence, and her federal relationship commences eo instanti that she becomes a State. Nor does this violate the analogy of individual relationship to society; the infant, as soon as he is born, becomes a member of the political society in which he comes into existence. By his very birth the social compact is implied; and without any formal recognition of the compact, when he shall attain mature age, he is held liable to the sanctions of the law as soon as capable of discerning between right and wrong; without waiting for his assent, society extends over him the arm of protection. No matter how young he may be, he who takes away his life is punished by society as a murderer; and it is not because the social compact is not sufficiently complete, but in mere tenderness to the frailty of human nature, that he is not liable to punishment for a violated law, at any stage of existence, however early.

But another difficulty, which it is attempted to throw in our way, is, that Michigan has already elected her Senators and Representative; and if we say that she is not a State, their election was irregular, and they will not be entitled to seats in the respective branches of the National Assembly. I have already had occasion to say, sir, that while I have the honor of representing, in part, a sovereign State upon this floor, I will speak what I believe to be the language of truth, regardless of the consequences. If, then, the assertion that Michigan is not a State must necessarily exclude the honorable gentlemen now waiting for admission to their seats, I shall deeply regret it. But, sir, I foresee no such consequence; the whole matter appears to me exceedingly plain, and free from all the metaphysical difficulties in which gentlemen have striven to involve it. When a bargain is concluded between two parties, it is no longer a matter of consequence from which the first overture proceeded, whether the vender proposed to the vendee, or the vendee to the vender; the only question is, was there finally an agreement between them? And the same consequences, precisely, follow, whichever made the first advance. Now, sir, Michigan had no right to form herself into a State without the assent of Congress, and with the assent of Congress she had the right. It is a matter of perfect indifference whether Michigan took the primary steps with a view to their ratification by Congress, which ratification is subsequently made, or that Congress first gives the permission, and Michigan acts upon such permission; whether the Senators and Representative from Michigan knock at the door of Congress and are admitted, or Congress opens her doors and announces to Michigan that her Senators and Representative may walk in whenever she pleases to send them, and they are sent and do walk in. In the one case Michigan acts upon a previous authority, and in the other a subsequent ratification gives effect to that which was previously done. I think I have now sufficiently shown that I was right in contending that Michigan was not a State. The Senator from South Carolina himself has admitted the evil consequences likely to flow from supposing that Congress has the power to create a State for any other purpose than admission into the Union. [Here Mr. CALHOUN disclaimed.] Well, said Mr. S., I certainly understood him to say so, but I suppose I was mistaken; but I insist that, without the gentleman's admission, the consequences are plain and obvious to every man; that the perpetuity of our Union would be seriously endangered, and that in the mean time we should, with our own hands, be placing in our side a thorn to rankle and annoy us, and all without the slightest inducement or consideration; and no one who has a proper respect for the good, great, and wise framers of our constitution, can ever believe that they intended any thing so preposterous.

Having, as I conceive, disposed of this matter, it is unnecessary for me to take up the inquiry of the gentleman, whether, in a regularly organized State, a convention can be called under any other authority than that of the Legislature. I do not find it my present purpose to take either side of this question, as I insist that Michigan is not a regularly organized State, but is, as admitted by the Senator from South Carolina, pro hac vice, in a state of nature. Nothing, therefore, remains but the inquiry whether a convention has actually been held by Michigan, in any manner convened. And here I must be allowed to say that I have been singularly unfortunate in being misapprehended by both the Senators from South Carolina. By both I have been represented as saying that a convention was an undefined and undefinable something. I had the honor of correcting the misapprehension of the Senator from South Carolina who first addressed the Senate, and flattered myself that I had satisfied him; but his colleague has to-day fallen into a similar mistake, and I now beg leave to set him right also. I never thought, and therefore do not think I could have ever said, that a convention was something undefined and undefinable. On the contrary, I stated that it was an assemblage of all the persons of a given community, in person, or by their acknowledged agents or representatives; that it was perfectly certain in its existence, and in power irresistible. I did say, and do still say, that how it is to be gotten together is a matter altogether undefined by any law; but, when got together, its identity was a thing of the most absolute certainty, and in a country situated like Michigan, so far as its own people were concerned, supposing the authority of Congress out of the question, altogether omnipotent. Has a convention been holden in Michigan? That something of the kind has been holden, no one denies; but the difference of opinion seems to turn on the nature of the assembly at Ann Arbor. The Senator from South Carolina, with that delicacy which usually characterizes the initiatory steps in an argument, said he would not call it a caucus. But as men grow warmer in argument, they generally grow bolder in assertion; and, accordingly, in a very few breaths, the Senator flatly calls it a caucus, with a view, doubtless to brand it with a very odious name. But I will press this matter no farther.

Mr. President, my object in rising at the commencement of this debate was simply to state what I conceived to be the true questions presenting themselves on the bill before us. I had observed what I conceived to be a vicious habit in this body to be exceedingly discursive in debate, to bring all sorts of things to bear upon all sorts of questions, and especially to involve every matter in the vortex of party politics. Now, sir, conceiving myself to be a new member, with a mind not yet contaminated by these vicious practices, I thought I was able to see without bias the true points in controversy, and I accordingly rose to present them to the Senate, and supposed, when this was done, my task was fulfilled. But I find, sir, I have been engaged in advocating treason and revolution, as some gentlemen think, and have been most unexpectedly called out to rescue myself from misapprehension, and am now forced in some degree to fall into the practice I have condemned in others, and touch upon a subject which has nothing in the world to do with the bill before us.

The Baltimore convention has been alluded to, and, as usual, for purposes of denunciation. In looking round this assembly, I see no one who had the honor or misfortune, as the case may be, to have been a member of that body. For myself, I must plead guilty to the charge. But certainly, sir, when I went there I was entirely unconscious of any criminal intent. I did not conceive that I was, in any way, violating the laws and constitution of my country, or subjecting myself to be arraigned as a traitor to either. I thought I was merely exercising the privilege of a free citizen, to go where I pleased, and meet whom I pleased, for the purpose of consulting on matters in which we had a common right to act. A few of our fellow-citizens, in their respective parts of the country, selected us to meet at Baltimore, and ascertain by conference who among the many distinguished fellow-citizens scattered over our wide extent of country had been most decided in their adherence to sound republican principles, best qualified to fill the two highest offices in our gift as a nation, and most likely to be acceptable to the people at large. We met, we conferred, and two distinguished individuals, as the result of our deliberations, were named and recommended to the people of the United States. We did not pretend to any power of coercion, and did not imagine that any one would impute to us such power. It was left to the free people of this Union to ratify or annul the choice we had made. We did not feel ourselves in the possession of any means of coercion. We had not any physical force to command, nor the control of treasure wherewith to purchase suffrages. We did nothing but publish a small pamphlet, setting forth what we had done, and coldly laying before the public the reasons why we believed the persons we had named ought to have the support of their fellow-citizens. But it has been said we were office-holders and office-seekers, and our object was the acquisition of offices, or the perpetuity of those already possessed. For himself, (said Mr. S.,) he was at the time the holder of an office under the State of North Carolina, but he had never imagined its perpetuity depended upon the results of the Baltimore convention, for it was an office for life. And, as to having had any thing personal in expectancy, he could, with a clear conscience, repel the imputation; and, in demanding of the opposition to believe him sincere, he required nothing more than the same courtesy he extended to them. As a party, he believed the opposition sincere in their opinions. To many individuals of that party he had no doubt it would be a most alarming exposure to have their hearts opened to public gaze; but the bulk of the party, he doubted not, were sincere, and might possibly be right in the various points of difference between them and those with whom he acted. If they were right, he trusted in God they would yet triumph over us. But believing, as I do, that they are wrong, I will manfully strive against them with all the means in my power. The Baltimore convention was one of those means, and I heartily rejoice that it has so far been successful.

A variety of other topics, he said, had been referred to, equally impertinent to the subject in hand, yet he would not go into them; but, finding himself standing alone of the 600 men who constituted the Baltimore convention, he thought it but reasonable that he should have said thus much in its vindication, when he heard it so unnecessarily assailed.

Mr. BUCHANAN regretted that he felt constrained again to detain the Senate with a few observations in reply to what had fallen from the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] He had laid it down as a rule for himself, when he entered this body, never to obtrude himself upon its notice, unless when placed under the necessity of duty. Such was now his condition; and he rose merely for the purpose of putting himself right in regard to some portions of that Senator's remarks.

These remarks had been made in that gentleman's very best manner: they were specimens which proceeded from a master's hand. He (Mr. B.) could scarcely cherish the hope of obtaining, for what he had to offer in reply, the profound attention which the Senator had commanded. He would ask that gentleman, however, to hear him in a candid spirit, and to correct him, in case he had misapprehended any of his arguments.

The Senator had undertaken, as he often did, to become a prophet; and, as a reason for it, had observed that it was more the habit of his mind to look to the future, than to give minute attention either to the past or the present. The Senator had afforded at least one evidence of the authenticity of his inspiration in his resemblance, in one particular, to the ancient prophets of Israel. Like them, he almost always foreboded ill and threatened calamities. Mr. B. trusted that the ominous predictions of the gentleman would never be fulfilled; and sure he was that no one would more rejoice, should they prove false, than he who had uttered them.

The Senator had set out with an argument, the aim of which was to convict the majority of the Senate of gross inconsistency; but Mr. B. must confess that he had been unable, from some cause, perhaps the obtuseness of his own intellect, to perceive its force. He had represented himself (Mr. B.) as having contended that Michigan was not a State, even after Congress had recognised her State constitution. This assumption was the basis of the gentleman's entire argument. Now, Mr. B. had never taken any such ground. Directly the reverse. In his former remarks he had, throughout, treated Michigan as a State, although not one of the confederate States of this Union. She had adopted every measure necessary to become such, with a single exception. Her constitution and all her proceedings had received the sanction of Congress; and her actual admission as a State into this Union was only suspended until she should give her consent to the change which we had proposed in her boundaries. She was then a State; but not a confederate State. This is the true distinction. The General Government was in treaty with her as a State, not as a Territory, concerning the terms of her actual admission into this great national confederacy. This plain statement of the case itself affords an answer to almost every argument which has been urged by the Senator.

Even if he (Mr. B.) were disposed to admit the irregularity of the convention held at Ann Arbor, which he was not, still, upon the Senator's avowed principles, he might vote for this bill to admit Michigan into the Union, provided he believes that the assent of a majority of her people has been fairly given to the terms which had been proposed by Congress. Upon these very principles, he might waive this irregularity, and act as though all her proceedings had been strictly according to the most approved forms. He admits that, although he believes the movement of the people of Michigan, in forming a State constitution for themselves without the previous authority of Congress, was revolutionary in its nature, yet we might, if we thought proper, waive this irregularity, and recognise the validity of their proceedings. Was not the same rule which applies to the one case equally applicable to the other? If we may waive such irregularities in forming a constitution, why shall we not waive similar irregularities in changing the boundaries fixed by that constitution? The two cases are precisely parallel.

The Senator had contended that the proceedings previous to the assembly of the convention which formed the constitution of Michigan were irregular; and to this proposition Mr. B., in part, assented. He thought it would have been better had a previous law been enacted by Congress, authorizing the formation of a constitution by the people of the Territory. But, year after year, these people had been knocking at our doors, urging their prayers and their complaints; but both these prayers and these complaints had been disregarded. Finding that Congress would pass no such law, they had at length taken the matter into their own hands, as Tennessee had done before. We possessed the undoubted power of waiving this irregularity, and we had waived it, by the act of the last session, approving of their constitution. We ought now to do the same in regard to the last convention; especially as it appears that the whole body of the people have assented to their proceedings; not one word of remonstrance or complaint having reached the Senate from any quarter. He would put it to the Senator whether, after all that had passed, he would now be willing to force those people to commence again, to annul all that had been done, and to compel them to form a new constitution. But, as Mr. B. did not believe that the proceedings of the last convention were either revolutionary or irregular, he should not rest the case on this ground alone, though it would be amply sufficient.

He agreed with the Senator as to the fact that Michigan was now a State, though not a confederate State; but there had been another proposition advanced by him, to which he never could yield his assent. The Senator had contended that a Territory, after it had adopted a constitution in pursuance of an authority granted by Congress for that purpose, would rise up at once into the rank of a sovereign and independent State, no longer subject to the control of this Government. What, sir? Would the Territory of Wisconsin, for example, if Congress had authorized her to form a constitution, and she had adopted one of a republican character, from that moment become a sovereign and independent State? Could she then refuse to enter the Union? Could she dispose of her public lands within her limits? Could she coin money, and perform every other act pertaining to an independent sovereignty? Did gentlemen intend to push their doctrine of State rights to such an extreme, and thus enable every Territory to rise up into a foreign State, and put Congress and the Union at defiance? If this doctrine be not revolutionary with a vengeance, he did not know what could be so called. No, sir. Our Territories belong to us. They are integral parts of the nation. We authorize their people to erect themselves into States, subject to our approbation; but until they actually enter the Union, they continue in a subordinate condition, and are subject to our control.

The Senator contends that these Territories cannot enter the Union without having previously become States, because as States they must be admitted. Sub modo, this may be true. But whatever they may be called, they do not become confederate States until the very instant they are received into the Union, by virtue of an act of Congress. If this be not the case, then the preliminary proceedings, which we authorize them to adopt for the purpose of becoming States, may be converted into the very means of enabling them to shake off our authority altogether.

But what is the proposition which lies at the very root of the Senator's whole argument against the bill? I understand it to be, that when any Commonwealth exists under an organic law, and has by it created a Legislature, without the previous assent of the Legislature no convention can be rightfully held within its limits; and that if such a convention should be held, the movement would be revolutionary, and its edicts, in their very nature, would be unauthorized and tyrannical.

If this proposition be universally true, then it follows, as a necessary consequence, that no matter to what extent the regularly organized Government of a State or nation may be guilty of tyranny and oppression, this very Government must first give its assent, before the people can hold a convention for the redress of grievances, or, in a word, can exercise the unalienable rights of man. The fate of the people, it seems, must forever depend upon the will of the very Legislature which oppresses them, and their liberties can only be restored when that Legislature may be pleased to grant them permission to assemble in convention. I had not supposed that any such proposition would ever be seriously contended for in this chamber. It is directly at war with the declaration of American independence, which declares that "we hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

[Mr. CALHOUN, interposing, said: "Certainly; it is a revolutionary right!"]

Here (resumed Mr. B.) is a right plainly recognised in this immortal state paper, which we all regard as the charter of our common liberties. Is it not, then, manifest that the Senator has taken a position where he stands in direct and open opposition to every principle of the American Revolution? Why, sir, had we not established Governments at the moment our conventions were held? Was not the character of these Governments, in the main, just and equitable? We went to war for a principle, for the just and glorious principle that there shall be no taxation without representation; and in support of this principle, the people of "the old thirteen," without any previous legislative act, did hold conventions and Congresses at their pleasure. Our very rights to seats upon this floor rest upon what he calls revolutionary principles.

[Mr. CALHOUN. Certainly: I never denied the right of revolution; I contended for it. All our institutions rest on that right; they are the fruits of revolution. That was the very proposition which led to the revolutionary war. I said that a convention of the people had power to put up and to throw down any and every form of government; but that is, per se, a revolution.]

The gentleman (resumed Mr. B.) did say that he gloried in the right of rebellion. Does he contend, then, that if, in one of the States of this Union, the Government be so organized as utterly to destroy the right of equal representation, there is no mode of obtaining redress but by an act of the Legislature authorizing a convention, or by open rebellion? Must the people step at once from oppression to open war? Must it be either absolute submission, or absolute revolution? Is there no middle course? I cannot agree with the Senator. I say that the whole history of our Government establishes the principle that the people are sovereign, and that a majority of them can alter or change their fundamental laws at pleasure. I deny that this is either rebellion or revolution. It is an essential and a recognised principle in all our forms of government.

To be sure, I should be one of the last men in the United States who would desire to see such a right often exerted. I admit that there is great propriety and convenience in having the Legislature to fix the time, and place, and mode, of calling a convention; because it is difficult for the people to effect their purpose without some such provision. Such has been the general practice; but I insist upon the right of the people to proceed without any legislative interference or agency whatever.

I shall now, though with great regret that the topic has been introduced, attend to what has been said by the Senator in relation to Maryland. He did not expressly assert, but he left it to be inferred, that I had said the Maryland electors were right in the course which they pursued. I said no such thing. I expressed no opinion on the matter. On the contrary, I declared that I should not undertake to be a judge of other men's consciences; nor would I here undertake to canvass the conduct of individuals in relation to the Government of a sovereign State of this Union, of which they were citizens. This is not the proper forum for such a debate. I also asserted that the course of these electors had nothing in the world to do with the admission of Michigan into the Union.

The question concerning the conduct of the Maryland electors, in refusing to execute the trust for which they had been chosen, is one thing; that of the right of the people of Maryland to alter their State Government, is another. It presents an entirely different case. Were I placed in a situation which rendered it my duty to maintain this right in behalf of that people, I believe I should be able to do it successfully. I should then contend that, being sovereign within their own limits, they had a right to control their own destinies, and change the form of their own Government at pleasure. If I were the citizen of a State, and resided in a city or county where my vote was equivalent only to the one thirtieth or one sixth of the vote of another citizen, in another city or county, whilst I paid the same taxes, as is the case in some portions of Maryland, I should certainly use all my efforts to persuade the Legislature to call a convention for the purpose of redressing a grievance so enormous. If the Legislature should absolutely refuse to grant this just request, I should then endeavor to persuade the people to hold a convention of their own. I would not stir them up to sedition or rebellion; but I would call upon them peaceably and quietly to exert their own sovereign authority in effecting a change in their form of government. I cannot, therefore, condemn in others what I know in my own conscience I should do myself, under similar circumstances. As it is, however, the people of Maryland have the exclusive right to consider and decide this question for themselves. If they are content with their form of government, I have no right to complain. It affects them, not me; and I have been led into these remarks purely on the principle of self-defence. I do not apprehend the slightest danger that they will act rashly. I know, from the character of the American people, to use the language of the declaration of independence, that they "are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed."

I shall certainly not discuss with the Senator the merits of the constitution of South Carolina. It may be, and doubtless is, all which he represents it. I shall not controvert the proposition that it has established the best form of government for South Carolina; because I am comparatively ignorant of its provisions. We have at least one strong proof that it has worked well in practice, in the fact that this State has ever sent an able and distinguished representation to Congress.

It is very true that I did introduce the subject of nullification in my former remarks, but it was strictly upon the principle of a just retaliation. I had then, and have now, no disposition to dwell upon this topic. Some of the leaders of the nullification party, I am proud to believe, I may number among my friends. With more than one of them I had the honor of serving in the other House of Congress, in trying times. I certainly feel no disposition to say a word which might wound their feelings. I have always thought, and still think, the State of South Carolina was wrong; yet I am glad she has got out of her difficulties in such handsome style. I am now about to propose a bargain to the Senator, which is, that if he will never allude, upon this floor, to the domestic concerns of my State, I shall be guided by the same rule in regard to his.

[Mr. CALHOUN said he was perfectly agreed to strike such a bargain with the Senator from Pennsylvania.]

As to Michigan, (said Mr. B.) it is peculiarly unfortunate that all her difficulties have been brought upon her in consequence of our own conduct. Why did not the Senator sound the alarm at the last session, when this admission bill was before the Senate, and proclaim that we were about to recommend a revolutionary measure to her people? That was the appropriate time for him to have urged this objection.

SENATE.]

Admission of Michigan.

[JAN. 5, 1837.]

[Mr. CALHOUN rose to explain. He reminded Mr. B. of the late hour at which the bill had passed. He had spoken again and again, in the course of the debate, and felt reluctant again to occupy the floor; and the particular reason why he had not stated this point of objection was, that, according to his conception, the word convention signified a meeting of the people, duly convened through the action of their own constituted authorities. So he understood the law, and so the people of Michigan understood it, as their action showed.]

Mr. BUCHANAN resumed. The bill, as it originally stood, required the assent of the Legislature of Michigan; but this clause was unanimously stricken out, and the consent of a convention of delegates elected by the people was substituted in its place, by a unanimous vote of the Senate. The bill, as it passed, contains no reference to any interposition by the Legislature.

[Mr. CALHOUN again explained. It was indeed certain that the Legislature could not give their assent to the conditions of that bill, because those conditions touched the State constitution on the question of boundary, and, therefore, no power could assent to those conditions, but a power which was equal to that which made the constitution. This could be done only by a convention; and, in point of fact, it had been a convention which considered it. A convention regularly called was competent to consider and decide upon it, and it is a great mistake to think otherwise. But surely, if a regular convention was incompetent to assent, and thereby change the State constitution, the meeting at Ann Arbor could not be competent.]

Mr. BUCHANAN resumed. I trust that, ere long, we shall get to understand each other. I was about to prove that the Senate, at its last session, unanimously determined in favor of the principle which the gentleman now denounces as revolutionary. What did we then decide? Without a dissenting voice it was then admitted that the Legislature of Michigan, under her constitution, had no authority to give its assent to the condition contained in our bill. How, then, was the assent of the State to be obtained? The boundary line established by the constitution was to be changed, (for I take it for granted the Senator will not contend that the reference contained in that instrument to the act of Congress of 1805 did not fix the boundary.) How, then, I ask again, was the assent of the State to this new boundary to be obtained? The Legislature was out of the question. The Senator has not contended that this assent could only be obtained by a change to be effected in the constitution of Michigan, according to the forms which it prescribes. All that he requires is, that there should have been a previous act of the Legislature; but this would have been no compliance with the organic law. It would have been in direct opposition to it; and, therefore, I would ask, is not the Senator himself, upon his own principles, as great a revolutionist as myself or any other member of this body? If this change of boundary could only have been effected by an amendment to the constitution in the mode prescribed by itself, the proceeding would have been extremely tedious, involving a delay of at least two years, and a majority of two thirds of both branches of the Legislature would have been required. Under its provisions, one third of the people of the State could thus have prevented it from assenting to the conditions of the act of Congress, and from entering the Union. How was the gordian knot to be cut? Only by the great revolutionary principles, if the Senator will have it so, of referring the question directly to the sovereign power of the people of Michigan, in a convention of delegates. This was the course which the Senate took. It was the only course left for us to take. We had no alternative but to appeal to the sovereign power. Ay, sir, to this mad, revolutionary tribunal, which threatens with destruction all that we hold most dear. This appeal was made, too, without any objection on the part of the Senator from South Carolina.

And now let me ask, is there any danger in recognising this proceeding? I do not certainly know whether all the requisite forms have been strictly complied with by the people of Michigan in the election of delegates and in holding the convention; but sufficient evidence has been presented to satisfy my mind as to the substance. I shall not again repeat the facts. I will now barely mention that I have seen, this morning, the journal of the first part of the proceedings of this convention, containing an account of the manner in which the votes for the delegates had been canvassed; and I find that they have proceeded with the same forms as are observed in regard to their other elections.

But the Senator from South Carolina has advanced one most astonishing argument. He holds that, because there were no votes given against assenting to the condition proposed by Congress, therefore, the late convention must have been a mere party caucus. Now, I would draw from that fact a conclusion directly contrary. My inference would be, that there was nobody in Michigan disposed to vote against assenting to the condition. Nobody there has complained of this convention as a revolutionary assembly, or sent us a remonstrance because it was held without a previous act of the Legislature. That tender sensibility which has been manifested, respecting the State rights of the people of Michigan, has not been felt in Michigan itself. The people there have yet to be enlightened upon this subject. I have never yet heard of one dissenting voice; and I believe, for myself, that the proceedings of the convention at Ann Arbor truly represent the feelings of the people.

The sole reason why I did not vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina was, because I thought it necessary to ratify the assent given by the convention, in order to put at rest the question of boundary. Although I believe that the boundary line of Ohio, having been established by act of Congress, would stand without the consent of Michigan, yet I know too well what trouble and difficulty might arise in a contest of this nature, between two sovereign States acknowledging no common umpire. When such States are incidentally brought before the Supreme Court as parties litigant upon such a question, their conflict may shake this Union to its centre. I am for settling the question whilst Michigan is yet in the bud, and putting it at rest forever. It was only for this reason, and not for any miserable party purpose, that I opposed the gentleman's amendment. I believed that our recognition of the assent given by the Ann Arbor convention to the condition which Congress had proposed, was necessary to make a final end of this question. It was for this reason that I could not vote to strike out the preamble.

As to the Baltimore convention, which the Senator has introduced into this debate, I shall say nothing. As I was not a member of that body, I shall leave the defence of its proceedings to the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE.]

And now, sir, I might reply to some other arguments which have been urged by the Senator from South Carolina; but I am unwilling longer to occupy the time of the Senate. I should not have addressed you at all, but for the purpose of putting myself right in regard to my former remarks. The Senator in some parts of his speech has employed—he is in the habit of employing—very strong language, which, were I so disposed, I might apply to myself. As it was general, I shall not presume it was thus intended. I know that his nature is ardent; and, when addressing the Senate, his feelings become excited, and sometimes carry him too far. But we part in peace. Upon the whole, I shall vote for the bill as it now stands, though, if the preamble were rejected, I should hesitate as to what course I ought to pursue.

Mr. CALHOUN here requested a few words of explanation, to which Mr. BUCHANAN signifying his assent, Mr. C. proceeded. The Senator admits that Michigan is a State; that, waiving forms, she was a State as soon as we recognised her constitution. I wish, then, to ask the honorable Senator whether he holds that Congress has a right to call a convention within a State.

Mr. BUCHANAN. To that question I answer, no. Emphatically, no. Congress has no more right to call a convention in South Carolina than in the moon. But, before the State of Michigan has entered the Union, Congress possesses the power of proposing to her a condition, upon a compliance with which she shall be admitted. The proposition thus presented she may accept or reject, according to her will and pleasure; and she may accept it, if she thinks proper, by means of a convention of delegates elected for that purpose, in the manner proposed to her by Congress.

Mr. CALHOUN. Then I would further ask the Senator, has Congress a right to offer a proposition to the people of a State, without addressing their Legislature?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Under the circumstances in which Michigan stood, Congress, in my opinion, had the right to make the proposition which they did make at the last session, and it was for the people of Michigan, in their sovereign capacity, to assent or dissent, as they thought proper.

Mr. CALHOUN. Congress has a right to make propositions to her constituted authorities, and the people of Michigan so understood our act.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The Senator will pardon me for contradicting him. The people of Michigan did not so understand our act. One of the very first acts of the first convention was to declare that the Legislature had no right to call that convention. The sovereign people of Michigan themselves objected to any interposition of their Legislature.

Mr. CALHOUN. Then the whole matter amounts to this: when a State has provided a regular course for amending her own constitution, and the State does not choose to call a convention in conformity with that constitution, Congress may call a convention in that State to alter her State constitution.

Mr. BUCHANAN, (in an under tone.) This may be the gentleman's inference; it is not mine.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, said that, before the question was put upon the bill, he would ask the attention of the Senate while he offered one or two reasons for the vote he was about to give. I voted (said Mr. D.) at the last session in the negative, and propose now to give a vote which I deem to be consistent with that. I shall endeavor in all cases to be consistent with myself, whether I am right or wrong. I gave the vote alluded to from a conviction that it was a proper one, and I shall give a vote now which I am equally convinced is in the course of my duty here. We have come here in obedience to the will of our constituents, and what for? There is but one rule of duty, and it applies equally to us all. I have heard many subjects drawn into this discussion, and which had some, though a very remote, application to it; but here we are under only one great rule of duty. Before we can address this body, we are obliged to go to that table and swear, before Him who is invisible, that we will support the constitution of the United States. Who exacts this duty from us? Is it not the people of this country? And is not this the first and greatest and highest duty we have to perform on this floor? It is idle to talk of sovereigns above the constitution or below it. You have but one guide, and that is your binding compact. You have no right to know any other until that power which created this rule shall alter or amend it. What, then, is the question here? At a former session of Congress a portion of our population, claiming to be a State, presented themselves before us, with a constitution in their hand, and asked for admission into the Union. It is a great question, and I cannot conceive how any other anxiety can be felt in regard to it, but faithfully and honorably to discharge our duty. When this application was received, a controversy immediately arose, and the question presented itself whether Michigan was a State. I came to the conclusion that she was not, and I accordingly voted against her admission. I am now of the same opinion. To me it appears she has undergone no change which so alters her character as to justify an affirmative vote.

Much has been said of the elements of a State. What are they? Without fully answering this question, we can perceive some in which we all agree. There must be population and there must be territory, and I take it that no gentleman will advocate such an absurdity as to maintain that there can be a State, without some fixed limits. We cannot entertain the idea in our mind without thinking of a limited territory. The notion carries absurdity on its very face. How, then, did Michigan present herself before us? She came to our door and proposed to be admitted into the Union with certain defined limits. She said that the people residing within those limits had erected themselves into a State. Can people any where, at their own pleasure, make a State? Can that be done? Let us look at facts. The Territory of Michigan lies within the limits of the United States; it is part and parcel of that territory which is owned, occupied, and possessed, by the United States; for a Territorial Government is under the laws of the country. This Territory had a Governor, a Legislature, and judicial tribunals. It had a Government established and in operation. The Territory was claimed by the United States; the United States Government exercised jurisdiction over it. Will it be said that the people of such a Territory can rise up at pleasure and displace your Government, and yet be guilty of no usurpation? I presume no Senator will answer this question in the affirmative. The people of Michigan certainly held no such doctrine. They came to us and said, we have felt ourselves justified in forming a Government, but we have not done so on revolutionary principles, but under the sanction and according to the provisions of the ordinance of 1787. There they told us we should find the power expressly provided, and on that ordinance they took their stand. Now, what is that ordinance? In the year 1787 the United States owned all the territory north and northwest of the Ohio river, the whole of that region which now constitutes the three States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and the Territories of Michigan and Wisconsin. What did the ordinance provide? After enacting a sort of bill of rights, it declares that three States may be formed immediately north of the Ohio; it runs one north and south line from the mouth of the Wabash, declaring that the territory west of that line should constitute one State. It then runs another north and south line, starting at the mouth of the Great Miami, declaring that the country east of that line and north of the Ohio shall constitute a second State, while the territory between these two lines shall form a third one. This covered the whole region. Here comes the provision on which the people of Michigan relied, as justifying them in the formation of a constitution without the previous action of Congress. I will read it:

"And it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three States shall be subject so far to be altered, that, if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of the said territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan. And whenever any of the said States shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State Government, provided the constitution and Government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in those articles; and, so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period, and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than sixty thousand."

This provision gives to Congress a discretionary power to form either one or two States, at pleasure, out of that remainder of the territory which lies north of an east and west line so drawn as to touch the southernmost extremity of Lake Michigan.

Now, you have made your three States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and you have erected a Territory of Michigan; but where does it go to? How far does it extend? Over the whole country north of this line, embracing what is now called the State of Michigan and the Territory of Wisconsin? I ask if it is not perfectly plain that, according to this ordinance, it is a matter of discretion with Congress to create in that territory one State or two States; and if the power is in Congress, what right have the people of Michigan to settle the question? How can the people of that peninsula settle a precedent question of boundary in the territory of the United States? Have they any such authority? They have none. This ordinance does not give them a particle. On the contrary, the question is left solely and exclusively to the discretion of Congress. And neither in this ordinance, nor any where else, within my reading at least, is authority given to the inhabitants of the peninsula to decide it. But this the people of Michigan undertook to do, and this is the only color of justification they had. The ordinance declared that, whenever there should be a population of sixty thousand people within any of the respective limits which it had laid down, they might be formed into a State, and admitted into the Union. But Michigan, though she had population enough, seemed to forget that no State could exist, until Congress should have first settled the question of boundary, and decided whether there should be in the territory one State or two. Michigan, then, most clearly had no power or authority under this ordinance to erect herself into a State, form a constitution, and demand admission into the Union. She was not a State, nor could she be. How did she come here, then, and what did she claim? By previous acts of Congress, you had given to Illinois a large portion of territory north of the line running east and west through the southern extremity of Lake Michigan; and in respect to Indiana, you had done the same. While Ohio, by a provision in her constitution, claimed another portion north of that line, and, without objecting or assenting to the claim of Ohio, you received her, under that constitution, into the United States; Michigan, in the mean while, claimed the very portions of territory which you had given to Indiana, and which Ohio claimed. She said that the inhabitants of the entire peninsula, as far down as the east and west line already mentioned, had a right to erect themselves into a State, and to form a constitution for the whole. This was the ground on which Michigan came to the Senate. I was not then convinced that any such State existed, and I still remain unconvinced.

But the Senator from Pennsylvania says that we may waive irregularities. Perhaps we might, if the State you were to create had the identical boundaries claimed by Michigan when she formed her constitution, and the people you admit are the same that made the constitution and offered themselves. But what was the feeling here at that time? Was there a man here who would admit that Michigan was then a State? There was not one. You prepared, with great care and caution, a provisional act of admission, which subsequently became a law. And what appears on the face of it? Can any man read that act, and not admit that its passage was necessary because there was no State then? You admitted her on condition; because, by the law, you gave her a new boundary. You excluded her from the territory which you had given to Indiana, as well as from that claimed by Ohio; and, to compensate her, you added territory lying north and west of the lake, large enough for a State; and then you declared that, if she would give her assent to these bounds, she should be admitted into the Union. Was not that admitting that Michigan, as she stood, was not capable of coming in? The question went back to the people of Michigan, and what was done? The Legislature of Michigan called a convention of the people. It met, and considered the question, and finally concluded not to consent to the boundary. But, at a subsequent period, an irregular convention came together by the spontaneous movement of individuals, and without authority from any one—a voluntary collection—and declared its assent. Well, sir, how did that place the matter? You have got the consent of a convention, as it is called; but does that remove the difficulty? What did you send the matter back for? You sent it back that the people of Michigan might alter their constitution, so that the bounds of their State jurisdiction might be changed, by withdrawing jurisdiction from the territory claimed by Ohio and Indiana, and asserting it over the added territory. And has it been done? The constitution has not been changed in a letter. It stands just as it did. The jurisdiction of the State has neither been withdrawn from that territory you gave to Indiana, nor from that claimed by Ohio, nor extended to that which you assigned her on the other side of the lake. How can she extend her jurisdiction to the one, or withdraw it from the other, but by altering her constitution? And is her constitution altered? Not a letter of it. The convention at Ann Arbor claimed no right to alter the constitution, and they had none. By their own constitution there are but two modes provided according to which that instrument can be altered. I need not trouble you with the detail; I will only state that the process must originate with the Legislature. This is the provision of her own constitution. And was not that constitution ratified, in 1835, at the ballot-box? And how can its provisions be waived? Her constitution provides two modes, and it has not been done according to either. The convention did not pretend to alter the constitution; they claimed no such authority. Who was it, then, that came here last year? It was the people of the Territory of the peninsula of Michigan, including a part of Indiana and Ohio. They have not, then, withdrawn their jurisdiction from the lands and people in these two States. They propose the same constitution now that they did then. It was the peninsula of Michigan last year, and it is the peninsula of Michigan this year. The same constitution, the same people; yes, the same that the Senate unanimously refused to admit into the Union.

Much has been said about the injustice of Congress in delaying its action touching the admission of Michigan. The charge may be true, but it does not affect me. I had no part in effecting the delay. But, whatever may have been our fault, it is not to be rectified by the adoption of violent means. We may resort to those measures, but it will not help the argument.

Again; I may say, individually, that I have no objection that Michigan should enter the Union. I believe that the population of that Territory ought to be a State in this Union. My only difficulty refers to the manner of the admission. If there has been no change in their condition since last year, and last year you could waive the difficulty only by calling a convention, why is there not the same difficulty now? If Maryland had presented herself one year alone for admission, and the following year should come in company with Delaware, would the question of admission be the same? Certainly not, because it would not be the same body of people that were asking admission. Nor could a constitution made for Maryland cover Delaware. Yet, by admitting Michigan, you propose to cover with the constitution a great additional territory. Can it be done? Only by doing violence to constitutional principle, and, I will add, to common sense. I do not know that gentlemen can satisfy themselves by saying that the difficulty is immaterial. Is it the same body of people who applied last year? None of them were beyond the lake, and part now to be excluded were in Ohio and Indiana. This constitution neither covers nor asserts jurisdiction over the Territory now proposed to be admitted. Are you not, then, about to admit a State without a constitution? I beg gentlemen to consider this objection. I do not really see how this is to be argued down. How is it to be grappled with? And how is the constitution now offered to be the constitution of that Territory which you propose to admit as a State? I am told that the population is not numerous. Be it so. How does that alter the question?

Admission of Michigan.

[SENATE.]

I will now ask the attention of Senators to another point, and I refer to it without the remotest feeling or thought of unkindness towards those who have been elected Senators from Michigan; on the contrary, it will give me great happiness to be associated with them. But suppose the argument to be true, that under the ordinance of 1787 the people of the peninsula could not create themselves into a State, what does your constitution provide? It requires that the Senators in this hall shall all be elected by the State Legislatures. No other process is provided. Now, I ask, was Michigan a State at the time she exercised the power of appointing these gentlemen? You did virtually say by your law that there was no State then. You did not even undertake to waive the objection on this ground. You said that Michigan had no power to fix her own boundaries, and that she should not have the boundary she had fixed upon, and that the body which had elected their Senators could not, with those boundaries, be received as a State. This is an irregularity that you cannot waive. You cannot legislate members into this body. The constitution is imperative, and there is no such thing as compromising this objection. Now you propose to readmit Michigan, and who will come here as her Senators? Will it not be the very individuals who are thus elected? And the same objection will apply to the member of the other House. The constitution requires that those who vote for members of Congress shall be those who vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. But Michigan, being no State, has no State Legislature; and how is she constitutionally to get members of Congress? I have sworn to support the constitution of the United States. I cannot break that oath from feelings of friendship. I had rather that my friends should suffer, and that the admission of Michigan should be postponed.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said he had hoped that opposition to the bill would have ceased, as was usual, on the second reading. Although he was one of the committee that had been so severely rebuked for reporting the bill, so much time had been consumed with it, that he had determined to say nothing on the subject. As there was an obstinate determination to continue it, he would say a few words to justify the opinion to which he was committed by consenting to the report. He would not indict a regular speech on the Senate. It had already suffered too much by the cruelty of others. In fact, if disposed to do so, he would not know how to commence, or where to begin; whether at Mr. Dallas's letter, the Baltimore convention, the revolutionary spirit of Maryland, or the divine right of Government to perpetuate and enforce its own authority, independent of the constituent power. These subjects had principally taken the place of the one before the Senate. A very strained effort had been made to raise the question into a magnitude and importance which did not belong to it. It was simply one of fact, unless we were disposed to unsettle every thing which had been determined at the last session, and trace the history of society from its earliest stages to the irregular organization of the Territory of Michigan. As one of the committee, he had not done this, nor should he do it now. He had confined himself to the fact, whether the people of Michigan had accepted the terms we had proposed to them. On this subject, he had examined the evidence, weighed it, and come to a conclusion. He had the kind and quantity of testimony which he would require to convince him on any similar occasion. It had not, to be sure, as had been required by the Senator from Carolina, the technical formalities that would entitle it to admission "in a justice's court." They had not the witnesses, book in hand, to prove the handwriting of the note or the signature to the bond. And who ever heard of such evidence being required as the foundation of legislation? Nations did not legislate on the technical evidence required by a justice's court. They acted on such probabilities as produced moral conviction of the existence of a fact. We legislate every day on printed papers, without seeing the originals; on certificates, not under oath; on publications and letters; and even sometimes the most important legislation was based on public rumor; public evidence being sufficient, in many cases, for public purposes. The great object was to be convinced, without regard to technicalities in the means of conviction, which were well enough in "justice's courts," but could not be required in the business of legislation, where the very notoriety of every proceeding rendered imposition less probable.

North Carolina, he said, had been referred to. Well, it was possible that a majority of the people of North Carolina had never expressly consented to come into the Union. He ventured to say that no strictly technical evidence that a majority voted was required on her admission, such as would have passed a court of justice. And North Carolina might undertake to prove hereafter that a majority never consented, though she had never made any objection, and had long received the benefits and performed the duties of a member of the Union. But this was very improbable. The same possibility existed in the case of Michigan. Though the most important subject ever agitated among the people had been fully agitated in every part of that State; though public elections were held in every county but two; though it was well known what was the subject of the convention; though it was well known that its only object was to reverse the decision of a previous convention, on a subject which they ranked among the dearest of their interests; although these delegates publicly met, publicly deliberated, and publicly decided unanimously on the subject on which they were called to deliberate, and publicly went home among their constituents, from whom we have heard not one syllable of complaint, either by letter, public meeting, legislative remonstrance, or even a newspaper paragraph; although we knew all these things to have taken place by the proofs before us, and not brought into doubt by a single whisper of evidence on the other side, yet it may be possible that the majority of the people disapprove the proceedings of this convention; but it was one of the most improbable things that ever happened in the course of human events. He could not be influenced by possibilities so remote, and was therefore satisfied that the people of Michigan had consented to the terms proposed to them by Congress, to agree to a boundary and come into the Union.

But some gentlemen, admitting this, insisted that the proceeding was revolutionary; that to allow the people, in primary assemblies, "to set themselves up above the legislative authority," (to use their own language,) struck at the very foundation of our institutions. This was strange doctrine at the present day. It was the doctrine of the house of Stuart, and of Bourbon of Austria, and of Brandenburg. It was the doctrine of the holy alliance. It was the doctrine of despotism. It was a doctrine long since exploded, he had thought, by all free Governments, particularly by our own; and if he thought there were any material portion of the people of the United States who entertained such doctrines, he should feel as much real alarm as gentlemen had imagined they felt at the proposition of the committee. The whole of our institutions, both State and Federal, were based on this "monstrous principle," and had no other right to rest on.

The debate had been a most extraordinary one. Gentlemen had conjured up frightful pictures, and then got frightened at the works of their own imaginations. The Senator from Ohio had stated himself to be a plain matter-of-fact man. He certainly would not question the veracity of his friend as a man of truth; but if he would allow him to call his errors misapprehensions or mistakes, he would join issue with him on his statement that he was "a plain matter-of-fact man." He (Mr. K.) had never known so many rhetorical flourishes, flights of fancy, irrelevant references, and false analogies, brought into any discussion upon any grave and important question. Something like the visions of Constantine were revived. Armies were seen marching and counter-marching in the air, belted with "Bowie knives and duelling pistols." Terrific scenes of liberty trampled under foot, bugles, bayonets, bombs, and blunderbusses, haunted the minds of gentlemen, as the sure consequences of the proposed measure. After these, and many such fancies, (said Mr. K.) which gentlemen have connected with this measure, they prove it all by what they call coming to the point, with a grave proposition—and that is, "if we establish the principle, say they, that the Federal Government can call a convention in one of the States in this Union, liberty is lost, the constitution is gone." Despotism, they think, will stalk unopposed over the land, and all State rights will vanish like a sprite.

One who had heard all this waste of eloquence on this proposition, and who knew nothing of the matter, would naturally suppose that some such proposition was fairly the subject of discussion. But, so far from this, nothing even like it had been proposed or maintained. Congress had not called any convention in one of the States of the Union, or even in Michigan, who was not in the Union. The plain truth was, that Michigan had been a Territory, and founded a constitution and State Government, somewhat irregularly, and applied for admission into the Union. Congress, after much debate, agreed to waive all previous irregularity, and allow Michigan to be a separate and independent community. But, at the same time, we virtually said to Michigan, that, under the constitution she had formed, her boundaries were uncertain and equivocal; that she would probably insist on boundaries that would include territory of which we had a right to form another State, or had already transferred to others. We did not wish to bring a quarrel into the confederacy, by her admission with unsettled boundaries, and therefore we could not admit her until her people, in convention, should agree to a boundary proposed. This was the whole affair. A very simple matter, when plainly stated and fairly debated. There was no "call" of a convention by Congress, in a State of the Union, or any where else. There was no law to be enforced, or disobedience to be punished. No federal officer was to be sent by an executive despot to hang up the refractory. It was only a proposition made to Michigan, in answer to one made by her, which, if she accepted, she was to come into the Union, and if not, she remained out of it. The awful consequences existed only in the imaginations of gentlemen who exerted themselves to give a fictitious importance to this bill.

But (continued Mr. K.) gentlemen ask, why did Congress refer this matter to the people of Michigan, and what right had the people to act without the authority of the Legislature? Why, just because Congress knew, after looking at the constitution of Michigan, that the Legislature had no more power to act than it had to change the succession of the seasons, or abolish the community which it was organized to represent. If Michigan were a State, and not in the Union, this consent involved an important change in her organic law, besides a change of boundary; for, by consenting to the condition we had proposed, her people parted with all the important rights of sovereignty which were surrendered to the General Government by each of the States.

An organic law could only be changed by the people in an elementary state of society, above the constitution, unless the constitution provided for the change. A free constitution was only a political power of attorney, containing the principles on which the Government should be administered, conferring powers for the purposes named in it, until revoked by the constituent authority. The Legislature had to look for their powers in the constitution, and could not go beyond them. But to say the people, in their high sovereign capacity, had no power to change or modify, or even abolish, their constitution, when not restrained by the federal constitution, was equivalent to saying that a merchant could not revoke a power of attorney given for commercial purposes. Even where the constitution contained a provision authorizing the Legislature to call a convention, it might still be likened to a power of substitution in commercial persons, where both the original power and power of substitution were subject to the control of the principal. States, however, should never change their constitutions for light causes; but where a necessity existed, the right was unquestionable. It was a revolutionary right, as was every right to change a constitution of Government, however slight the change. It was, he said, no less a revolutionary right, when exercised peaceably, than when it was exercised by force, which only became necessary when the right was opposed.

Mr. K. said the Legislature might call a convention when there was no express provision in the constitution to do so; but the convention derived no additional authority from the call; it was only recommendatory. But if the people met, as recommended, and acted upon their organic law, the subsequent ratification would supply the previous want of authority. In whatever way they might be convened, however, their acts were not irrevocable by themselves, but it was a striking feature in the case of Michigan, that both the conventions seemed to have understood perfectly well that the Legislature had no right to intermeddle in the matter; and they accordingly both protested against it. This was a principle so palpable, that all classes and all parties seem to have understood it in that new State, however difficult it seemed to be for some gentlemen to understand it here. Mr. K. thought that the matter had been rightly referred to the people themselves, independent of the Legislature, as they alone were capable of making these important surrenders of sovereignty.

[SENATE.]

Mr. K. then briefly noticed some remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] who had stated that Michigan could not be a State, as, when she formed her constitution, she had no fixed boundaries. The Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. K. said, had insisted that a fixed boundary was inseparable with the idea of a State; and as the United States had claim at least to a part of the territory over which Michigan claimed jurisdiction when she framed her constitution, she could not be considered as a separate State. Mr. K. said it was perfectly true that a nation must have a territory over which it exercised jurisdiction; but an undisputed boundary was not essential to an independent State. A community might be independent, and very powerful too, whose boundaries were not well defined. Our own boundary was disputed in the Northeast; and who could state the precise boundaries of Russia? Yet Russia and the United States were none the less independent communities of people because their boundaries were not well settled.

Mr. K. then adverted to the preamble to the bill, which had been so strongly objected to that some gentlemen were willing to vote for the bill if the preamble were stricken out. He said, as both Michigan and Ohio now wanted the restriction removed, and Michigan admitted without restriction, he would certainly have no objection, if no body else were concerned but Michigan and Ohio. If these States had any disinterested love of fighting, if he were to consult his own feelings, he would say, let them go at it and fight it out. But a community of States, he thought, should act on the same principle as a community of individuals. They should keep the peace among disorderly members. It would frequently gratify two bullies to settle a quarrel in the public streets, surrounded by a mob, but no well-organized community would permit such disorder. This squabble between Michigan and Ohio, about a few acres of ground, might set the whole Union into a blaze, and possibly cost the Government millions of dollars to put it down. If the restriction were retained, he had no doubt Michigan would continue to observe it in good faith, and we should hear no more about it. We should, most likely, avoid the horrors of another Toledo campaign. He had, therefore, thought it best to retain the preamble, and not repeal the condition; and he hoped the bill would pass, and pass just as it was.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and it was passed, by yeas and nays, as follows:

NAYS--Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, Moore, Prentiss, Southard, Swift--10.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 6.

BUILDING FOR UNITED STATES COURTS AT PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, praying that an appropriation may be made for the erection of a suitable building for the accommodation of the courts of the United States, and also for the erection of a penitentiary at that city.

Mr. B. said, in presenting the petition, I recommend it to the consideration of the Judiciary Committee. I can say we have brought the penitentiary system in Pennsylvania to perfection. Our plan has become a model, not only in many parts of this country, but in Europe. And as it will be necessary, at no remote time, for the United States to erect penitentiaries, it appears to me that there is not a more suitable place where to commence than Philadelphia.

Mr. CALHOUN called for the reading of the memorial; and it having been read, Mr. C. said he had no objection to its being referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; but he hoped they would pause and weigh the question a long time before they would give their assent to our commencing a penitentiary system of the United States. There was patronage enough exercised by the General Government already--its powers were great and extensive, without their being introduced into a State. He objected to a State and General Government acting together. He merely threw out these suggestions to the committee, in the hope that they would pause a long time before they would give their sanction to the commencement of the proposed system.

Mr. GRUNDY said he did not object to the reference of the memorial to the committee of which he was a member. But as to pausing a long time on the subject, he had made up his mind, and he would say that, so far as he could judge of the disposition of his colleagues, they would not pause for any length of time; for the committee would report in a few days, not only on the subject of penitentiaries, but on court-houses also.

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked that he was sorry to hear that the chairman of the Judiciary committee had made up his mind on the subject. It appeared to him (Mr. B.) that at some period, not very remote, it would be necessary for the Government of the United States to erect penitentiaries. How could it be avoided? As long as the Government of the United States are a Government executing their own laws, and punishing offenders against them, they must make some provisions for their punishment. The States, without entertaining any hostility to the Government of this Union, might find it very inconvenient to accommodate the prisoners sentenced by virtue of the laws of the United States. What was to be done? Were they to be set at liberty? Were they not to receive the punishment inflicted by the laws? He could not suppose that any State would not show a proper comity to the United States courts. But suppose it should happen that they were unable or unwilling to do this, in what a situation would the Government be placed? He could not, he confessed, see in this thing any interference with the rights or the liberties of the States. He had no idea that his calling the attention of the Judiciary Committee to the subject would have caused the least debate, or he would not have done it.

The petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, (Mr. EWING, of Ohio, having been called home by sickness in his family,) the Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution repealing the Treasury order of July last, &c. The question being on the substitute offered by Mr. RIVES, for refusing, by the United States, the paper of such banks as should issue bills under certain specified denominations--

Mr. SOUTHARD addressed the Senate on the subject at large, in continuation and conclusion of his former remarks on the subject, as given entire in preceding pages.

THE MINT BILL.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, when Mr. SOUTHARD had concluded his remarks, this subject and all the other previous orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives supplementary to the act for establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, extending the limit of wastage allowed to the chief coiner, from one one-thousandth part to one and a half one-thousandth part, was adopted, and the bill, so amended, was reported to the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT entered into various explanatory details, showing some small changes contemplated by the bill.

After which, the bill was ordered to lie upon the table, but subsequently was taken up, and ordered to a third reading.

After transacting some other business, the Senate spent a short time in executive business.

MONDAY, JANUARY 9.

The CHAIR presented the credentials of the Hon. SAMUEL PRENTISS, re-elected Senator for six additional years, from the State of Vermont.

Also, the credentials of Hon. WILLIAM C. PRESTON, re-elected Senator from the State of South Carolina.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution rescinding the Treasury order of July, 1836.

The question being on Mr. RIVES's substitute, Mr. STRANGE rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: It was not my purpose to have addressed the Senate to-day, but as some gentlemen, who desire to be heard on this question, have deferred their preparation from an expectation that I would occupy the floor, I am unwilling that inconvenience should result to a member of this body from any misconception arising from intimations I may have given. Therefore, although not prepared to my own satisfaction, I will ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments. I could have voted upon the original resolutions of the Senator from Ohio sub silentio, because, in so doing, my vote would have explained itself; but in adopting the substitute of the Senator from Virginia, I shall be placed in an equivocal position before my constituents, and therefore think it necessary that certain explanatory comments should accompany my vote. I will not deny, that as thoughts flowed in upon my mind during the discussion of the original question, I occasionally felt disposed to give them utterance; but prudence, that cowardly and sometimes assassin virtue, destroyed each embryo purpose as soon as it was formed. But now she changes sides, and whispers me that it is due to myself, and those whom I have the honor in part to represent, to crave the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments.

I am opposed to the original resolutions, because they proposed to rescind an executive order. I do not mean by this a mere verbal criticism, for I suppose the honorable Senator really meant what his resolution contained, and proposes to rescind or repeal an executive order by a vote of the National Legislature; and this, with due deference, I conceived to be a manifest solecism. The legislative, executive, and judicial departments of this Government are wisely separated by the constitution, and one cannot interfere with the province of another. The legislative prescribes rules for the executive and judiciary, but cannot itself perform any legislative or judicial function, except in the special cases set forth in the constitution. Congress may, if it be necessary and proper, command the Executive to repeal the Treasury order, but cannot itself repeal it. Congress passes laws for the government of every citizen, from the highest to the lowest, and at his own peril he yields or withholds obedience. As well, and even with more propriety, might the Supreme Court say it repeals an act of Congress, when it pronounces it unconstitutional, and refuses to enforce it. And as well might Congress say it repeals a decision of the Supreme Court, when that decision, having opened its eyes to some defect in the existing law, induces it to prescribe a new rule for future action. Even when the decisions of the court are palpably repugnant to the existing law, Congress cannot repeal them. Congress may direct what decisions shall be made in future, but cannot repeal those already published. Neither can it repeal the decisions of the Executive. The Legislature prescribes rules for the government of both these departments, and to each of them it must be left to apply them; and each must, in the first instance, judge how far its own actions square with the rules prescribed, upon its own official responsibility. A direct declaration of repeal, therefore, must be altogether inoperative, and of course an absurdity. The truth is, this Treasury order is altogether an executive act, and can only be undone by executive authority. Congress may command its repeal, and doubtless the Executive would yield such command respectful obedience. But it strikes me there is something in the mode of this undertaking to effect the repeal of the Treasury order, not consistent with strict parliamentary propriety; at least, not altogether consistent with the professed purpose of those who desire its repeal. It is laid down in Jefferson's Manual, the highest authority acknowledged by us in such matters, that "When the House commands any thing, it is by order. But facts, principles, their own opinions and purposes, are expressed in the form of resolutions." Now, the resolutions before us, while they assume the name of resolutions, effect the office of orders, and to perform more, as I think I have before shown, than even an order would be competent to accomplish.

But, again, I am opposed to the resolutions, because they propose to prescribe a rule, unnecessarily, as I conceive, in a matter where, from its nature, a large discretion is desirable, being highly convenient, and in no degree liable to dangerous use. I know it is the fashion of the day to suppose that the executive authority is the only one liable to abuse, or in any way likely to threaten the liberties of the country. Among the blessings, Mr. President, for which we of the present day are debtors to Heaven, there are none, politically speaking, for which we have more just reason to be grateful, than that the formation of our constitution has not been left to our own hands; that we have received it ready formed, in all its beautiful proportions, by men who seem to have been commissioned by Heaven for this very thing. Surrounded by an atmosphere just purified by the storms and convulsions of the Revolution, every one feeling more strongly than any other want that of an equal, wise, and impartial Government, they addressed themselves to the task with no faculty biased by local or personal passions. They sought for truth with their visual organs purged from the mists of prejudice, and they found her. They listened to her inspired instructions, and penned the happy constitution under which we now live, the envy of other nations, and the pride of our own. They divided Government into three departments, and prescribed the sphere in which each should move. Harmony and safety will ever attend its action, while each strictly observes the law of its creation. But it is difficult to say from which the most direful results are to be apprehended, should it with eccentric movement forsake its natural orbit, and invade those of its sister planets. Viewing this matter in the light of experience, we should be led to suppose that from the legislative department there was the greatest reason for jealousy of usurpation, or invasion of the province of others. The most remarkable and desolating revolutions of which modern history furnishes an account are those of England and France, and the complete prostration of the executive and judicial authorities beneath the feet of the legislative marked those sanguinary events. But to press this portion of the subject no farther, suffice it to say, that true wisdom dictates to each department great forbearance towards the others, and a no less scrupulous abstinence from infringing upon their rights, than a jealous care of its own. The collection of the revenue is strictly an executive act. The Legislature, to be sure, can alone prescribe the subjects of revenue, and the mode of its collection; but the funds, to use the language of the resolution, in which receivable, is, in the general, a fair subject to be left to the Executive, under the constitution, and the broad range of circumstances which may from time to time arise. The general principle, certainly, (from which neither common reason nor convenience will allow of any wide departure,) is, that the public revenue should be collected in what is obviously equivalent to so much gold and silver, the acknowledged standards of value both by the constitution and the usage of trade. What is so equivalent must depend greatly upon circumstances continually fluctuating—the currents of trade, and the peculiar application for which any given portion of the revenue is designed. Sometimes the ease of the citizen may be consulted to a great extent, in perfect consistency with the security of the Treasury; and at others, nothing short of the precious metals themselves will serve the purposes of the public demands. I do not mean to say that Congress has not the power of dictating even the funds in which the revenue may be paid, or that there is any thing improper in her doing so; but that, in general, the officer whose business it is to supervise the Treasury, in his turn under the supervision of the Executive, will be well capable of judging, and much more competent to act to the advantage of the public, under sudden emergencies, (which no human sagacity is sufficient to foresee,) when untrammelled by rigid, inflexible rules; and, therefore, unless strong considerations call for the enactment of such rules, it is far better to leave him with the responsibility upon his own shoulders, which, without such enactments, would rest there. Thus the executive class of public officers would be stimulated to more activity; feeling, in addition to their responsibility to us, the representatives of the people, a direct responsibility to them, our common masters, for the wisdom and fidelity of their action.

I am further opposed to the resolutions, because they proceed upon a principle altogether unknown to custom, and directly at war with sound policy. In general, either a public or private agent is bound to collect the debts of his principal in specie, or something clearly its equivalent; his undivided attention should be directed to the interest of him whom he represents. Truly, that disposition to oblige, which, with rare exceptions, characterizes all intelligent men, and still more, in public matters, that love of popularity by which alone, in our country, men are either elevated to office or suffered long to retain it, are ample guarantees that the debtor will not be subjected to inconveniences not demanded by the agent's own responsibility to his principal; and these are all that have been heretofore thought safe to allow the debtor, or at all reasonable for him to ask. In fact, it generally happens that consultation of his own ease in making his collections with the least labor and trouble, the law of kindness, and the love of popularity, induce the agent to relax from an observance sufficiently rigid of the interests of his principal, and to receive payment in funds not the most valuable, if not, in many cases, somewhat doubtful. Such seems to have been at one time, to a very alarming extent, the fiscal experience of this Government. But these resolutions propose to spur the flying steed, to impose that as an obligation towards which there is already a natural and dangerous proclivity. They propose essentially to change the office of the head of the Treasury Department, and, requiring him to overlook the security of the national property, compel him to receive the national dues in a class of funds from which the debtor, having the right of selection, will of course choose what will be most easily obtained, and consequently, in all probability, the least safe and valuable.

I am again opposed to the resolutions, because, as I conceive, they are intended to censure the President of the United States. If any doubt rested upon the mind, upon the mere perusal of the resolutions themselves, that doubt must cease as soon as we listen to the comments of their advocates, and the reasons which urge them to their support. Some of the reasons upon which they are avowedly supported are the evil motives ascribed to the President, in causing the issue of the Treasury order they are designed to repeal. He is, in effect, charged with falsehood; for the Treasury order bears upon its face, doubtlessly under his own authority and direction, the motives which induced him to give it existence; and we are here publicly told that his true motives were of an altogether different kind; thus directly charging him with an attempt to deceive the public, in placing before it false motives for his official action. But this is not all. He is not only charged with falsehood, but at least one of the motives imputed to him is in itself altogether base and dishonorable. We are told that some of the land speculators alluded to in the order were his own particular friends, whose interest he was solicitous to promote; that they have already made large investments in the public lands, and are threatened with loss, or at least a necessity of holding for an inconvenient length of time, should the United States continue to be a competitor with them in unrestricted sales; and that, while the United States is demanding specie, they, by selling for paper, would acquire a preference in the market, and be enabled to command better prices; thus making the President of the United States, in forgetfulness of his high station and his well-earned honors, to sell the latter for trash to enrich his friends, and prostitute the former to gratify their avarice. Another motive assigned is, that being in heart opposed to the deposit law of the last session, he was desirous of throwing every difficulty in the way of its execution, to verify the evil omens uttered by himself and friends in relation to it, and to render it odious in the eyes of the people. To accomplish all this, the Treasury order was framed, in the hope that the pressure and embarrassments it should produce might be imputed to the deposit act. It may be that the President of the United States was not well inclined to the deposit act, and that in truth it is a mischievous measure, some of the evils of which are now demonstrating themselves; that those are now feeling them who could not in any other way be brought to dream of their existence; that in fact the connexion between present difficulties and the deposit act is so intimate as to make it appear that one was got up by previous design to accompany the other. But however all this may be, it is well known the present Chief Magistrate is not a man to accomplish his views by any indirection; that a bold and manly, and, as his enemies think, a rash and reckless policy, is one of his characteristics. Yet gentlemen who advocate these resolutions ascribe to him conduct highly disingenuous, and motives exceedingly dishonorable. It is not my wish, in malice, to impugn the motives of any one; and if I should refer unfavorably to the motives of a party, I hope no gentleman within or without these walls will consider it personal to himself, or springing, in the slightest degree, from individual feeling. We are all men, and are all liable to have our judgment warped, however clear and intuitive originally, by the allurements of persuasion, the fascination of affection, the delusions of prejudice, or the madness of passion; and when I find myself differing with another, I am always willing to suppose, and have it supposed, that either he or myself have fallen under subjection to one of these malignant influences.

There are gentlemen still living, and on the theatre of public action, whose fame once fired my infant soul with admiration, and whose fame I still cherish as the boast of my country. But God has given to every rational and responsible being faculties by which he is bound to try the actions and opinions of others as well as his own; he must be obedient to their decisions, and not suffer himself to be led captive at the chariot wheels of authority. Tried by this standard, I have found those whom I once viewed as little less than demigods, men of like passions with myself, and in like manner subject to idols, as the learned Lord Bacon has been pleased to term the various delusions to which the human mind is exposed. While, therefore, I am still disposed to accord to them the fame they so justly merit, and allow to them at the same time patriotism equal to that of Curtius, who sealed his with his life, I yet see in them motives to assail the present administration well calculated to mislead them, and find in them a practice of indiscriminate condemnation of all its measures. Like the Jews of old, their cry continually is, "can any good come out of Nazareth?" They must be indulged in the cry, but it is the duty of every one who loves his country to answer that cry, in all its various modifications, whenever he shall believe it groundless, with instant denunciation, lest the people become deluded by it, and stimulated, as of old, to the sacrifice of their best friend, their truest benefactor. Let me not be misunderstood. Much as I esteem and admire General Jackson as a patriot and wise statesman, let it not be said I have ever uttered the blasphemous thought that he bears the most remote comparison with the sacred personage who fell a victim to Jewish persecution. But I do insist that to these original resolutions it is a just cause of resistance that they are designed to swell the cry of disapprobation against an administration pronounced, as I understand, by Nathaniel Macon, the political patriarch of North Carolina, the best this country has ever witnessed.

But this objection is intimately connected with another; and that is the tendency of the adoption of these resolutions to the re-establishment of the United States Bank. The whole of the party with whom I have the honor to act concur in the opinion that this institution cannot exist consistently with the constitution; and many who differ from us in other matters unite with us in believing it one highly dangerous to the public weal. But these are questions not now for discussion; they may be considered as settled by the verdict of the people. But, sir, a new trial is moved for, and all sorts of devices are set on foot to prepare the mind of the only tribunal which can decide whether or not it shall be granted to lend a favorable ear to the application. None is more likely to be successful than the conviction that the fiscal concerns of the country are prone to gross mismanagement without it. If, therefore, Congress shall, by the adoption of these resolutions, give color to such a belief, gentlemen have already warned us in their speeches of the bearing it is likely to have upon the question of the recharter of the United States Bank. This recharter is, in my humble opinion, the main object for the accomplishment whereof the present administration is abused and vilified, and all the other party machinery set to work. Among other things, with the cunning characteristic of a certain little animal common in our country, the bank pretends to be dead. But it is a delusion; the monster is not dead; it does not even sleep. I owe it to the respectable gentlemen connected with that institution, some of them my highly esteemed personal friends, to say that my hostility to the bank is entirely political. To more able, and, for aught I know, more honest hands, hearts, and heads, than some who have heretofore held some control of its affairs, they could not have been committed. But, even with them, flagrant abuses have attended its administration, and the freedom of elections, that life-spring of our political system, been seriously threatened. If these things happen in the green tree, what will be done in the dry? If honest men are borne away upon the tide of human passion, what may we expect when, as in the common course of things may well happen, mere stock-jobbers and knaves shall rule over its destinies? Every tendency, then, to its recharter ought to be resisted, even if the problem were demonstrated that we could not manage our fiscal concerns so well without it.

These, sir, are some of the reasons that would have indisposed me a priori to support the original resolutions. But gentlemen say they ought to be adopted, and the order rescinded, because it was issued in contemptuous disregard of the opinion of the Senate, expressed at its last session. If this be so, it is a grievous fault; and that the alleged perpetrator hath not been called upon more grievously to answer it, is, to my mind, proof positive that the accusation is groundless. The circumstance which, as I suppose, gives color to this charge is, that at the last session of Congress it was proposed in the Senate to adopt a resolution substantially conformable to the present Treasury order, which a majority of the Senate refused to do. To test this matter, let us suppose the administration the private agent of a private individual, whom we will imagine to be Congress. In some of those moments when the mouth unconsciously pours forth the fulness of the heart, the agent overhears his principal, while casting over in his mind the large estates of which he is the proprietor, and the vast sums of money which, by way of rent, are pouring into his coffers, "I believe," says he, "I will instruct my agent to receive nothing but gold and silver from my tenants." He debates the matter over with himself, and finally concludes to give his agent no instructions upon the subject. But gold and silver are the legal currency of the country, and the agent, of his own head and imagination, compels the tenants to pay in gold and silver. They complain that it would have been far easier for them to have paid in the notes of specie-paying banks. With what justice could the principal complain that he had been contemptuously treated by his agent, because he had not construed his not commanding him to demand gold and silver, as an instruction not to demand gold and silver? I confess, had I the honor to have been at the head of the Treasury Department, I should have reasoned in this way. Notwithstanding a proposal to give me special instructions upon this matter, Congress has thought it expedient to leave me to my own discretion, upon my official responsibility, and expects me to adopt such measures as this novel crisis of affairs may, from time to time, require. My situation is difficult and delicate, and it behooves me, with statesmanlike eye, to survey the scene; and, with manly and judicious firmness, to adopt such measures as are demanded by the exigency. Puerile fears, or irresolution, on my part, may endanger the whole national treasure. But we are told that the Executive has no right to consider the state of affairs; no right to take any measures with reference to the currency of the country, or the disposal of the public lands. That these are matters exclusively with Congress. Indeed, sir! and, pray, why have we any Executive at all? Why does not Congress just pass laws, and place their execution in the hands of agents of their own selection and appointment? Simply because our forefathers were too wise to adopt any such form of government. They knew that a perpetual legislative body was the most tyrannical of all institutions, and that intervals in its sessions, as well as its existence, were essential to liberty. But they did not intend that, during those intervals, the vessel of state should float down the stream of events without a pilot. No, sir, they constituted a responsible Executive; responsible to the great sovereign power from whom, and by whom, he is called to the exercise of high, useful, and honorable functions. Where the Legislature prescribes for him particular rules, provided they be such as the constitution allows them to prescribe, he is bound to follow them with implicit obedience; but, where they have omitted to do so, the broad chart of the constitution is the only limit to a discretion which he is not only at liberty but is bound to exercise. He is criminally negligent if, within those limits, he fails to adopt such measures as the public exigencies may demand. He has not only a right, but is bound, to judge when such exigencies exist, and so to frame his measures as to pass them in safety. Whether he acts, or forbears to act, he has not only to encounter the strict ordeal of public opinion, but may be called upon to answer, on impeachment, for excess on the one hand, or laggard indifference on the other. And is the right of judging to be denied him, when such responsibility for events rests upon his shoulders? When not only the fame which has been his passport to high distinction is to be snatched from him by the decision of his cotemporaries, and himself tried and degraded upon a formal proceeding, but the page which bands his name down to posterity marked with the opprobrious words of tyrant, usurper, knave, fool, or coward?

Try him as a private agent to whom you have committed your affairs. A wide space intervenes—seas roll between you, or for some other reason he is not within reach of instruction. An important crisis takes place, and by a single step he may make your fortune. The crisis passes, and the step is not taken. You hear of this crisis, and, believing that you have trusted your affairs to a wise man, you do not doubt that all that was proper to have been done has been done. When next you meet your agent, you say to him, "Where are the golden ingots you have amassed for me? where the treasures of Ethiopia and the Indies?" "I have them not," replies your agent. "Why," you inquire, "did you not perform such and such an act?" "I did not," the agent doggedly replies; "you did not tell me to do it." Would you not seize him by the throat, and indignantly exclaim, "Stupid dolt! did I tell you not to do it?" Tell me not, then, that the most important public agent may doze in the palace provided for his accommodation, and move only when quickened into action by legislative impulse.

But this brings us to another point. Senators say that Congress has already prescribed the rule in this case, and declare that this order is in violation of it, and therefore illegal; and upon this point, methought, the other day, the highly distinguished Senator from Massachusetts "bit his thumb at us." I do not mean to say that that gentleman knew any thing of the character, or even the name, of the humble Senator from North Carolina, but he alluded to a class to which I have the honor to belong. I know that the Senator from Massachusetts wields a ponderous lance, and with the arm of a giant, and I should be loth to encounter its deadly thrust. But he has, as I think, assumed to himself ground on which a stripling might venture to assail him. As an eagle, "towering in his pride of place," may drop a feather from his plumage, destined at some future day to give force and direction to the arrow which wounds him, so did the Senator from Massachusetts, in one of those able effusions which contributed to place him on that enviable elevation he now occupies, furnish arguments, strong and irresistible, against the position he has now thought proper to assume. If the Treasury order is illegal, I would ask, in the first place, what need of further legislation? Does a law derive more efficacy from repetition? Or does its obligation depend upon the number of ponderous tomes it may fill? If gentlemen really believe there is a law now existing which overreaches the Treasury order, are they not sporting with us when they ask us to pass another? If the Executive is in fact regardless of a law passed in 1816, will he be more mindful of a law passed in 1837? But let us hear what law is violated, or, rather, alleged to be violated. The Senator from Massachusetts, in a speech delivered in 1816, informs us that by the statute all duties and taxes were required to be paid in the legal money of the United States or in Treasury notes. What was the legal money of the United States? At that time Congress had legalized no money except gold and silver, and United States Bank notes; and, of course, if only legal money was receivable, nothing but gold and silver, and Treasury notes, and United States Bank notes, were receivable; but the following joint resolution was then adopted:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the 20th day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States."

And this, it is said, compels the Secretary of the Treasury to receive in payment of public dues, at the option of the debtor, either gold or silver, or Treasury notes, or United States Bank notes, or notes of banks which are paid or payable on demand in legal money. Language, I suppose, Mr. President, is subject to various interpretations, according to the relationship which the speaker bears to the subject-matter. As, for instance, if a creditor, addressing his agent, should say to him, "You must collect for me either gold and silver, or Treasury notes, or United States Bank notes, or notes of specie-paying banks," could he understand him in any other sense than that he would be satisfied with either, leaving to his agent to collect in either fund, according to the dictate of convenience? If the creditor should intend to assume the singular attitude of speaking mainly in behalf of his debtor, ought not the agent to be distinctly apprized, in some way, that such was the fact, before he could be justly charged with disobedience of orders in not allowing the debtor to choose the fund in which he should pay? And would not every one be filled with astonishment, should a debtor be found unreasonable enough to insist to the agent, that, upon any instructions he might have received from his principal, he, the debtor, acquired a right of action against him for declining to obey those instructions? But the Senator from Massachusetts will not, I am persuaded, differ with me upon this principle of law: that in construing statutes, reference may be had to the old law, the mischief, and the remedy. What does the history of the times inform us was the old law, and the mischief, at the adoption of the resolution of 1816? The Senator from Massachusetts, in the speech above referred to, informs us that "all duties and taxes were required to be paid in the legal money of the United States, or in Treasury notes." This was the old law. The mischief, we learn from the same authority, was, "that the notes of banks of a hundred different descriptions, and almost as many different values; had been received, and were still received." What, then, was the remedy intended by Congress? To give the Secretary a wider latitude in favor of the debtor, or to correct the mischief, and instruct him entirely with reference to the production of a more healthy state of the Treasury? Most obviously the latter; and I doubt not that fifteen years ago it would have been esteemed, by gentlemen of all parties, the most wild chimera imaginable, in any public debtor to have set up the preference of selecting the fund in which he would pay off his responsibility. And yet it is urged, by way of authority upon this point, that the President of the United States has so construed the resolution of 1816, as is evinced by his advising Congress to remove the obligation upon the Treasury to receive United States Bank notes in payment of public dues. But this, I think, does not at all contribute to the proof of the proposition contended for, as it is evident that the obligation alluded to by the President is that contained in the charter of the United States Bank, and not to any command, either express or implied, in the joint resolution of 1816. There is nothing on the score of authority, but, on the contrary, I believe I am warranted in saying that the weight of authority is the other way; as in effect the operations of the United States Bank, while the fiscal agent of the country, amounted to the actual collection of specie from Government debtors, so that the charge of illegality on this ground is not sustained either by argument or authority. And, indeed, I think it is in effect abandoned by the admission that the Secretary of the Treasury might refuse to receive in Maine notes payable in Georgia, and vice versa; or, in other words, that he is at liberty to judge whether the fund offered is worth so much gold and silver at the place offered, although it may be at par, or even above par, at some other place. But another case may be put, for which the resolution would have provided, if it had been intended, in all cases, to deprive the Secretary of the Treasury of any discretion. A bank whose notes have been regularly redeemed with specie exists in the place where the money is to be paid to the public receiver, and those notes are valued at par in the market. The public receiver has, however, certain information that the bank is in critical circumstances, and will unquestionably blow up in a few hours. What is he to do? According to the construction of the resolution of 1816 contended for, he is not at liberty to refuse the money, because this is doubtless a specie-paying bank, and may possibly continue to be so; but the receiver has no right to exercise any judgment upon that question, and must, in the mean time, receive a sum of money, however large, with the strongest conviction upon his own mind that he is receiving worthless rags, which will prove a total loss to the Government. But the Treasury order is further said to be illegal, because it discriminates between actual settlers and others, and indeed it is said to be, in this respect, in violation of the constitution itself. The clause in the eye of the objector is the first of the 2d section of the 4th article of the constitution, declaring "that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." The acts of nearly if not quite every State in the Union have given construction to this clause of the constitution, by which it seems to have been understood as contemplating nothing more than the defence of the citizens of one State from the disabilities of alienage in another. The pre-emption rights recognised in nearly all the land legislation of Congress is a farther precedent and sanction of the principle. But, so far as the present debate is concerned, it is sufficient to say that this discrimination in the Treasury order no longer exists. It has fulfilled the term of duration originally allotted to it, and no longer forms a feature in this executive measure.

But some have further urged the illegality of the Treasury order, upon the ground that its operation is not extended to the customs of the country. This argument would be a very sound one in the mouth of him who was contending for a further extension of the Treasury order, so as to embrace the customs, but is certainly not at all calculated to impugn the propriety of requiring the public lands to be paid for in the legal currency. It is to be remembered that this order operates mainly, if not altogether, on sales made after its passage, and surely there cannot be the slightest wrong, injustice, or illegality, in demanding different kinds of payment for debts of a character altogether different. Still less can there be any thing unlawful in one having property to sell saying to purchasers, "if you buy this article, it will suit me to receive payment in current notes; but if you buy this other article, you must pay for it in gold and silver." This brings somewhat under consideration the land law of 1820, which, if an express justification was required for the Treasury order, furnishes it, and sweeps away at once every pretext for charging it with a want of legality. By it the public land is required to be paid for in cash; and as some difficulty has been raised upon the signification of this word, in order to its solution, at least to my own satisfaction, I have had recourse to the dictionary lying on your desk. I there find that cash is ready money; and upon turning to the word money, I find it signifies metals coined for the purposes of commerce; so that in fact, under that law, all the public lands, without the Treasury order, can now only be paid for in ready money, to wit: metal coined for the purposes of commerce, in Treasury notes, or land scrip. So much for the legality.

But the policy of this Treasury order is also assailed; and upon this point I must admit that, having been hurried into this debate somewhat sooner than I had intended, I am unable to do any thing like justice either to myself or the subject. I am under great obligations to gentlemen on both sides for the light they have cast upon it, and am not less indebted to the lightning corruscations of those opposed to the order, than to the calm irradiation which has shone from this quarter. In 1816 the able Senator from Massachusetts was pleased to say:

"There are some political evils which are seen as soon as they are dangerous, and which alarm at once as well the people as the Government. Wars and invasions, therefore, are not always the most certain destroyers of national prosperity. They come in no questionable shape. They announce their own approach, and the general safety is preserved by the general alarm. Not so with the evils of a debased coin, a depreciated paper currency, or a depressed and falling public credit. Not so with the plausible and insidious mischiefs of a paper-money system. These insinuate themselves in the shape of facilities, accommodation, and relief. They hold out the most fallacious hope of an easier payment of debts, and a lighter burden of taxation. It is easy for a portion of the people to imagine that Government may properly continue to receive depreciated paper, because they have received it, and because it is more convenient to obtain it than to obtain other paper, or specie. But on these subjects it is that Government ought to exercise its own peculiar wisdom and caution. It is supposed to possess, on subjects of this nature, somewhat more of foresight than has fallen to the lot of individuals. It is bound to foresee the evil before every man feels it, and to take all necessary measures to guard against it, although they may be measures attended with some difficulty, and not without some temporary inconvenience.

* * * * The only power which the Government possesses of restraining the issues of the State banks is to refuse their notes in the receipts of the Treasury. This power it can exercise now, or at least can provide now for exercising it in reasonable time, because the currency of some part of the country is yet sound, and the evil is not yet universal. * * *

But I have expressed my belief on more than one occasion, and I now repeat the opinion, that it is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the return of peace, to have returned to the legal and proper mode of collecting the revenue. * * *

It can hardly be doubted that the influence of the Treasury could have effected all this. If not, it could have withdrawn the deposits, and the countenance of Government, from institutions which, against all rule and all propriety, were holding great sums in Government stocks, and making enormous profits from the circulation of their own dishonored paper. That which was most wanted was the designation of a time for the corresponding operation of banks of different places. This could have been made by the head of the Treasury better than by any body, or every body else. * * This Government has a right, in all cases, to protect its own revenues, and to guard them against defalcation or bad and depreciated paper."

This speech is, in my opinion, ample authority for nearly all that I have asserted, or wish to assert, on the present occasion. It expressly declares the insidious and dangerous nature of the paper system. It asserts both the power and the right of the Government to regulate the currency to a great extent, by the refusal at the Treasury of paper money. It enforces the duty of the Government to foresee evils, and take all necessary measures to guard against them, before every man feels them, although such measures may be attended with some difficulty, and not without some temporary inconvenience. It also alleges that Government is supposed to have, on subjects of this nature, somewhat more of foresight than has fallen to the lot of individuals. Thus supported, I do not think I can be very far wrong in having made similar assertions and declarations. But the framers of our excellent constitution affixed their signet to what seems almost a dictate of nature herself, that the precious metals provided by her for that purpose are the most proper media for commercial exchanges. They expressly prohibited the States from making any thing but gold and silver a legal tender in the payment of debts, and the States themselves from issuing bills of credit. In relation to the circulation of the country, it is altogether impossible for the General Government to occupy a neutral stand. She must contribute to the width and depth of this ocean of paper money, as the Senator from Massachusetts has so properly termed it, or by her action dry up the streams continually pouring into it. Gentlemen on the other side agree to this, and tell us that the United States Bank is the only instrument she can successfully use to prevent its overspreading the whole terra firma of the nation. The President of the United States has said that it may be accomplished through the fiscal operations of the Treasury, without the aid of a national bank; and this Treasury order is one of the links in the chain of operations proposed; and now, before time is afforded to test its efficacy, ere six short months have rolled away, we are called upon to arrest its action. But gentlemen say its baneful effects have been already found too serious to be longer endured, under the hope of future advantages; that it has already brought distress and ruin upon the country. How has it brought distress and ruin upon the country? By destroying public confidence, is one response. And would not any thing else which those who control the mammoth bank at Philadelphia and their partisans choose to pronounce a dangerous experiment destroy public confidence? I am certain, Mr. President, we shall never see confidence stable in the money market of this country till that institution has ceased to struggle for an existence authorized by the Congress of the United States. But gentlemen say it produces such a drain for specie, that bank discounts are necessarily curtailed. This is precisely one of the effects desired, and it is doubtless to the real interest of the country that it should continue to produce such effects. But that it ought, in the nature of things, to have produced such effects in a very moderate degree is, I think, apparent from the very small quantity of specie (not exceeding $1,800,000, I understand,) which has in fact been transported westwardly. Other causes, much more adequate to produce this effect, have been at work; other abstractions of specie, in much larger quantities, have taken place; and forty millions of money thrown from its former channels of regular trade, and held in a state of readiness to meet the provisions of the deposit act, seem to me far better reasons than the Treasury order for the pressure complained of. What do gentlemen say to the pressure in England? Is that caused by the Treasury order? And has there ever been a pressure in England which has not borne heavily on the mercantile classes in this country? The Senator from New Jersey seems to think that in proportion to the increase of the number of the deposit banks, a correspondent increase of discounts should have taken place. Why so, sir? Is the actual amount of the public revenue increased by the number of banks among which it may be distributed? And is not the amount of this fund the basis of the discounts made upon it? But to sum up the whole upon this point, let it be conceded, for the sake of the argument, that all the alleged inconveniences to the currency really exist; are they any thing more than the dust of the balance to the evils which must have flowed from an unlimited encouragement to bank issues, necessarily following the indiscriminate receipt of bank paper nominally redeemable in specie? Any gentleman who will cast an unprejudiced eye over the relative condition of the deposit banks at the adoption of the Treasury order and the present time, will, I think, perceive that there is great reason to believe it has been the means of saving the whole paper system from shipwreck, and consequently the whole country, which has unfortunately become so intimately connected with it. He will find that either the specie has been increased or the circulation diminished in every instance, and in many both these contributions to strength have taken place. This is the foreseeing the evil before every man feels it, and taking the necessary measures to guard against it, although they may be measures attended with some difficulty, and not without some temporary inconvenience, which the Senator from Massachusetts has pronounced to be the duty of a Government.

But gentlemen further allege that the Treasury order is oppressive to the purchasers of public lands. One of the avowed objects of the Treasury order is checking the speculations in the public lands. That such is its natural effect, seems to be conceded on all sides; but that end, it is said, is defeated by evasion, and the burden falls chiefly on the bonafide purchaser. That the land speculators are by no means to be encouraged, and that the practice is a serious evil in our country, no one seems to deny; but the argument seems to be that, because it cannot be effectually prevented, no effort is to be made to impose on it a check. Is this sound reasoning? Does it become Congress to thwart the Executive in its attempts to diminish this evil? Ought it not, rather, by co-operation, endeavor to lessen the opportunities for the alleged evasions?

SENATE.]

Treasury Circular.

Allow me, in conclusion, to suggest remedies for the evils complained of under the Treasury order, (supposing them to exist in all the magnitude contended for on the other side;) remedies which, in my humble judgment, Congress is bound to apply upon other considerations than their mere effect upon the currency of the country. The remedies to which I allude are confining the sales of the public lands to actual settlers, and reducing the revenue by customs to the actual wants of the Government. The public lands constitute for us, in a triple sense, a vast fund of national wealth. They present, in the first place, a wide field in which our multiplying population is to find space to spread itself out; and the very wideness of this field, according to the observations of philosophers and political economists, increases the ratio in which this population will multiply. Our strength as a nation is therefore daily increasing through their instrumentality, our human matériel (so to speak) for fleets and armies becoming more abundant, and productive labor more vast in its amount. In the second place, their products will furnish sustenance to all this multiplying national power, and leave an excess to be exchanged for the valuable products of other climes and soils. Lastly, their fee simple interest is convertible into money, whenever required to supply the demands which may from time to time arise upon our Treasury. These three useful and important objects can only be duly accomplished by confining the sales of the land to the wants of actual settlers. It is true, by throwing them into the market alike for the actual settler and the speculator, there will be a larger immediate influx of money into the Treasury. But does good policy call for such an influx? Is not your national Treasury, so far from requiring such an influx, diseased with plethora? And have not gentlemen, to relieve it, urged on by the necessity of the case, either real or supposed, voted at the last session of Congress for a law, acknowledged by all to be dangerous in precedent, inexpedient as a general principle, and approaching, if not surpassing, the very confines of the constitution? The fear of national corruption, the ruin of so many prosperous States, a ruin which prosperous States have most reason to dread, has sanctified in the eyes of many a sterling patriot that measure called the deposit law, upon which he would have otherwise looked with horror and dismay. But in your public lands you may hold an uncounted treasure, without the apprehension of any such consequence. Your forest-covered wilds, still in the possession of the deer and the buffalo, would lie secure until your necessities called for their use, and, unlike your gold and silver, no eye would be fascinated by their glitter, no ear seduced by their musical ring. But when war or any other great national exigency calls for an extraordinary supply of treasure, here is a fund convertible by sale into cash, or the substantial security for a loan; they would be sufficient to repay, without resorting to taxation—a measure always odious to a free people. Your deposits with the States, if otherwise unobjectionable, will never answer a similar purpose. The very seasons when the General Government shall find herself most straitened, the States themselves will be laboring under a like pressure. Already you find many of them disposed to treat the deposit as a gift; and what will they say when, in the unseasonable moment of national calamity, it is demanded of them as a debt? Will you not find them, like the States under the old confederacy, refusing or neglecting the contribution of their quotas? This will unquestionably be the case with many; while others, having honorably complied with their engagements, being more fortunate or more willing than the rest, will begin to murmur if their sister States are not compelled to do likewise; and thus will these deposits become the subjects of dangerous discord at those very seasons when union will be most necessary to our safety, and when, but for some such adverse incident, it would be most certain to exist. Your public lands, as your preserved treasure, have this additional advantage, that they are daily increasing in value; when you sell one portion, what remains is worth nearly as much as the whole before that portion was taken off. The expectation of such increase is doubtless the inducement with the speculator to stretch forth his hand with monopolizing sweep over all that you offer for sale. Not so with your deposits with the States. It is a caput mortuum, without any possibility of increase, and for the principal of which there is but faint hope of return, while the very proposal to reclaim it may rend your Union asunder. But justice and good faith require that your public lands should be so husbanded. They were either the voluntary donations of the old States, avowedly for the first and the last objects in which I have spoken of them as a fund of national wealth, to wit: as a field for population, and a common stock, out of which the debts of the nation should be paid; or they have been acquired by the united blood and treasure of the whole nation, and ought, therefore, to be used for the general good. But if they are to be brought into market now, in unmeasured quantities, while the nation is oppressed with money, we shall be acting like the young profligate who disposes of his paternal domain, that he may profusely scatter the product to the winds, or that he may tempt the cupidity of sharpers. Pursuing this policy, we shall in the end find ourselves in the situation of King Lear, who, having divided his all among his children, and becoming dependent upon their benevolence, was left to perish in the helplessness of senility; or spurred on by our actual necessities, which will then have no other source of supply, like the fabled progenitor of the gods, the General Government will become the devourer of her own children, and the most glorious and extensive family circle this earth has ever witnessed be broken and destroyed. I trust, however, that we shall be saved from the destinies both of Lear and of Saturn; and that, confining ourselves in the sales of public lands to the actual wants of settlers, the payment for them in specie will either cease to be felt as a grievance, or become unnecessary for the security of the revenue; and a reduction of the tariff being connected with this measure, we shall be relieved from all the evils of an overflowing Treasury.

I have thus glanced at the various considerations presenting themselves to my mind on this exciting and important question. Some of them apply as well to the substitute as to the original resolutions, though with mitigated force. I have offered them to the Senate with great diffidence, conscious that I am in my mere novitiate in matters of national legislation. In conclusion, I would add, that those who have attempted to show the evils produced by the Treasury order have fallen very far short of proving the existence of those evils, or, at least, of connecting them with it as their cause; and some of them have, as I think, almost abandoned the position as untenable. They cannot, therefore, with any propriety, ask its rescission upon the mere supposition that evils exist, and that the Treasury order is the cause. I have listened attentively to this discussion, with a sincere desire for instruction, and the result has been to rivet my approbation of the executive course; and while I shall vote for the amendment, as less obnoxious, I could with equal satisfaction have recorded my direct negative upon the original resolutions.

When Mr. STRANGE had concluded,

Mr. WEBSTER said: I will take this occasion, as probably no more fit one may occur, to say a few words in consequence of the reference which has so frequently been made, during the course of this debate, to the inroduction by myself of the joint resolution of 1816 into the other House of Congress, and to my observations then made on that measure. I said nothing on that occasion without deliberation; nothing which I do not now embrace as sound policy; nothing which, as I suppose, is in the least degree inconsistent with the principles which I at this time maintain; and I repel, as wholly unfounded, any intimation that any thing like incongruity or inconsistency is to be found in the sentiments and opinions delivered by me on the two occasions. No such inconsistency, indeed, has been, so far as I know, directly charged; but the repeated quotation of my former remarks might lead to the inference that such inconsistency was intended to be intimated. The resolution of 1816 was accompanied, as originally introduced by me, with an introductory resolution, in the form of a preamble, setting forth the reasons on which the proposed measure was founded. The operations of the Treasury had at that time become greatly deranged by the war. The duties at the custom-houses were received, in many places, in the paper of non-specie-paying banks; and, as there was a great variety and difference in the value of the notes of those banks, there was, of consequence, a real difference in the amount of duties paid in different ports. In some cities the discount upon those notes, to bring them to the value of legal coin, was five per cent. on their nominal value; in other places ten per cent., and in some, indeed, as high as twenty per cent. That was the fact in this city. In the years 1814 and 1815, bills on Boston could often not be had here under a premium of twenty per cent.; since all the paper of the Boston banks was equal to specie, and the paper here depreciated to the extent stated. This was all in the course of things, as some banks had suspended specie payments and others had not; and as the duties at the custom-house were received in the paper chiefly of the local banks, the result was, in effect, a different rate of duties in different places, in plain violation of the constitution and of all justice. And this difference was great enough to turn the whole commerce of the country from the Northern to the Southern States.

It was under these circumstances, and at this time, that the resolution of 1816 was introduced by me, with a sort of preamble, alleging the impropriety, inequality, and illegality, of this state of things; and what was its object? Simply to bring back the administration of the finances to the rule of law. The law was plain. There was no authority, not a particle, for receiving those bank notes. There was, in truth, no discretion vested in the Secretary of the Treasury as to what should be received in payment for duties. All this was settled by plain statute provisions. The difficulty arose from no deficiency of enactments by Congress. The law made it the duty of the Secretary to receive, in payments to the United States, the gold and silver coins of the United States, certain foreign coins, and Treasury notes, and notes of the Bank of the United States then lately incorporated; and nothing else. But we had just emerged from the war. The banks had suspended specie payments in consequence of that war; and the Treasury was said to have acted under an unavoidable necessity, a sort of vis major, which could not be resisted. This was the sole ground on which its conduct was justified or excused. In the House of Representatives, the introductory resolution or preamble was, however, stricken out, with my consent, which I readily gave, as it was supposed to imply a reproach on the Secretary of the Treasury; and I had not the least intention of casting any thing like reproach upon that officer, for a practice growing out of the absolute necessity of the case, as he and others supposed. All, however, agreed that the mode of paying duties, then in practice, was not according to law. The object of the resolution, as I have already said, was to bring the practice back to that standard; and on introducing the resolution, I had no other or further view. By recurrence to the resolution, as originally introduced, it will be seen that it did not contemplate any enlargement of the means of payment. It did not embrace the notes of State banks at all. It confined all payments to coin, Treasury notes, and notes of the Bank of the United States. But this was esteemed too strict and severe; the House of Representatives felt a disposition to legalize the receipt of the notes of specie-paying State banks; and to meet this feeling, the resolution was amended and enlarged, so as to embrace the notes of specie-paying banks. The resolution, as thus amended, embraced two objects, both clear and distinct: first, to compel the Treasury to confine its receipts to such sorts of money as were authorized and sanctioned by law; second, to increase the number of those sorts, or to enlarge the legal means of payment, by making it lawful to receive the notes of specie-paying banks, payable and paid on demand. Both these objects were accomplished by the resolution, which, as amended, passed both Houses, and became the law of the land.

Now, sir, the question is not whether such a legalizing of bank notes was safe or dangerous, wise or unwise. Congress saw fit, in fact, to sanction their reception, and that is enough. From that moment it became the legal right of every debtor, and every purchaser of land, to pay in those notes. And, sir, all I said then, I say now, viz: that it is a subject to be provided for, and which always has been provided for, by law; that it has been, is, and ought to be, above the reach of executive discretion; that, by the law, as it stood before 1816, notes of State banks were not receivable; that, by the law of 1816, they were made receivable, and put on the same ground with coins, notes of the Bank of the United States, and Treasury notes. And what is the ground I now stand on? Simply this: that this is a matter of law, and not of discretion; that the Secretary has no more right, now, to strike any thing out of the law that is in it, than he had, before 1816, to put any thing into the law which was not in it. That was my doctrine then; that is my doctrine now. Where is any inconsistency? At that time the Secretary was receiving bank notes contrary to law; now he is refusing bank notes contrary to law. I was for correcting the illegal proceeding then, and I am for correcting the illegal proceeding now. I take back nothing of what I then said—not a syllable. I believe now as I did then; and, indeed, I believe more firmly, as a man is not likely, as he advances in years and observation, to grow less anxious on the subject of a stable and uniform currency, or less resolute to fix it on a permanent basis of law. I felt then the necessity of maintaining a legal currency in payment of the dues of the Government; I feel the same necessity now. At that time, something was admitted in payment which was not in the statute; at this time, something is refused which is in the statute. In both cases the law has been departed from; and in both cases I was, and am, for re-establishing its authority.

Mr. RIVES having obtained the floor,

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate spent some time in executive business, and then adjourned.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. ANDREW JACKSON, Jr., his secretary:

Governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by equitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as might undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations, on the payment of such reasonable tolls as ought to be established to compensate the capitalists who might engage in such undertaking, and complete the work, an agent was employed to obtain information in respect to the situation and character of the country through which the line of communication, if established, would necessarily pass, and the state of the projects which were understood to be contemplated for opening such communication by a canal or a railroad. The agent returned to the United States in September last, and although the information collected by him is not as full as could have been desired, yet it is sufficient to show that the probability of an early execution of any of the projects which have been set on foot for the construction of the communication alluded to is not so great as to render it expedient to open a negotiation at present with any foreign Government upon the subject.

WASHINGTON, January 9, 1837.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution to rescind the Treasury order of July, 1836, &c., together with the substitute offered therefor by Mr. RIVES, in the following words:

Resolved, That hereafter all sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, whether from customs, public lands, taxes, debts, or otherwise, shall be collected and paid only in the legal currency of the United States, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes: that is, from and after the passage of this resolution, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars shall be received in payment of the public dues; from and after the first day of July, 1839, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars shall be receivable; and from and after the first of July, 1841, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars: Provided, however, That no notes shall be taken in payment by the collectors or receivers, which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not, under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash."

The question being on the adoption of his substitute,

Mr. RIVES said that, in asking the indulgence of the Senate, it was not his design to abuse their patience by rearguing the questions which had already been so fully and so ably discussed, in relation to the legality or the policy of the Treasury circular. It was his wish only to state, somewhat more at large than he had yet had an opportunity of doing, the views under the influence of which he had offered the proposition which is now pending before the Senate, as an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING.] In reference to the most important objects of the Treasury circular, he regarded that measure as having done its office; and the interests of the country are now much more concerned in the provision we shall make for the future, than in any decision we may pronounce upon the past. When I had the honor some days ago, said Mr. R., of addressing a few remarks to the Senate on this subject, I said what I take great pleasure now in repeating, that, in whatever different lights the operation of the Treasury circular may have been viewed, of one thing I was thoroughly persuaded—that the motives which had induced the high functionary at the head of the Government to direct the issuing of it were in perfect consonance with that elevated and patriotic spirit which had so conspicuously marked the whole course of his public life; and that no defect of legality, in my estimation, had been shown in the authority under which it was issued. I added, also, that the measure was properly to be viewed as a temporary one, to continue in operation until the action of Congress on the whole subject could be obtained; and that the President himself, as shown by the evidence of his message at the commencement of the session, attached no importance to its adoption as a permanent rule of policy.

One of the leading objects of the Treasury circular, at the time it was issued, was to check that tendency to extravagant bank issues and bank credits which has so signally marked the history of the last twelve or eighteen months. But, so far as that object is concerned, the same effect will now be produced in a manner not less certain, though by a process more gradual, and therefore easier and safer to the community, by the operation of the deposit act. No one can doubt, Mr. President, that one of the chief causes of the recent over-action of the banking system in this country is to be found in the immense sums of public moneys left in the deposit banks, and which have been used and traded upon by them, as an addition of so much to their banking capitals. This is a state of things which has been eminently pernicious in all its bearings. The correction of so great an evil formed in my mind one of the strongest considerations for giving the cordial support I did to the deposit act of the last session; a measure which, however much misconceived or misrepresented in regard to its true character, has, in my opinion, conferred upon the country a double benefaction of the highest value: first, in putting out of the way of the Government the temptation, whose powerful influence we were already beginning to feel, to useless, extravagant, and anti-republican expenditure; and, secondly, in taking from the deposit banks that gratuitous and artificial increment of their capitals, which has been a main cause of the unnatural distention of our paper currency, and of that inordinate spirit of speculation which has prevailed through the country. In gradually withdrawing, as we now are doing by the act of the last session, these large amounts of the public treasure from the possession of the deposit banks, and in avoiding, as, I trust, by a wise and provident legislation, we shall do, the accumulation of any idle surplus in future, the Government will take away the stimulus which itself has given to the excessive issues and credits of the banks; and we may then hope that, under the salutary control of the laws of trade, they will return within those safe, proper, and natural limits which the business of the community requires.

While on this branch of the subject, Mr. President, I will make one other observation. However necessary or desirable the contraction of our paper circulation may be, (if it be, indeed, in the large excess which is supposed by many,) it must be borne in mind that there is no operation more delicate than the reduction of the currency of a country. A decreasing circulating medium, it is agreed alike by theoretical writers and by enlightened practical men, is precisely that condition in the moneyed affairs of a community which is the most critical and distressing. It is a transition from high to low prices, from a certain and liberal reward of labor to diminished wages and precarious employment, from active and prospering industry to general languor and depression in all the operations of business. It is a change to which society always adjusts itself slowly and painfully; and, under the most favorable circumstances, must be attended with distress—often with extensive ruin. Great caution, therefore, is necessary, lest it be unduly precipitated in its progress, or harshly aggravated in its effects. We have, in the history of our own country, at a period not too remote for the recollection of most of us, a memorable example of the distressing effects of a rapid reduction of the circulating medium. It is strikingly exhibited, in all its details, in the able report of Mr. Crawford, then Secretary of the Treasury, on the currency, in 1820. It is there shown that the circulation of the country, in the three years from 1816 to 1819, had been brought down from 110 millions in the former, to 45 millions in the latter; making the enormous reduction of 65 millions within that short period! The scene of wide-spread ruin and distress which ensued is fresh in the memories of all who witnessed it. It inculcates, at least, the necessity of caution in the action of the Government on this subject. It is our duty to withdraw from the banking operations of the country that artificial stimulant which the Government itself has administered; but that being done, a just policy, in general, requires that the concerns of trade should be left to regulate themselves by their own natural and remedial laws.

Regarding, then, the Treasury circular as having mainly done its office, we are now called upon to establish some permanent and equal rule for the collection of the public revenues. It is a duty which we cannot evade if we would. In the joint power which the constitution invests in Congress, to "lay and collect" taxes, our duty is read to us in terms too significant to be mistaken. It is as much a part of the legislative authority to say in what manner and by what rule the collection of the public revenue shall be effected, as to say to what amount and from sources it shall be raised. Important as such a regulation is at all times, it derives, at the present moment, a particular interest from its close connexion with the subject of the currency. It is in that connexion that all who have participated in this debate have discussed the question before the Senate; and it is doubtless in that connexion that the public attention is turned with most anxiety to our decision upon it. I feel, Mr. President, all the magnitude and all the difficulty of this great question of the currency. There is none that rises higher in importance, or descends more deeply into the interests of society. It "comes home to the business and the bosoms of men." It affects alike the humblest laborer and the wealthiest capitalist; on it depend the security of property, the stability of contracts, the comfort and support of families, and, I will add, in a great degree, the public morals; for nothing, in my opinion, is more calculated to unsettle the moral sense and habits of a community than the dispositions and pursuits fostered by the lottery of a fluctuating currency. In approaching such a subject, I feel all the diffidence which a just sense of its difficulty and importance properly inspires. But, having submitted to the Senate a proposition which, if adopted, would, I flatter myself, exert no small influence on this great interest; and as the friends of the administration (myself among the number) have been accused of entertaining visionary, impracticable, and pernicious notions in regard to a reform of the currency, I must beg the indulgence of the Senate while I state, with as much precision as I may, the views of that reform which I entertain, and which have determined the shape of the proposition now under their consideration.

In discussing the question of a reform of the currency, it is necessary to settle our ideas clearly as to two things: first, the nature and extent of the end to be aimed at; secondly, the means by which it is to be attained. If I am asked, what is the end I propose, whether I am in favor of a specie circulation exclusively, and the total suppression of bank paper, I answer, No. Even if such an object were desirable, it is plainly impracticable. In the present state of commercial progress and refinement throughout the world, it would probably be impracticable any where; but in this country, and under our system of government especially, it is obviously wholly unattainable. Whether right or wrong, we find twenty-six independent State Legislatures possessed of the power to create banking corporations. Whatever speculative doubts may exist in the minds of some as to the constitutional validity of this power, the States now actually possess and exercise it, as they have invariably done from the foundation of the Government, and there is not the slightest probability that they will ever be divested of it. In every sober and practical scheme of policy, we must proceed upon the assumption that this independent State power will remain. How, then, can the banking system be suppressed by this Government? Such a notion, if entertained any where, would indeed be Utopian and visionary.

My object, then, would be, not the destruction of the banking system and the total suppression of bank paper, but an efficient regulation of it, and its restriction to safe and proper limits; not the exclusive use of specie as a circulating medium, but such a substantial enlargement and general diffusion of it in actual circulation, as would make it the practical currency of common life, the universal medium of ordinary transactions; in short, the money of the farmer, the mechanic, the laborer, and the tradesman; while the merchant should be left in the enjoyment of the facilities of a sound and restricted paper currency for his larger operations. Such a reformation in the currency as this would, in my opinion, be productive of the most beneficial results. It would give security to the industrious classes of society for the products of their labor, against the casualties incident to the paper system. The laborer, in returning to the bosom of his family from his weekly toil, would no longer find his slumbers broken by the apprehension that the hard earnings of the week, perhaps the accumulation of long years of honest industry, might be dissipated in a moment by the explosion of a bank, or the bursting of some paper bubble. It would give security, to a great extent, to the whole body of the community, against those disastrous fluctuations in the value of property and contracts, which arise from the ebbs and flows of an unrestricted paper currency. It would give security to the banks themselves, by providing them, in the daily internal circulation of the country, an abundant and accessible fund for recruiting their resources, whenever they should be exposed to an extraordinary pressure.

This, sir, is the happy state of things we might promise ourselves from replacing (as it is the aim of the proposition which I have had the honor to submit to do) all bank bills, under the denomination of twenty dollars, with a solid circulation of gold and silver. Is there any thing wild, any thing visionary, any thing pernicious, in such a system of currency as this? It has the sanction, Mr. President, of the profoundest writers on questions of political economy, and has received the practical assent of the wisest nations. I am well aware that it would ill become me to present for the consideration of the Senate any scheme which was not thus tested and approved. Of all the writers who have treated and examined questions of this character, none possess so high an authority as the author of the "Wealth of Nations." It has been well and justly said that Adam Smith had done for the science of political economy what Bacon and Newton had done for physical science, and Sydney and Locke for the science of government and the fundamental principles of civil and political liberty. His work, appearing contemporaneously with the American Revolution, was deeply imbued with the free spirit and the large and vigorous thought which so remarkably distinguished that great era. He came forth as the zealous and powerful champion of free trade, the inflexible opponent of monopoly and restriction, in all their multiplied forms, the ardent advocate of every thing that is liberal, generous, and popular, in the institutions of society and the intercourse of nations. No work has ever exercised so large an influence for good on the policy and destiny of nations; and none, I am sure, considering the stamp of liberty as well as wisdom impressed upon it, is better entitled to the respect of an assembly of American legislators. Adam Smith, by a strange mistake, has been held up; rather opprobriously, as the advocate of a paper system—as the founder, in fact, of the paper school! Sir, there can be no greater mistake than this. While he recognised the utility of a judicious system of banking, in liberating and putting into productive employment capital which would otherwise remain dead and inactive, and the facilities it is calculated to afford to commerce, he yet insists that the general circulation of the country should be gold and silver.

As the general principles he has laid down on the subjects of banking and currency continue still to be appealed to by the enlightened writers who have followed him, as affording the soundest exposition of those subjects, whatever modifications of subordinate points may have been made by subsequent inquirers, I will give to the Senate, and principally in the words of Adam Smith himself, an outline of his system of currency. After speaking of the advantages to be expected from a judicious and properly conducted system of banking, he says expressly that “the commerce and industry of a country are not so secure when suspended, as it were, on the Dædalian wings of paper money, as when they travel about on the solid ground of gold and silver.” He says, therefore, it is the policy of wise Governments “to guard, not only against that excessive multiplication of paper money which ruins the very banks which issue it, but even against that multiplication of it which enables them to fill the greater part of the circulation of the country with it.” He then proceeds to show that “the circulation of every country may be considered as divided into two different branches: the circulation of the dealers with one another, and the circulation between the dealers and consumers.” His next position is, “that paper money may be so regulated as either to confine itself very much to the circulation between the different dealers, or to extend itself likewise to a great part of that between the dealers and consumers.” The regulation is effected by fixing the denomination of the notes permitted to be issued. “It were better,” he adds, “that no bank notes were issued in any part of the kingdom for a smaller sum than five pounds. Paper money would then confine itself to the circulation between the different dealers;” and where this is the case, he says, “there is always plenty of gold and silver.” “But where it extends itself to a considerable part of the circulation between dealers and consumers, it banishes gold and silver almost entirely from the country.” The system of Adam Smith, then, resolves itself into this: that the circulation between dealer and dealer may be of paper, but that the circulation between dealer and consumer should be of the precious metals; that this result ought to be secured by prohibiting the issue of bank notes for a less sum than five pounds, and that, if such a restriction be adopted, there “will always be plenty of gold and silver” in circulation, performing all the offices of exchange in the “ordinary transactions” of society, while the use of paper would be confined to commercial operations of a larger scale. Instead of being the advocate, far less the founder, of an unrestricted paper system, he urges the necessity of confining it to commercial accommodation in the larger transactions between dealer and dealer. He is in favor of the suppression of all bank notes under five pounds; whereby gold and silver will fill the ordinary channels of circulation, and become, in fact, the common practical currency of the country.

But this system does not rest on the authority of Adam Smith alone. Not to mention the illustrious names or the policy of other enlightened nations in support of it, it has received the successive sanction of a long line of the ablest practical statesmen in England. It is a remarkable fact, that the great work of Adam Smith having appeared in 1776, the Parliament of Great Britain, in the very next year, passed a law prohibiting all bankers from issuing notes under the denomination of five pounds. This continued to be the legislative policy of that country till the memorable year of 1797, when, in consequence of the exigencies and embarrassments of that tremendous conflict, growing out of the French revolution, which desolated and convulsed Europe for more than twenty years, the Bank of England, with the sanction of the Government, suspended specie payments; and, at the same time, resorted to an issue of one-pound and two-pound notes. As soon, however, as the war was at an end, and the country was in a situation to admit of the resumption of specie payments by the bank, the enlightened statesmen of England recurred to the prohibition of all notes under the denomination of five pounds. This return to a sound policy, however, was not accomplished, nor has it been maintained, without encountering a strenuous and persevering opposition.

There is something so instructive in the history of this reform of the currency in England, that it deserves to be traced somewhat more in detail. In 1819, a law was passed directing a complete resumption of specie payments by the bank in three years, to wit, in 1822; and at the same time it was enacted that in two years after, to wit, in 1824, all small notes under the denomination of five pounds should be prohibited. The first provision was carried fully into effect at the designated period; but, such was the influence of the country bankers, and other associated interests, that, before the appointed time for the suppression of the small notes arrived, the latter provision was repealed, and the final suppression of the small notes was adjourned to 1833, the year of the expiration of the charter of the Bank of England. But the great commercial convulsion of 1825, which swept banks, merchants, farmers, every thing, before it, with the destructive fury of a tornado, soon after occurred, and forcibly admonished British statesmen of the necessity of seeking a remedy—in part, at least—in a more solid constitution of their currency. Accordingly, in the beginning of 1826, Lord Liverpool and Mr. Robinson, the one the first Lord of the Treasury, the other the Chancellor of the Exchequer, introduced and carried a bill providing for the prohibition, after April, 1829, of all small notes under the denomination of five pounds. This law was stoutly and zealously opposed at the time of its enactment, and repeated attempts were subsequently made to procure its repeal, before the period fixed for its operation. But these efforts were happily unavailing; and the doctrine of Adam Smith, in regard to the prohibition of all notes under the denomination of five pounds, re-established in 1829, after experiencing the bitter fruits of a temporary departure from it, may now be considered as the final and settled policy of the British Government. It has received the sanction and support of her ablest statesmen—of Liverpool, of Peel, of Canning, of Huskisson, of Brougham, of Wellington—all of whom, upon the fullest experience and consideration, have, from time to time, borne their testimony to the value and importance of this essential restriction upon a paper circulation.

And what has been the result in practice? Why, to give to the people of England virtually a metallic currency; for gold and silver form there the daily habitual medium of all ordinary transactions. A bank note, except on special occasions, is a sort of phenomenon. On this point we have precise information. It appears, from statistical returns referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the House of Commons, a few years ago, that the amount of gold then in circulation was twenty-two millions of pounds sterling, and of silver eight millions of pounds sterling. I do not speak of gold and silver locked up in the vaults of banks; but of that which passes daily from hand to hand, in the ordinary transactions of business. Mr. Gallatin, in his instructive pamphlet on the currency, published in 1830, states the metallic circulation of England at precisely the same amount. Allowing nothing for any augmentation since, the people of England have, then, an actual circulating medium of gold and silver to the amount of about one hundred and fifty millions of dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury, (who, doubtless, has access to the most authentic sources of information on the subject,) in his annual report at the commencement of the session, states the whole paper circulation of England, at this time, at one hundred and fifty-two millions of dollars. We may, therefore, conclude that what Mr. Gallatin says, in the pamphlet thus referred to, is substantially correct—that, “by the suppression of all notes of a less denomination than £5 sterling, the amount of the circulating metallic currency in England has become equal to that of bank notes of every description.” One half of the entire circulation consists of gold and silver, constantly passing from hand to hand, and performing all the offices of exchange in the ordinary business of life, and thus forming, in fact, the practical currency of the country. It is this large infusion of the precious metals which has preserved the currency of England, in the main, in a healthy condition, under a system of banking which her prime minister himself, (Lord Liverpool,) in 1826, pronounced to be, in other respects, “the most insecure, the most rotten, the very worst, which it is possible to conceive.”

Much has been said recently, I know, Mr. President, of great commercial embarrassments in England, which are attributed by many to a deranged state of her currency. These embarrassments, in my opinion, are viewed in much too serious a light; but if they were not, it must be borne in mind that all commercial countries, however solid the constitution of their currency, will occasionally be visited by revulsions in trade. If, too, they are to be considered as indicating a derangement in the currency of England, the source of that derangement is to be found in those defects of her system of banking which were referred to by Lord Liverpool as making it so insecure and precarious, and not, surely, in that salutary check, the prohibition of small notes. On the contrary, the abundance of gold and silver which that restriction secures in the common circulation of the country is the great preservative of the system, and the anchor which enables it to ride in safety amid fluctuations and tempests that might otherwise overwhelm or subvert it.

It is this abundant supply of the precious metals, filling and saturating the ordinary channels of circulation, which I desire to see brought about in our own country. That is the end to be aimed at. What are the means by which it is to be accomplished? We have seen that in England it has been accomplished by the prohibition of all bank notes of a less denomination than £5. Similar means will, doubtless, accomplish the same end here; and, I must add, nothing else will. It is in vain to expect to bring gold and silver coins into circulation, without a previous suppression of all notes of corresponding denominations. The reason is obvious. If there exist in any country two distinct currencies, both of them answering equally well the purposes of domestic circulation, but one of them possessing only a local value, confined to the country of its emission, while the other has a universal and equal value throughout the world, the latter will necessarily go abroad into the commerce of the world, in quest of the riches and productions of foreign nations, leaving the former at home to perform an office which it does equally as well, though it would be wholly without use or value abroad. The total incompatibility, therefore, of a paper and metallic currency of the same denominations, has grown into an axiom. Edmund Burke, (whose sagacity in questions of this sort is well known,) at the memorable period of the bill brought forward by Mr. Pitt for the suspension of specie payments by the Bank of England, in 1797, in a letter written during his last illness to Mr. Canning, which the latter gentleman brought most touchingly to the notice of the House of Commons, in a debate of great interest and instruction on this whole subject, at a much more recent period, (1826,) used these memorable words: “Tell Mr. Pitt that, if he consents to the issue of one-pound notes, he will never see a guinea again.” The prophecy, sir, became history. No one saw a guinea in circulation in England while the bank continued the issue of one-pound notes.

In 1828, when a great struggle again took place in the British Parliament, on the final consummation of the effort to restore a metallic currency, there was not a single distinguished man who did not bear his testimony to the truth of Mr. Burke's axiom. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, on that occasion, “there was a natural antipathy between the one-pound note and the sovereign. They would not exist together, for the note soon drove the sovereign out of circulation.” The Duke of Wellington, who was eminently a practical man, and spoke from the teachings of experience, said “the experience of the last few years had proved the truth of the theory, that one-pound notes and gold sovereigns would not circulate at the same time. If you are to have gold in circulation, you cannot have one-pound notes.” Mr. Huskisson, whose familiarity with questions of this sort was the result of profound studies, as well as matured experience, said, still more pointedly, “when the paper is let in, the gold will disappear. They might vote the money, they might coin it, but how could they retain it in the country?” This remark applies most forcibly to our present situation. We have voted the metallic money, we have coined it, but it will not circulate. Since we corrected, by law, the under-valuation of the gold coins, (but little more than two years ago,) the quantity of gold in the country, according to the late annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, has increased fifteen millions. We have coined at our own mint, within that time, according to the same authority, ten millions of gold. But where is it? In the vaults of the banks, or hoarded by individuals! and we shall never see it in circulation until we have opened the way for it by a previous suppression of the small notes. If we mean to do any thing practical and effectual for introducing a more general circulation of specie, we must begin at the right end, by first putting down the small-note circulation.

This is the true policy of the Government, and is that practical reform of the currency which has been steadily held in view by the present administration and its friends. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WENDELL] discovered great solicitude to know what is to be the system of policy of the new administration upon this subject. I have no means of knowing, Mr. President, which that gentleman does not equally possess. It is generally supposed, however, that the coming administration will, in the main, conform its policy to the exemplar of the present. The inquiry of the honorable gentleman, then, may be satisfied, by showing him what has been the policy of the present administration; and that cannot be better stated than in the words of our venerable and patriotic Chief Magistrate himself. I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I read a very unequivocal and explicit passage on this subject in the President's message of the last year. In that document he says:

"It has been seen that, without the agency of a great moneyed monopoly, the revenue can be collected, and conveniently and safely applied to all the purposes of the public expenditure. It is also ascertained that, instead of being necessarily made to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the Legislatures of several of the States have already commenced in regard to the suppression of small bills, and which has only to be fostered by proper regulations on the part of Congress to secure a practical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium. Severed from the Government as political engines, and not susceptible of dangerous extension and combination, the State banks will not be tempted, nor will they have the power which we have seen exercised, to divert the public funds from the legitimate purposes of the Government. The collection and custody of the revenue being, on the contrary, a source of credit to them, will increase the security which the States provide for a faithful execution of their trusts, by multiplying the scrutinies to which their operations and accounts will be subjected. Thus disposed, as well from interest as the obligations of their charters, it cannot be doubted that such conditions as Congress may see fit to adopt respecting the deposits in these institutions, with a view to the gradual disuse of the small bills, will be cheerfully complied with; and that we shall soon gain, in place of the Bank of the United States, a practical reform in the whole paper system of the country. If, by this policy, we can ultimately witness the suppression of all bank bills below twenty dollars, it is apparent that gold and silver will take their place, and become the principal circulating medium in the common business of the farmers and mechanics of the country. The attainment of such a result will form an era in the history of our country, which will be dwelt upon with delight by every true friend of its liberty and independence. It will lighten the great tax which our paper system has so long collected from the earnings of labor, and do more to revive and perpetuate those habits of economy and simplicity which are so congenial to the character of republicans, than all the legislation which has yet been attempted."

Here we have a complete delineation of the policy of the administration on this great question of the currency. Neither the President, nor the body of his friends, have proposed a total suppression of bank paper, or an exclusive metallic currency; but, to use his own words, they have desired to see "a practical reform in the banking system, by the ultimate suppression of all bank bills below twenty dollars, so that gold and silver might take their place, and become the principal circulating medium in the common business of the farmers and mechanics of the country." This, he expressly declares, would be "a practical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium;" and the attainment of which, he adds, "will form an era in the history of our country, which will be dwelt upon with delight by every true friend of its liberty and independence." There is nothing in the Treasury circular inconsistent with this interpretation of the policy of the administration. That measure, as I have already said, was an occasional and temporary act, resorted to under a peculiar emergency, till the power of Congress could be interposed to apply a more systematic remedy, and cannot be considered as a departure from a settled and general line of policy. On the contrary, the President, in his message at the commencement of the present session, expressly recurs to the suppression of the lower denominations of bank notes, by the concurrent legislation of the General and State Governments, as forming "the true policy of the country," by which only "a larger portion of the precious metals can be infused into our circulating medium." No other plan can be effectual for the accomplishment of such a result; and, until it shall be adopted, all that may be said, however glowing and fascinating, of the advantages of a metallic circulation, will prove but barren theory, and delusive and unprofitable generality. You may bring gold and silver into the country, and pile them mountains high in your banks; but, without the suppression of the small notes, they will never circulate in the business of society, and will always be exposed to be drawn off by the absorbing currents of foreign trade. The object of a rational policy is, to bring them into daily and active use, invigorating and sustaining the pursuits of industry, and not to have them, like the ancient household relics described by the poet, "wisely kept for show."

The question, then, is, by what means in our power this great object of the suppression of the small notes may be promoted or accomplished. It is through the collection and management of the public revenue only that the agency of this Government can, at present, be usefully interposed. By refusing to receive in payment of the public dues the notes of all banks which shall issue bills of the lower denominations, as is proposed by the resolution I have had the honor to submit, a strong inducement of interest will be held out to the leading State banks to discontinue their smaller issues. The consideration of the credit and more general currency given to their paper, by a receivability in payment of the revenue, would doubtless induce more or less of them to conform to the standard which shall be established in this respect by the legislation of Congress. But my reliance is not so much upon the operation of this measure per se, as upon the moral influence it is calculated to exert upon the policy of the States. They have the complete power to prohibit, by law, the emission and circulation of the smaller notes; and I cannot doubt, if this Government shall hold up to them a standard deemed indispensable to the purification and reform of the currency, that that power will, in process of time, be exerted so as to second and render effectual the policy of our legislation here. Have we not every encouragement, in what has already taken place, to hope for such a result? It is only a few years ago that but three of the States, according to Mr. Gallatin, (Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia,) had prohibited the issue of notes under five dollars. But, since that time, it has been the policy of the General Government, in the collection and management of the public revenues, to discountenance bank notes under that denomination. And what has been the result? We have seen the States, one by one, successively conforming to the example, till now a majority of them have prohibited all bank notes under the denomination of five dollars. The confidence I feel in the enlightened patriotism of the State Governments, and in the popular intelligence and virtue which control them, gives me every assurance that an appeal to their co-operation in so great and noble a work will not be in vain, especially when they shall have before them a sober and practical exhibition of the probable results of the policy in which their concurrence is invited.

Let us, then, inquire what is likely to be the extent of the effect which will be produced on the currency by the successive prohibition of all notes under five, ten, and twenty dollars, respectively. Mr. Gallatin, whose skill in questions of this sort is universally admitted, in his able pamphlet on the currency written in 1830, estimated the reduction in the amount of the paper circulation which would arise, at that time, from the suppression of all notes under five dollars, at six millions; and that likely to be produced by a suppression of the notes under ten dollars, at about seven millions; making an aggregate of thirteen millions of dollars, and equal to one fifth of the whole paper circulation of the country. Another highly respectable authority on American banking (Gouge) estimates, in 1831, the amount of notes under five dollars then in circulation at seven millions; and of notes under ten dollars at ten millions; making an aggregate of seventeen millions. But let us take Mr. Gallatin's estimate, and suppose that the suppression of the notes under five and ten dollars would, together, operate a reduction of one fifth in the whole amount of bank paper in circulation. Let us then suppose (which, I presume, would not be extravagant) that the suppression of all notes under twenty dollars, and above ten, would produce, in amount, a diminution of one fifth more of the paper circulation. By the ultimate suppression of all notes under twenty dollars, we should then gain an aggregate reduction of two fifths in the whole paper circulation of the country. According to the recent report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the whole paper circulation of the country amounts at this time to 120 millions, two fifths of which would be 48 millions of dollars. But, in order to be within sure limits, we will suppose that the amount of bank paper which would be withdrawn from circulation by the suppression of all notes under twenty dollars would be only 40 millions. That, of course, would be replaced by an equal amount of gold and silver. How, then, would stand the account in the final result? Forty millions, taken from the 120 millions of paper circulation, would leave 80 millions of paper; and, added to the 28 millions of gold and silver already in circulation, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, would give us 68 millions; or (for the sake of round numbers, and to compensate liberal deductions made above) 70 millions of gold and silver in active circulation—not dammed up and stagnating in the coffers of the banks, but spread over the land, irrigating, refreshing, and fertilizing the whole country.

Such, Mr. President, would be the solid and practical result of the ultimate suppression of all bank bills under the denomination of twenty dollars. It would give to the country nearly one half of its whole circulation in the precious metals, forming a solid and unfailing fund for the payment of labor, for the buying and selling of the necessities of life, for the great mass of daily transactions, including the wants and interests of the farmer, the mechanic, and the tradesman; while the other half would consist of an improved paper currency for the use and accommodation of the merchant, and for the larger operations of trade and business. I would ask gentlemen if such a result is not "a consummation devoutly to be wished?" Would it not, in the glowing and patriotic language of the President, form "an era in the history of the country which would be dwelt upon with delight by every true friend of its liberty and independence?" And can we suppose that the enlightened Legislatures of the States, in the view of such a result, pregnant with consequences so important to the safety, the prosperity, and the morals of the whole community, and especially to the interests of those numerous and industrious classes which form the basis and support of our republican system, could be so deaf to the united call of patriotism and wisdom, as not to lend their co-operation in so great and salutary a reform? For myself, Mr. President, I feel a cheering confidence that they will give a helping and efficient hand to this great work.

VOL. XIII.—23

The Legislature of my own State is now engaged in revising her banking system, and I console myself in the belief that she will be among the foremost to vindicate the wisdom and patriotism of the State councils from distrust, by heartily seconding, in her legislation on the subject, our efforts here to establish a sound currency for the country.

But, sir, till by the suppression of the small notes the circulation of the country has become better filled with the precious metals, I do not think it would consist with a just, wise, and paternal policy on the part of the Government to exact payment of its dues in specie exclusively. It could not be done without great hardship to the public debtor, and extensive distress and embarrassment to the whole community. To demonstrate this, nothing more is necessary than to compare the amount of specie in circulation with the amount of the revenue; for it is conceded now, that if payment of one branch of the revenue be required by any permanent regulation to be made in specie, all ought to be paid in specie. According to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, (which appears to me a very liberal one,) the whole amount of specie in circulation does not exceed twenty-eight millions of dollars. The revenue during the last year amounted to forty-seven millions; and perhaps, with all our efforts to reduce it, it may still not fall short of thirty millions. There would, then, be thirty millions of dollars to be paid to the Government, out of a circulation of twenty-eight millions! To confront the two sums is to show the temerity, if not the impossibility, of the attempt. If the public debtors should be thrown upon the banks for large amounts of specie, not to be had from the circulation of the country, no one can be at a loss to perceive to what a disastrous extent the business relations and pecuniary concerns of the whole community would be embarrassed and deranged. And how much of specie, permit me to ask, would remain for that immense mass of payments in private transactions, which, according to a practical estimate made by Mr. Gallatin, in reference to the revenue collected, and the business done, in the city of New York, exceeds more than fifty times the payments to the Government? Nothing, therefore, can be clearer than that an attempt, with our present limited metallic circulation, to collect the public revenue in specie alone would be distressing to the last degree, and could not abide the test of that public judgment without whose approbation no system of policy can or ought to stand.

The honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] in the able speech made by him in the opening of this discussion—a speech which does him great credit, not only for the extent and variety of the research displayed by him, but for the force and ability with which he illustrated his own views, (in some of which it is my misfortune to differ from him,)—brought to the notice of the Senate, from the evidence taken before the Committee of Secrecy of the House of Commons on the Bank of England charter, in 1832, the case of a banker at Manchester, who paid out, in the course of a year, about six millions of dollars in specie to the operatives of that place. But this was done in a country which, as I have already shown, possesses an actual circulating metallic currency of one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, whereas our metallic circulation is but twenty-eight millions! The examination of Mr. Samuel Jones Lloyd, (the banker referred to,) on this point, is so instructive in itself, and so strikingly illustrative of the arguments I have advanced, that I beg leave to read the whole of that portion of it to the Senate, in the form of question and answer in which it is reported:

"Question. You are aware that a great amount of specie is required every week for the payment of wages at Manchester?"

SENATE.]

Treasury Circular.

[JAN. 10, 1837.]

Answer. A very large amount.

Question. Can you give the committee any idea of the amount?

Answer. No, I cannot; but, so far as regards the issue of our own house, I should say that upon the average we pay about 25,000 sovereigns a week.

Question. Is that a fresh supply of sovereigns in each week, or do you obtain it from the circulation of the place?

Answer. We require a continual fresh supply, but not to that extent. I think the fresh supply requisite will average something less than 10,000 a week.

Question. Before the abolition of the £1 notes, were those payments generally made in £1 notes?

Answer. Entirely.

Question. Was the amount then about the same?

Answer. Quite as large.

Question. You say that about 25,000 a week is what you are called upon altogether to pay, and that about 15,000 come back into your hands? What do you apprehend becomes of the remaining 10,000 sovereigns?

Answer. When the £1 notes were in circulation, we could trace it pretty accurately, and I believe the course to be the same with the sovereigns; they are paid principally in wages. The work people lay them out in clothing and provisions, and those sovereigns pass to the provision dealers, and thence into the districts from which the provisions are supplied; the sovereigns then pass into the hands of the country bankers in those districts, who either send them up to London or return them to Manchester, as may be most convenient to them.

Question. It does not follow, then, because you are obliged to have 10,000 sovereigns from the branch bank, (that is, branch of the Bank of England,) that the amount of the circulation in Manchester is continually increasing at the rate of 10,000 a week?

Answer. No, I do not apprehend it is increasing at all.

Now, sir, let us see how these large payments in specie, in Manchester, are made. Mr. Lloyd says, expressly, that, of the 25,000 sovereigns a week paid out by him, 15,000 of them are obtained from the circulation of the place, as, through that channel, they regularly come back into his hands; that he requires a fresh supply of about 10,000 sovereigns a week from the bank; but these 10,000 sovereigns are also constantly returning to the bank from the circulation of the country. They are first paid by the work people to the provision dealers; then by the provision dealers to the farmers, of whom they procure their supplies; from the farmers they pass into the hands of the country bankers, who either return them to the branch bank at Manchester, or, what is the same thing in effect, send them up to the parent bank at London. Thus, the whole amount of these specie payments is supplied by the actual circulating medium of the country—a thing easy and convenient enough, and perfectly natural, where the amount of gold and silver in daily and active circulation is 150,000,000 dollars. To make large payments in specie, under such circumstances, is attended with no difficulty, because specie is the common and habitual currency of the country. The metallic circulation of England is a perpetual fountain, fed by the streams which flow from, and are constantly returning into, it. But to make payments in specie to the Government alone, of thirty or twenty millions of dollars, or the half or the fourth of those sums, in a country whose circulation consists of $120,000,000 of paper, and of but $28,000,000 of gold and silver, is a far different operation.

Another most important lesson is to be derived from the evidence of Mr. Lloyd. How were these payments for wages made in Manchester previous to the prohibition of small notes? In sovereigns? In gold or silver? Let us return to the examination of Mr. Lloyd:

“Question. Before the abolition of the £1 notes, were those payments generally made in £1 notes?”

Answer. Entirely.

Question. Was the amount then about the same?

Previous to the suppression of the small notes, then, the whole amount of payments now made in gold were made exclusively in £1 notes, and, but for that suppression, would still be made in £1 notes. While the £1 notes were in circulation, these payments could not be made in gold, because gold was not in circulation. Gold was, doubtless, in the country, accumulated in the vaults of banks; but not being in circulation, there was no common and accessible fund from which it could be readily and conveniently obtained for the business of life. It never will be in circulation until bank notes of the smaller denominations have been first suppressed. It is in vain for the Government to attempt to bring it into circulation by demanding it in payment of the public dues. By doing so, the public debtor may be subjected to hardship, the banks may be exposed to runs upon them for specie, and the business of the community may be crippled and deranged. But gold and silver will never circulate while bank notes of the same denomination are permitted to occupy the channels of circulation. “You may call spirits from the vasty deep, but will they come?”

The requisition of specie in payments to the Government will not only not avail to bring gold and silver into circulation, but, if insisted on, while gold and silver yet form, comparatively, but a small part of the actual currency of the country, it will inevitably have the effect of diminishing their circulation. While bank paper forms the great mass of the currency of the country, if the Government refuse to receive it in payment of the public dues, and demand specie exclusively, the necessary consequence will be to enhance, to a greater or less extent, the value of gold and silver in relation to paper. That being the case, gold and silver will no longer circulate freely. Those who have specie will be unwilling to part with it, except at a premium; and those who have notes will be anxious to convert them into specie. Hoarding of the precious metals will then commence, and but little of them be seen in circulation. No one, I presume, Mr. President, attaches much importance to the collection of the public revenue in specie, as an ultimate object, if it can be made equally safe by other means. It is only as an instrument of purifying and correcting the currency that it deserves the consideration of a practical statesman. The great object is not to amass specie in the public Treasury, or in the vaults of banks, but to diffuse its healthful currents through the business of society, and to bring it into active circulation among the people. This can only be effected by the previous suppression of the small notes; and any attempt by the Government, before that is done, to collect its revenues in specie, instead of promoting and extending the circulation of gold and silver, tends directly to narrow and diminish their circulation.

The indiscriminate refusal of bank paper in payment of the public dues might, in the present condition of the country, be attended with other serious hazards. We have heard a great deal recently, Mr. President, of the pecuniary panic and distress prevailing in England and Ireland, and of the extensive commercial embarrassments felt there. These embarrassments (in Ireland, especially) seem to have arisen mainly from this very circumstance of a refusal to receive the paper of solvent banks in collections of the public revenue. It appears that some of the collectors of the customs had arbitrarily refused the bills of the Provincial Bank of Ireland.

Treasury Circular.

[SENATE.]

Thereupon, a run upon the bank immediately commenced, which, nevertheless, weathered the storm. The panic spread in regard to other institutions, which, though solvent, were compelled to stop payment; and a general scene of confusion, alarm, and embarrassment, ensued. But I will give the details in an extract from an English paper, which has been republished extensively in all our principal journals. Here it is:

"The pressure was yet severe, not only throughout England, but in Ireland. In the latter country there had been a panic, attended by several severe commercial disasters. This panic was commenced by the collectors of the customs at Newry, and some other places, refusing the bills of the Provincial Bank of Ireland. A run upon the bank was the inevitable and immediate consequence. The solvency of the bank, however, had never been questioned, and was finally attested by the result. The panic spread in respect to other institutions, and the Dublin Agricultural Bank stopped payment on the 15th. Strong efforts were made by its friends to sustain it. One gentleman, Mr. Gresham, sent in £25,000. The liabilities of the bank are stated at £240,000; its assets at £680,000.

"This bank was established in 1834, by 2,170 partners. It now has 5,000 partners, and twenty-six branches scattered all over the country, all of which stop, of course. But, notwithstanding the solvency of the institution, its suspension will operate fearful injury."

All this pecuniary suffering and distress, widely ramified as it afterwards became, originated in the refusal, by officers of the Government, to receive the notes of a solvent bank in payment of the public revenue. If, Mr. President, we shall, by a sweeping law, refuse to receive the paper of all banks, however sound, in discharge of the public dues, will there not be danger of similar consequences? Might it not operate, to a certain extent, as a discredit of all bank paper, exposing the institutions which issue it to severe runs, and the community at large to consequential pressure and embarrassment? At all events, there would be heavy demands upon the banks for the specie requisite in payments to the Government, which the limited metallic circulation of the country would be wholly inadequate to supply. Would it be just or wise in the Government, in the present condition of the currency, with a Shylock severity, to demand its pound of flesh? Would not such a course tend to produce, instead of averting, the catastrophe which appears to be dreaded by some?

I should be as little disposed, Mr. President, as any member of this body, to hazard the safety of the public revenue by any undue laxity in regard to its collection. The proposition I have had the honor to submit provides studiously for the security of the revenue. It not only does not allow the notes of any banks to be received, but such as are promptly redeemed in specie—subject, too, to important restrictions in regard to their denominations—but it expressly declares that no notes whatever shall be received which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not agree to pass at once to the credit of the United States as cash. This guarantee of the deposit banks converts the whole of the public collections virtually into specie; and when it is recollected that the Secretary of the Treasury is empowered, whenever he thinks it necessary, to obtain from them a special and supplementary security for the public deposits, the solidity of the guarantee may be reposed upon with confidence.

It is objected to this provision, by some gentlemen, that it puts it in the power of the deposit banks to say what notes shall, and what shall not, be received by the Government in payment of its revenues. The absolute responsibility of the deposit banks for the notes deposited with them on public account is deemed a fundamental principle in the fiscal code of Government; without it, the practice of special deposits must be revived, which formerly subjected the Government to heavy losses, and is the origin of the unavailable funds still borne on the books of the Treasury. But if the deposit banks are to be absolutely responsible for the notes deposited with them as so much cash, they ought, certainly, to have a reasonable discretion as to the notes they shall receive on deposit. This is no new principle in the practice of the Government; it has been a standing instruction from the Treasury Department to the public receivers and collectors, for more than twenty years, to receive no notes but such as the deposit banks would credit to the United States as cash. To satisfy, however, as far as possible, the jealousy which has been expressed on this subject, and to guard against any arbitrary or wanton abuse of their discretion by the deposit banks, I have, by a modification of my original resolution, placed them, in this regard, expressly under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury.

While the proposition I have had the honor to submit provides, as I believe, in the amplest manner, for the security of the public revenue, it pays a due regard to the interests of the great body of the community. An inflexible exaction of gold and silver in payments to the Government, in the present condition of the circulating medium, it seemed to me, would involve a necessary and serious derangement to the whole business and commerce of the country. These interests I believe to be more or less common to all. I am not one of those who see a natural enmity and inherent incompatibility between the interests of different classes of men; I do not belong to that school of philosophy which divides society horizontally, the upper portion pressing upon the lower with the weight of its incumbent mass, while the latter is constantly striving to throw off the load by violent and vindictive struggle. This is the bellum omnium in omnia which forms no part either of my philosophy or my feelings. No, sir, my theory assigns a perpendicular stratification to society, placing all its component parts side by side on the same platform of equality, with common rights, common interests, and common duties, mutually giving and receiving support by their juxtaposition. In this aspect, the interests of the merchant, the farmer, the mechanic, the laborer, are the same; what promotes the prosperity of one, redounds to the advantage of each.

In regard to the effect upon the currency, the proposition I have had the honor to submit, if adopted, would prove in some degree instrumental, I trust, in promoting that great reform which has been so impressively recommended by the patriotic Chief Magistrate of the nation, and which, at the moment when he is about to close a long and glorious career of public service, in a hallowed retirement, "by all a nation's wishes blest," may well form the object of his ardent vows for his country. That reform seeks, by the substitution of gold and silver, in place of the lower denominations of bank paper, to make the precious metals the familiar currency of common life. But this object can be fully accomplished only by the ultimate suppression of all notes under twenty dollars; five-dollar notes and half eagles will not circulate together; the ten-dollar note must be put down, before the eagle can take its place.

I am aware, Mr. President, that our position is not exempt from difficulties and dangers. But I see in them nothing to create alarm, far less to excite despondency; but every thing to rouse the devotion and energy of the patriot. With whatever embarrassments we may be beset, there is a redeeming power in the virtue and intelligence of the American people, which will conduct us in safety and triumph through them all. Some gentlemen, I find, still fondly recur to their favorite prescription of a national bank, as the panacea for all our ills. In my humble judgment, sir, the remedy is far worse than the disease. The protection of a national bank would be "such protection as vultures give to lambs." No, sir; let us rather invoke the protection of our guardian and victorious bird, the American eagle, the emblem of our freedom and strength. An able and experienced member of the House of Commons, speaking of the inherent tendencies of the banking system, said: "There is in it an inevitable tendency to over-issues of paper, without a constant sentinel keeping watch upon it; and that sentinel [for them] was the metallic sovereign in constant circulation." The American metallic eagle, in active circulation, will perform the same tutelary office for us; and, with such other provisions as the practical and sagacious spirit of American legislation shall devise, will finally, I firmly believe, place our currency on a footing which, for convenience and security united, will rival any other under the sun.

SENATE.]

Let the State Legislatures proceed firmly and vigorously in the suppression of the small notes. I believe they will. They have the highest motives which can address themselves to human action to accomplish this great reform. Let them subject all banks, both old and new, to efficient regulation; let them regard with jealousy every proposition for an increase of banks, and yield to none which is not founded on broad considerations of public utility; let them impose strict, practical limitations, both upon their issues and their discounts; let them provide for frequent periodical scrutinies into their condition; and, above all, let them retain in their own hands a constant power of correcting abuses, and of protecting, in every emergency, the interests of the community:

It is this principle of legislative regulation and control over banking institutions which constitutes the distinctive feature of American policy. It is the result of the practical character of the American mind; and I am happy to perceive that the people of older countries—of England, especially—are turning to us for lessons and examples in this branch of the public economy. In that country, beyond the sixty-five miles from London, which define the limits of the Bank of England monopoly, numerous broods of joint stock companies and private bankers have sprung up, without regulation by law, without limitation of number, without restriction as to their issues or discounts, and without responsibility to the public authority. The consequence has been, that this branch of their system has run into wild disorder and confusion. They now see that the privilege of issuing money, of whatever kind, is an essential branch of the public sovereignty, and, like every other delegated power of that sort, it must be subjected to regulation, to inspection, to responsibility. This is a lesson they have learned from us; and it is gratifying to see that, on another fundamental point, the most enlightened minds in that country are coming to the same conclusion that we have attained. They begin to see that the monopoly of the Bank of England, as that of the Bank of the United States here, is a dangerous monopoly; that the dominion of such an institution over the circulation is a power more of evil than good; and that it must be brought down to the level of competition with other solid institutions. The opinions of the two countries, on this great concern of the currency, are mutually approximating, and settling down upon a common system. They are learning from us the necessary checks and controls of a paper currency; we from them, I trust, the value and importance of an enlarged metallic circulation. I repeat, then, there is nothing in our present situation to excite alarm or despondency, whatever occasion there may be for vigilance and caution. Let us look our dangers steadily in the face, but let us not be dismayed by them. Let us grapple with the difficulties which may oppose us, in a spirit of strenuous and determined patriotism, and we shall triumph over and subdue them. In conclusion, let me say to the political friends with whom I have had the honor to act in trying times, that, after having successfully dissipated so many panics raised under other auspices, we shall not, I trust, at last become the victims of a panic of our own creation.

When Mr. RIVES had taken his seat,

Mr. CLAY rose and said that he desired to submit to the Senate a few considerations on the subject under debate; but, as the hour was somewhat late, the Senate might prefer that he deferred what he had to say till tomorrow, and proceed for the remainder of to-day to some other business; whereupon,

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11.

Mr. KENT presented the credentials of JOHN H. SPENCE, elected by the Legislature of Maryland a Senator from that State, to fill the place vacated by the death of Hon. R. H. GOLDSBOROUGH, till the 4th of March next.

TEXAS.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution, which lies on the table one day, for consideration:

Resolved, That the State of Texas having established and maintained an independent Government, capable of performing those duties, foreign and domestic, which appertain to independent Governments, and it appearing that there is no longer any reasonable prospect of the successful prosecution of the war by Mexico against said State, it is expedient and proper, and in perfect conformity with the laws of nations, and the practice of this Government in like cases, that the independent political existence of said State be acknowledged by the Government of the United States.

Mr. WALKER said it was not his intention to ask a departure from the rules of the Senate, in order to enter upon the consideration of this resolution at this period. The resolution, (Mr. W. stated,) he would only say, at this period, was in exact concurrence with the views expressed by the President of the United States in his last message on this subject. In that message, the President declared it as his opinion, that the independence of Texas might be considered as suspended upon the issue of the threatened invasion by the army under the command of General Bravo. Mr. W. said he had this morning received information direct from Vera Cruz, as late as the first of December last, that this invasion had proved entirely abortive; that the army of Bravo had been reduced, by desertion and other causes, to a very small number; that this miserable remnant was unsupplied with provisions; and that, in consequence of these events, General Bravo had resigned the command of the army, and that the invasion, in all probability, would be abandoned. Mr. W. said he was satisfied that full reliance might be placed on the correctness of this information, and that he was fully convinced that, with the knowledge of these facts, the President would cheerfully unite with Congress in recognising the independence of Texas.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

The Senate having again proceeded to the order of the day, which was the consideration of the resolution heretofore moved by Mr. EWING, of Ohio, concerning the Treasury circular, with the substitute therefor proposed by Mr. RIVES—

Mr. CLAY said that he took great pleasure in tendering to the Senate his respectful thanks for the indulgence which had yesterday been accorded him, at the instance of the Senator from North Carolina. And he should esteem himself most happy if on the present occasion he should be so successful as to say what should occasion no regret to any for having conferred upon him that indulgence.

In the State (said Mr. C.) of which I am a citizen, I had lately occasion to express my opinion in regard to that Treasury order which it is proposed in the resolution offered by my friend from Ohio [Mr. EWING] to rescind. What I said on that occasion appeared in the prints of the day; and a degree of unexpected notoriety has since been given to it during the present session. What I uttered I sincerely believed. I believed it then, I believe it now; and I reaffirm it with all sincerity here in my place, as my settled opinion. Before, however, I proceed to state the grounds on which it rests, I shall take some notice of the able speech with which we were yesterday favored by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] Though that speech was any thing but a justification of the legality of the Treasury order, it was ingenious, plausible, often eloquent. The speech throughout its whole tenor was indeed directly adverse to the order. The Treasury order proceeds on the principle of requiring specie only in payment for one of the most important branches of the public revenue; but the Senator from Virginia is in favor of receiving in payment a mixed currency. The order proceeds on the principle of exhibiting partiality toward certain particular classes, in their payment of the public dues; the Senator from Virginia is for a rule which shall operate alike and equally on all, and shall extend to every branch of the public revenue. In a great deal, indeed, in most of what was so well said by that Senator, I entirely concur. There are, however, some points of difference, which I shall presently notice. I regret, that while the country generally, while the Senator himself, and while we all, are so deeply interested in knowing what is to be the real policy of the administration on the question of the currency, we are left as much in the dark as ever. On one side of the Senate, by one friend of the administration, it is said that the precious metals alone are to form the currency, and that all paper is to be driven out of use; gradually, indeed, but surely. The Senator from Virginia, on this side, says that the policy about to prevail seeks to establish a mixed currency, consisting in part of specie, and in part of the notes of specie-paying banks. Which of these friends of the administration are we to credit? I must confess, that so far as past experience is to be looked to on such a subject, it seems to favor a metallic system more than a mixed currency.

At the last session of Congress, a proposition was introduced into the Senate, requiring the payment of specie in all cases by the purchasers of our public lands. That proposition was, however, put down by an almost unanimous vote. For, although no call was made for the yeas and nays, I think I am fully authorized in saying that, had such a call been made, there would not have been more than one or two votes in favor of the measure. Yet on the 11th of July, almost immediately on the rising of Congress, we find this very proposition embodied in a Treasury order, which requires the payment of specie in regard to our most important branch of the public revenue. This fact would seem to indicate that the policy of a mixed currency, for which the Senator from Virginia has contended, was not then the policy of the administration, and that not his but another's influence was predominant in the cabinet. In the preamble to this order, in which the reasons for it are set forth, we find not only that specie is required from all purchasers of the public land, but that that other element of the currency which the Senator would retain is denounced as "paper money." And even in regard to the messages of the President himself, did time permit, and were it necessary to do so, it would be easy to show from all of them, so far as they relate to this subject of currency, that although President Jackson commenced his administration by recommending a mixed currency, yet that he gradually departed more and more from that ground, until, in the message of 1835, referred to by the Senator from Virginia, he speaks of getting back to the "constitutional medium," evidently alluding to an exclusive specie circulation. You will therefore agree that the uncertainty of which I have spoken is not feigned, but real; and I entreat the two divisions of the friends of the administration speedily to settle between themselves the controverted question, what the policy to be pursued actually is, and forthwith to state it to the country, so that all our business men may have an eye to it, and regulate themselves accordingly, in their moneyed transactions.

The Senator from Virginia tells us that he is in favor of an enlargement of the metallic foundation of the currency. And who is not? Is the idea a new one with the Senator from Virginia? Did it not originate, or was it not at least first pressed by my friends who were endeavoring to guard the currency of the country from the dangers which beset it? Was not the principle of restricting issues of bank notes below prescribed denominations first introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts who sits near me, [Mr. WEBSTER,] as one provision in the renewed charter of the Bank of the United States in 1832? And while I am very sure that the Senator from Virginia did not take from the speech of my friend on that occasion the anecdote which he introduced into his own of the message sent by Mr. Burke to Mr. Pitt, warning him that if he permitted the issue of one-pound notes he would never again see a guinea in England, yet it does so happen that that very anecdote was related by the Senator from Massachusetts in his speech before the Senate in 1832, and was used by him expressly in support of the idea of increasing and strengthening the metallic basis of our paper currency.

But whilst both gentlemen concur in the propriety of imposing some limitation on our paper circulation, yet there is a wide difference between them as to the mode in which that desirable object is to be effected. The Senator from Virginia would rely on the voluntary action of a thousand banks, and of twenty six State sovereignties operating on those banks. We of the opposition, on the contrary, thought it wisest to rely on a remedy within our own power, to trust to our own laws, and to look to that which we could effect by our own energies and the exertion of our own constitutional authority. We considered this a practical and efficacious means. The Senator from Virginia relies on what I consider wholly inefficient. His reliance, it seems, is on the enlightened patriotism of the States and of the banks; the enlightened patriotism of nine hundred or a thousand banks, created for the sole purpose of making money! But, sir, have we no lessons from experience in our own past history, as to the degree of reliance which may safely be placed on the mere voluntary action of any community, however enlightened and patriotic it may be? What was the state of things during our own Revolution, when we were contending in the most glorious cause that ever animated the hearts or nerved the arms of men? The reliance was then on the voluntary payment of the quotas, not of twenty-six, but of thirteen States, indispensable to the success of that cause and to our soldiers, who, unfed and unclad, were enduring every suffering to which humanity can be possibly exposed. Let me ask the honorable Senator, in view of what then took place, whether reliance on the patriotism even of enlightened States, much less that of banking corporations, is safe and secure.

It is now four or five years since the policy was first announced on our side, and was afterwards taken up by a portion of the friends of the administration, to widen the metallic foundation of the currency by a prohibition of small bank notes; and what has been the result? How many States has enlightened patriotism induced to adopt the policy? The Senator from Virginia mentioned Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, to which he might have added Kentucky, and possibly one or two others, as having imposed the desired restriction; but they did it either prior to, or without any sort of reference to the annunciation of the policy from Washington. Of all the twenty-six States, he believed New York and Maine only had conformed their legislation to the recommendation sent forth from this city. And it is remarkable, with respect to Maine, as he had understood, that, after the restriction was imposed, a supply of the prohibited notes below five dollars was sent for to Massachusetts, for small change in the transaction of business.

No, sir; no man has a higher opinion of the patriotism of the country than I have. There is no one who entertains a higher opinion of the patriotism of the States, or is more disposed to place a due and proper degree of reliance upon it; but I consider it sound policy not exclusively to depend upon it, but to add to that security the salutary vigor of the law. Hence we supposed that it had been demonstrated by all experience in this country that a national bank, created by, and under the proper control of, this Government, was a fit and necessary instrument to guard the paper system of the country against its tendency to run into excessive issues, and ultimately into utter disorder; that such a bank would at least retard that deplorable state of things; and that, if it could not finally prevent it, when the notes of the local banks had lost all confidence, and ceased to be a secure circulation, the notes of the national bank would remain a safe medium, in which the revenue of the country could be collected and disbursed.

From the moment that the Bank of the United States ceased to exist, you gave up the rudder of the national currency, and I greatly fear that it will get into such a state of confusion that we shall see it go on, from worse to worse, until all shall unite in totally withdrawing from it the public confidence.

But if it were even possible that you could succeed, by appeals to the States and to the banks, in bringing about the restoration of a sound currency, how long would it last? Supposing a general pressure to be produced by the withdrawal of specie from the country, would not the banks instantly be prompted by the States themselves to supply the wants of the community by furnishing the desired medium? Trace back your own history; look to that period which preceded the Revolution, when the colonies were compelled to resort to bills of credit, and even to tobacco, as a circulating medium. I believe that in Virginia, the law to that effect remains still on the statute book, and that fee bills of some public officers are yet made out at the rate of so many pounds of tobacco for each item. If altered, the law has not been very long changed. The necessity of a circulating medium of some kind is indispensable. Society cannot exist without it. It cannot revert to the primitive state of barter. The representative of property must be had, even if it be in the form of peltries, tobacco, uncoined bars, paper money, or small bank notes. And this great social want is paramount to all law.

But the plan of the honorable Senator, to effect a restriction on bank issues, does not consist exclusively in a reliance on the patriotism of the banks or the States. He would appeal to the interest of the banks, and would hold over them the threat that, unless they cease the issue of small notes, the public deposits shall be withdrawn from their custody; in other words, it is by employing the revenue of the United States that he would effect the restriction he seeks. Now, sir, what is the amount of this revenue? Twenty-five or thirty millions per annum. And what did he tell us from very high authority? He told us that the money transactions in one single city, the city of New York, were estimated several years ago, and that by a man than whom none is better acquainted with all such matters, at 1,500 millions annually; and at this day the amount is probably double that. Now, if, in one single city, the course of business requires the employment of 1,500 millions of dollars annually, what must be the aggregate amount of the transactions in all the other cities and parts of the Union? The amount baffles all human calculation; and do you suppose that, by wielding a revenue of only thirty millions, you can overawe, coerce, and control banks whose business amounts, perhaps, to a thousand times as much? What proportion does the number of your deposit banks bear to that of the whole of the banks of the Union? Before the passage of the deposit act they amounted, if I remember, to less than forty; they are now, perhaps, eighty; and we are told by a secret authority, which seems to be high and controlling, that their number, when the deposit act is executed, is again to be reduced down to forty; but say it is eighty, and then by your operation on these eighty banks you are to bring about an effect so important as to deprive the remaining nine hundred and twenty banks of that which, in many instances, constitutes the most important part of their circulation. Can we not see that the thing is perfectly chimerical?

Suppose you prevail with one bank to give up the issue of its small notes. What is the immediate effect? The vacuum produced by the withdrawal of the small notes of that bank is instantly filled by the small notes of other banks; and even if you could go a step further, and prohibit your deposit banks from receiving in deposit the notes of any bank which issues bills below five dollars, what would be the further effect? There would be an instant collision between the deposit banks and the other banks of the country; and, as the other banks are so much more numerous, the necessary result would be, the utter destruction of the deposit banks themselves. We have already seen some of the effects resulting from these requirements. We passed an act at the last session prohibiting the use of notes below $10 in the disbursements of the United States. Well, sir, we have a disbursing bank in this city; and how was the rule observed? All the Senators who hear me are personal witnesses to its violation in payment to themselves of their daily allowance. I do not mention this to complain of it. It is possible, if you had ordered the officers of the Senate to receive either specie or notes over $10, it would have been complied with. But the bank still goes on, and it would still continue its course, notwithstanding any voluntary restriction which your wisdom may suggest. Is it not too much to expect that, when you, to whom the task belongs, have abandoned the care of the currency of the country, the States or the banks shall take upon themselves the duty of remedying the defects or the neglect of your legislation? The parties will take care of themselves, and will look no further. They will leave to the whole to provide for the interests of the whole. What interest have the banks in Maine, for example, so to shape their course as to suit the exigencies of the community in Louisiana? We, on the contrary, contended for one currency, which should be general throughout the Union, consisting of the notes of the bank of the General Government, and for a local currency, consisting of the bills of local institutions; so that there might be a general currency, to be employed in purposes of a general nature, while the local currency would subserve all local purposes. Our wish was to have the general currency every where receivable in payment of the public dues, while we relied on the local banks for the medium of local circulation. But you have given up a bank whose credit was coextensive with the commercial world, which supplied a currency never surpassed, and regulated exchanges with an economy unexampled in this or any other country. And do you expect these local institutions can be an adequate substitute? Do you cherish the vain expectation that the States will come to your relief, and rectify your incompetency? No, sir, no. Each State will say, it is not our affair to provide a general currency for the United States; we must leave that to be managed by the General Government. And does not all experience demonstrate that, while local Governments constitute the safest depository of local interests, the General Government alone can provide for the welfare of the whole?

What is the present actual condition of the banking capital of the country? We told you that the moment you destroyed a Bank of the United States there would immediately spring up innumerable local banks; that banking capital would then be greatly extended, and that the change might lead to the destruction of all confidence in the circulating paper medium. And are not these predictions in a rapid progress of fulfilment? We are informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that the amount of bank capital has increased, since the veto on the bank charter, from 200 millions to 300 millions—an increase of fifty per cent.; and that the circulation has increased in the same ratio, viz: from 80 millions to 120 millions.

I concur with the Senator from Virginia in the position that no state of things is more calamitous than that which accompanies a decline in the circulating medium of a country; and the degree of distress is in proportion to the rapidity of such decrease; while, on the other hand, the prosperity of a country is never at least apparently greater than while the amount of its currency is on the increase. But does any man suppose that this can continue? Can any reflecting man persuade himself that twenty-six distinct and independent States, looking each one to its own separate interest, will exercise such forbearance as not to add bank to bank, and increase the paper circulation within its limits, till the country will be involved in the danger of some great calamity? I greatly fear it. When or how it shall come, no one can exactly foresee; but we can all imagine that, if there should occur a great failure, or a great reduction in the price of the Southern staple, or (what is now actually threatened) a general return of American stocks which have been sent to Europe on foreign demand, from any cause, of a large amount of the specie in the United States, the necessary consequence would be such a run upon the banks as may cause a general suspension of specie payments, if not the bankruptcy of many of the banks. What is their present condition? They are without concert, co-operation, or mutual confidence. The moment there is a great and sudden demand, to meet a corresponding demand abroad, there must ensue a general panic throughout the country. Each bank, being necessarily unable to measure the exact extent of the demand, will, of course, call on its own debtors, and the same thing, for a similar reason, taking place in all the other banks, there will probably be a general stoppage of payments and universal bankruptcy. Was not all this foreseen? Was it not foretold? Were gentlemen not warned, again and again, not to destroy the only means on which we could with safety rely?

Between the system of the gentleman from Virginia and the hard-money system, I am far from being sure that the latter is not a more efficacious remedy than any voluntary action of the States and of the banks. The hard-money system proposes that, in all collections and disbursements of the revenues of the Government, specie alone shall be received, and all paper, of every description, entirely excluded. The object of both systems is to retain a certain amount of specie within the nation, by the creation of a necessity for its use, and thus to prevent its exportation: for if the Government shall decide to receive nothing but specie in payment of its dues, the consequence would be the necessity of retaining a sufficient amount of the hard metals for the collection and disbursement of the revenue. It might not, indeed, be necessary to retain the whole amount of 30 millions, assuming that to be the annual revenue, since one dollar in specie might be made to pay two dollars in revenue. But a certain amount, bearing a considerable proportion to the revenue, would be retained in the country. The process of getting at such a result is of necessity extremely difficult, and would create much practical inconvenience.

If specie should become very scarce, the collectors of the Government might, from necessity, be forced to receive a portion of the revenue in notes of good banks; but if you received this revenue in specie only, you immediately and unavoidably elevate the relative value of specie above other parts of the currency, because, while hard money would perform all the offices of other media of circulation, it would then discharge one other office, which they could not. The result must be to create a demand for specie, and thereby to render it a marketable commodity. A man would not then, as now, be as ready to receive a debt in good notes as in specie. He will always want the specie, because it would command a premium. Does not the Senator perceive that gold and silver must then cease to be a circulating medium, and be converted into merchandise? It would be sold at an advance, and would be hoarded for that end. Yet I am far from being certain, if the object in view be to retain a certain amount of hard money in the country, that the remedy which suggests the exclusive use of specie has not a certainty of success which cannot be produced by relying on the patriotism or the voluntary action of a thousand banks and twenty-six independent State sovereignties. My word for it, in fifteen or twenty years after the system of the Senator from Virginia shall have gone into effect, although the same identical banks may not continue to issue notes of a small denomination, yet the aggregate amount of such notes in actual circulation will not be less than it was at the commencement of the experiment.

But we were told by the honorable Senator that Great Britain and several other countries of Europe, having become enlightened by the example of America, are disposed to imitate it. He told us, further, that the people of Great Britain are becoming sensible of the impolicy of monopolies, and opposed to the continuance of the Bank of England, and that the present policy of that Government aims at the establishment of joint stock companies, in addition to the large number of private banks, and by this means ultimately to get rid of the Bank of England altogether. On that subject all I can say is, that such is not the state of my information. I know, indeed, that they have lately passed a law for the creation, under certain restrictions, of joint stock companies; but what is the state of public opinion in regard to those local banking institutions, which so closely, as the Senator thinks, resemble our own? It is distrust, uncertainty, and fear. We are all aware that a committee of the House of Commons, at the head of which is the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was required to examine into the condition of these local banks. I have before me a report of that committee, rendered as late as August last. The joint stock companies in that country are established by what they denominate deeds of settlement, which specify the conditions under which they are created. After presenting an analysis of a variety of these deeds of settlement, the committee enumerate thirteen different defective provisions in the laws, which may require the interposition of Parliament, and they conclude by urging the necessity of the greatest possible prudence and caution in the management of those banks.

While the language of the report shows very clearly that there is great apprehension felt as to the safety and solidity of these institutions, yet it is so constructed as prudently to avoid the excitement of unnecessary alarm. But supposing it to be true that, in a Government constituted as is Great Britain, it were possible to dispense with a national bank, and to rely on local joint stock companies, and on private banks, let me ask the honorable Senator if the condition of England and America is not totally different? You there see a power asserted for Parliament to legislate with plenary authority, both for the future and for existing institutions. Have we any such power? There is a consolidated Government; ours is a confederacy. They have power by their legislation to guard against malepractices in all the banking institutions in the kingdom. But here there is no such authority. There, there is not an institution which does not perpetually act under the control of a general law, extending throughout the empire. But here we have one thousand banks, scattered over our immense territory, and in twenty-six States, on which the General Government can exercise no effective control whatever. So that, even were it true that the British Government could dispense with the Bank of England, it would be far from proving that we could imitate her, when we consider that the local banks in this country are subject to twenty-six separate and independent Governments, over which we have no power to act.

We were told, and the country was promised, that on the destruction of the Bank of the United States we should be furnished with a better currency than we then enjoyed; a currency unrivalled on the face of the globe, which was under better regulation, and by which exchanges were effected at a cheaper rate than in any part of the earth. The paper of that bank had its credit established throughout the world. It was received in Asia; it was received all over Europe, and throughout this entire continent. Our exchanges were managed with an economy which we must all remember with regret at the change which has since taken place; for what is the state of our exchanges now? When they take place between distant places, the premium at the one end of the course ought to be met by the discount at the other end. But is that so? When a merchant at New York sells a bill on New Orleans at a discount, is that discount counterbalanced by the premium on a similar bill at New Orleans? No. A discount is charged at both ends of the line. And it often happens that at neither can you dispose of your bill without great difficulty and sacrifice.

I too, sir, am aware that we are surrounded with difficulties. In that I concur entirely with the Senator from Virginia; but my friends are not responsible for this state of things. You all know the reason of it. You all feel it every day. You know that we are in the midst of a dark and dense wilderness. Who is to be the Moses, whether from this side or the other of the Senate, (looking at the positions of the Senators from Virginia and Missouri,) that shall lead us to the promised land, is among those unknown things which the future alone can disclose.

And now I turn to the questions really before the Senate. I beg pardon for the digression into which I have been led in noticing the able and interesting speech of the Senator from Virginia; the gratification of hearing which I shared in common with the rest of the Senate. If, in noticing the few points with respect to which I differ from that honorable Senator, I have departed from the rigid regularity of debate, I must plead his example as my apology. What are the questions which we have to consider? In 1816, the condition of the country in regard to the currency was this: throughout all the country south of New England there was a general suspension of specie payments, and the bank notes in circulation were of different degrees of value, and, nevertheless, constituted the only medium in which the public dues were paid. The consequence was, that, instead of taxes having the uniform character required by the constitution, different parts of the country and different individuals paid the same tax in widely varying values. This was a condition which the country could not long bear, and the Government would have been wanting to every duty it owed to the community, had it tolerated such a state of things. For every body must agree that there is in reality no difference between exacting different rates of duty in different parts of the country, and requiring that the same rates shall be paid in media very different in value. Such was the state in which Congress found the country at the memorable session of 1816. The question was, what should be done? That voluntary action of the banks, which is the sole reliance of the Senator from Virginia, had been fully tried, and found wanting. There had been convention after convention of the banks, to try if they could not agree voluntarily to resume specie payments, but it was found impracticable to do so. Congress felt called upon to interpose, and two great and leading measures were devised, as presenting the only prospect of remedy. One was proposed, or, to speak more correctly, was espoused, by the Senator from South Carolina opposite, [Mr. CALHOUN,] (for it had originally been suggested by a late Secretary of the Treasury.) The other was brought forward by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] One of these measures was the creation of a Bank of the United States. As there existed no paper medium of circulation on which the country could rely, the establishment of such a bank was supposed to be the only alternative left to the Government. It met with strong opposition, but was carried successfully through. It was apprehended, however, that this measure would be insufficient, unless it should be aided by another; and hence the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, which has repeatedly been alluded to in this debate, was introduced with a design of stimulating the restoration of specie payments, and remedying a state of things which was unjust and scandalous in the eyes of all commercial communities. That bank has been destroyed; and let me here say that I have not the least expectation of any effort being made by my friends, to re-establish it. They have no such purpose. An experiment is now to be tried as to the power of local banks in meeting the wants of the community. Let those who are rashly trying the experiment be responsible for the issue. The resolution of my friend from Massachusetts was introduced simultaneously with the bill to incorporate the United States Bank. It was expected that the bank would go into operation early in the next year. The Secretary of the Treasury, by the resolution, was directed to take measures as soon as might be to insure the payment of all Government dues in four specified media, but the discretion intrusted to him was only to continue until the 20th of February following. After that day, no payment of public dues of any kind was to be permitted, save in one or other of the four media which had been specified.

Can any man look at that resolution at this day, and seriously entertain any doubt as to its true interpretation? The Secretary of the Treasury was immediately called upon to expound it; and an uninterrupted usage of twenty years, under succeeding Secretaries, has uniformly given to it the interpretation which it then received. It never was for a moment believed that it vested him with authority to require only specie, or to exclude entirely any of the four specified funds in payments to Government; that exposition was not interrupted for a moment by the act of 1820. I shall not repeat the argument in regard to it. It accomplished, and was designed to accomplish, but one purpose, which was the abolition of the credit system in the purchase of the public lands, and the substitution thereof of payment in hand. It did not interrupt for a moment the continuous interpretation of the resolution of 1816—an interpretation which extended into three successive administrations, and through seven years of a fourth. Is it not too late, after this long adherence to one interpretation, to say that Congress has misunderstood it; that all the Secretaries have misunderstood it; and that your usage for such a course of years is at this late day to be surrendered as without a true foundation? It has been said that the resolution was restrictive. It was so in so far as it rejected the notes of non-specie-paying banks, but it was mandatory so far as it went to enumerate and specify the different media in which payment might be made. It was restrictive so far as bad notes were concerned, but it conferred a legal right on the payer to make, and a legal obligation on the receiver to accept, payment in one of the four several ways which the law provided. But if the Secretary of the Treasury had authority to select some and to reject others of these modes, then his rejection and selection must be applied universally. He has no right to discriminate between citizen and citizen. He has no right to say to the citizen of Boston, from you I will receive notes of the banks in Boston, but not of the Bank of the United States. Or to a citizen of New York, from you I will receive United States Bank bills, but not bills of the banks in Boston. No. If he had a right to say that either of the four kinds should be received in preference to the rest, he is bound to make that rule and that preference to reach every where throughout the country. But what does he do? He not only discriminates between different branches of the revenue, making regulations to apply to one branch which do not apply to the others, but, in reference to that one branch which is the subject of his order, he discriminates between different classes of individuals. I heard it contended by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. STRANGE] that the exception in relation to actual settlers has now expired by its own limitation. True, sir; but if Congress rises and leaves this vast power in the hands of the Executive, how soon may the discrimination be revived? Unless this order shall be rescinded, will not the Executive draw his conclusions, from the silence of Congress, that it approves what he has done? And may he not suppose that he is authorized even to go farther, and carry down his principle of discrimination from classes to individuals?

I speak now of the question of power. Suppose the Secretary had reversed his rule—suppose he had said that the citizens of the States in which the land lies should have a right to purchase only with specie, while those who came from a distance might make their payment in notes. If he has absolute power over the subject, he might as well have made the one discrimination as the other. And he may not only discriminate between different classes of individuals, but between different places. I have been, indeed, informed that at one of the land offices specie, under the order, was not required. Where is this dispensing power? Where did the Secretary get it? Not from the words of the order, for that applies equally to all.

Sir, I have heard it contended for, again and again, and votes have been given recording such as the opinion of the majority of this chamber, that payment for the public lands is a tax on the community. I do not myself think so. But I put the question to those gentlemen who do, and I ask them how this order can be justified, if all taxes are required to be uniform? I come to the conclusion that its legality cannot be established, either under the joint resolution of 1816 or the law of 1820.

It wants legal authority. It has on its very face all the air of executive legislation. It has a preamble setting forth the reasons which have led to its enactment. The Secretary who put it forth seems strongly to have felt the necessity of sheltering himself under the invulnerable name of his chief. But were there even authority for the order in the letter of the law, I should still argue against its gross injustice in practice.

And this brings me now to inquire, what has been the effect of this order, in its actual operation on the community? The order professes to proceed on the principle that the public lands are sold for a valuable consideration, if payment be made in bank notes, and that specie alone can constitute a just equivalent for their value. And I admit that if the Secretary had gone on to provide that the specie thus received should be the property of the Government, there would at least have been consistency in the course he adopted. But the moment the order appeared, there was an instant pressure for specie, especially in the West and Southwest. The banks were called upon, and specie in all quarters was put in requisition, for the purpose of paying for the public lands. The pressure upon the banks in Kentucky was great. Gentlemen talk to us about the inconsiderable amount that has been received, which is stated at $1,800,000, exclusive of $300,000 more, which was placed on deposit at Washington, and the certificates of which were received as cash; say, in round numbers, two millions of dollars. It is very true that this amount was not great, but the argument drawn from it is not a fair one. We must recollect that when the operation commenced no one knew what was to be its extent. No individual bank could possibly tell, and each was left in total uncertainty as to what would be required of them. The banks could not foresee that no more than two millions of dollars would thus be drawn from them. If they had known this beforehand, they might have made their arrangements to meet it. But on all the banks of the West and of the Southwest daily demands were made for specie. There was, at once, not only a cessation of discounts, and the purchase of bills of exchange, but the banks made heavy calls upon their debtors. This state of things operated with peculiar severity on the West. It happened just about the time when our people begin to carry their live stock to market. The ordinary course of the trade is this: They draw bills upon themselves, or on their friends, at the markets to which they are destined, which are discounted by the bank, and with the proceeds of which they purchase their stock, and meet their engagements. No business with us is more beneficial to all parties. The purchaser of stock diffuses money through the community, and on reaching the market he makes his sales, and is thus enabled to pay the bills which he had drawn. All this was immediately interrupted, in consequence of this Treasury order; for how could the banks venture to discount, with such an order hanging over their heads? If they purchased bills, the operation was equivalent to a disbursement of so much specie; for if they paid in these notes, they immediately returned upon them for specie. The Senator from Virginia has told us about the effect of the course pursued by certain collectors in Ireland, in refusing to receive in payment the notes of Irish banks. What was that consequence? The stoppage of the Bank of Dublin and its branches. Nor could that gentleman have pronounced a more severe condemnation of the order than by the example which he quoted from the kingdom of Ireland. The banks, as I have said, were run upon. Individuals who possessed specie were unwilling to part from it, and reserved it for investment in the public lands. And there was a general accumulation, for the purpose of paying it into the land offices. Well, sir, it was carried to the land offices; and when it got there, whose was it? What became of it? Was it the property of the Government? No, sir. Did you get it? No, sir. It was carried to the deposite banks, and there it was credited as so much money to the Government. The whole transaction, therefore, amounted to this: you forced all the purchasers of the public land to become collectors of specie for the deposite banks. The money was not collected for the Government. You cannot call for it. It is the property of those banks, to be used as they please. You have refused to credit banks for the notes they issued; you have occasioned all this vast inconvenience; and, finally, instead of getting the specie which you have been at so much trouble to collect, you get nothing but bank credits.

The money was transported from the seaboard, from the Western and Southwestern banks, from the theatres of business, where it might have been constantly and advantageously used, and taken into the interior, to banks of very limited business. And even there they were afraid to use it, lest it might be suddenly called for. The difference of the two operations, before and after the order, is this: Before the order, purchasers of the public lands paid for them in bank notes, convertible into specie; after the order, they paid for them in specie, converted into bank credits. It was just reversing the order of things. You began with paper, and obtained specie if you wished it; but under the order you began with specie, and obtained only bank credits. The practical effect throughout all the Western and Southwestern States has been to make all the interests of society collectors of specie for the benefit of the deposite banks, without the least benefit whatever to the Government; for these banks were not required to preserve the specific specie, and pay it over to the Government. Such was the demand for specie under this order, that I have heard of as much as 40 per cent. being given for gold to carry to the land office, and in some instances specie has been transported to the land offices, to be sold there as a marketable commodity. The order had a double effect. It withdraws specie both from circulation and from the banks that could use it for the benefit of the community, that it may perform the unprofitable circuit of being taken to the land offices, and thence back to the banks, when it becomes their property.

Sir, what offence have the Western and Southwestern States committed, that they are to be subjected to an indignity which is not inflicted on the rest of the community? Why are we to pay our ducs to the Government in specie, while the rest of our fellow-citizens are allowed to pay in bank notes? Even if there were authority for it in the law, the requisition would not be according to justice or equity. And all sentiments of fraternal regard, as well as all principles of equality, cry aloud against such revolting distinctions. Why are our banks and our people alone to be subjected to this rule? I protest, most solemnly, on behalf of my constituents, against so disgraceful an inequality; and I call upon the Government either to carry out their hard-money system every where, at the custom-houses as well as the land offices, or efface from its records a discrimination which cannot continue a day or an hour without dishonor and degradation.

The honorable Senator from Virginia tells us that the measure is temporary. I wish he had made it out, or could do so now. How is it temporary? On its face? No, sir. It has just begun its wide-sweeping ruin. It began on the 15th of August, and it tolerated for a time the exercise of some indulgence. Its full operation only commenced on the 15th of December, 1836, and there is nothing in its terms that looks like a temporary provision. There is nothing in the President's message, or in the report of the Secretary, which announces to a suffering community that the heavy burden imposed upon them will not continue long. It may suit the purposes of the Senator from Virginia so to represent it. It may not be agreeable to him to be seen at open war with a measure of the administration; but there is nothing in the terms of the order, and nothing in the policy on which it rests, which is temporary in its character. No, sir. Let Congress adjourn, and leave on the Western States this invidious, this unjust and degrading discrimination in the payment of common dues to a common Government, and, my word for it, this order will not only be continued, but it will be carried farther, and other discriminations will be made, under your alleged sanction, to suit the varying views of the administration. Sir, give us equality. We are a common crew in the same noble, the same glorious ship of state. Is it not right that we should all be placed under the same common laws, and share alike the common justice of our country? I protest against the continuance for an hour of an iniquitous order, which subjects the Western and Southwestern portions of this Union to a rule so irreconcilable with any principles of justice or equity.

My friend from Ohio, who sits near me, [Mr. EWING,] has offered this resolution, which abolishes this odious distinction, and places all parts of the community, and every branch of the revenue, upon a footing of perfect equality.

But it is said we ought not to do this; and if we do it it will imply censure. And the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE,] at a loss to make out a censorious charge from the words of the resolution itself, resorts to the language of a Senator to supply the deficiency. Sir, if we repeal the statute of a Legislature, does it imply censure on the Legislature? May we not repeal a statute of our own, and yet fix no stigma on our former deed? May we not, then, rescind an order or edict of executive authority, without any such implication? Has it come to this, that a mere difference of opinion is censure? Are we to be afraid to express our sentiments of a public measure, lest, peradventure, we wound the feelings of the Chief Magistrate or the Secretary of the Treasury? Sir, I have been struggling, associated with my friends, for a long time, against the complete ascendancy of executive power; and we have sometimes been encouraged by a momentary hope of being able to arrest its lawless career. But, sir, its march has been steady, onward, and, I lament to say, triumphant. It is now practically the supreme power in the State. Every branch of the Government bends beneath its sway. The doctrine of unity in the executive administration, recently introduced; the obedience which, in pursuance of it, is exacted from all executive officers, from the highest to the lowest; the practice of proscription of all who do not conform to the prevailing creed, with the kindred usage of profuse official and other rewards to all who do, often without regard to character, integrity, or merit, and the exercise of boundless power over the public treasure, and by means of a concealed, mysterious, and irresponsible agency over the banks in which it is deposited, have stamped a totally new character upon the Government. It has become a vast organized machinery, controlled by the will of one man, and moved by a single hand. It is a monarchy in disguise, with fewer privileges practically enjoyed than are exercised in some monarchies. There, acts of the Crown may be exposed, censured, denounced, corrected, by the power of Parliament. But here we are not to complain of or remonstrate against executive acts. We must not presume to censure them. We must bear, in silent and dutiful submission, whatever ills the acts of the Executive may bring on the country. Or, if we attempt any corrective, we must graciously suppose that we are not going counter to the executive will, and by a fiction convert a permanent measure into a temporary order!

Treasury Circular.

When, Mr. President, shall we get back to the good old times, when a President of the United States never stepped out of his own sphere to assume powers not granted to him, or to control the discharge of duties specially assigned to subordinate officers? As to this Treasury order, I do not view it as an act of the Secretary. It has his hand, but not his heart—not his mind. From the face of the order itself, I should draw the conclusion that he has been the unwilling executor of the bidding of another. Like its prototype, employed for the removal of the deposits, it is an act of the executive will, directly against the will of the officer particularly charged with a public duty. But, unlike that case, the Secretary clings closely to his office, and, rather than part with it, executes the arbitrary command of his master. He does not choose, with a manly independence, to sacrifice his place and preserve his character. And I understand that this order has been issued, not only against the judgment and feelings of the Secretary, but of the whole cabinet. I have heard so, and I believe it. There are those here who do know, and who, if I err, can contradict me. But I believe it. And now, when we undertake to examine the order, and confront it with the law, we cannot touch it. We may not repeal an executive order, because, forsooth, to do so casts a censure on the Executive. Why, sir, if the honorable Senator from Virginia is unwilling to throw censure on the Executive, he should have forbore the delivery of his able and eloquent speech. That whole speech, from beginning to end, was directed against that order, which he says we must not repeal, lest we censure the President. Why, sir, if that is his ground, he should have withheld his amendment; for what, after all, is the difference, in effect, between the resolution of the Senator from Ohio and the amendment of the Senator from Virginia? The Treasury order is now in full operation. And what is the proposal of my friend from Ohio? To rescind it in terms. His language is open, direct, manly, but not offensive. But the Senator from Virginia cannot agree to the proposal. Well, sir, and what does he do in his amendment? He avoids, to be sure, the word "rescind," but he rescinds the order just as effectually as the Senator from Ohio. I am quite sure that my friend from Ohio intended nothing offensive in the resolution offered by him. He thought that, without offence, the poor privilege might still be left to us of repealing our own acts, expressing our own opinions, and even of repealing executive acts, when we deemed that the good of the country requires it. It appeared to him to be the most direct and manly course, if we meant to repeal the order, that we should say so. He added, it is true, another resolution; but I am willing, on behalf of my friend, that the first resolution should be abandoned altogether, and the last alone adopted. That will sufficiently accomplish our purpose, and accommodate the measure to the delicate and nervous sensibility of any friend of the administration. That is all concerning which I feel any solicitude, and with this I will be content. All we seek is, that an end shall be put to this invidious and disgraceful discrimination.

But it is said that there will be great difficulty in adopting this course; and the Senator from Virginia has accordingly guarded his amendment by the addition of a proviso, which goes to make the amendment authorize the reception only of such notes as the deposit banks shall be willing, under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, to receive, and to credit to the United States as cash. Though I admit that the operation may be attended with great difficulty, yet I cannot think it insuperable. What was the ground on which the first Secretary of the Treasury received bank notes for the duties due to Government? The ground was this: that the bank notes of specie-paying banks are equivalent to specie, being in fact the representatives of specie. Bank notes of such banks are nothing more than so much told or counted specie; and they are so received. This was the principle on which Mr. Hamilton proceeded. It was a convenient arrangement, and is attended with no risk, so long as the bills are convertible at pleasure into that which they represent. The Secretary could stop whenever he pleased. It saved much time; it was one of the greatest of time-saving machines. It was like paying a sum of money by the check of an individual upon his bank. That is not "paper money." Your creditor or the Government collector calls upon you with a demand, and you draw your check for the amount; when presented at bank it is instantly paid or passed to your credit. Such a check is equivalent to the specie it will command. Such representatives of specie ought to be received in payment of all Government dues; and there should be no discretionary power of refusing them, either by the collectors or the deposit banks. The result, then, to which I would come, is the adoption of this rule, viz: that when a bank note is presented to a collector in payment of a debt to the Government, if, at the place where such payment is made, it is at par, that is, equal to so much specie, the collector shall be obliged to receive it; if it is not, then he shall be at liberty to reject it. If the note is not what it purports to be, the representative of specie to the amount on the face of it, then there ought to be no obligation to take it. The place of payment is what I would adopt as the test of all bank notes offered to us. If they are equal to specie there, they ought to be received. It may be said that the effect of such a rule will be to accumulate large sums of money at places where the Government does not need them; and thus subject it to the expense of transporting them to where they are required. But to test this objection, we have only to look back for a moment to the hard-money system, and inquire, what would be the state of things if specie alone should be received. Would not that plan accumulate in the banks of the Western and Southwestern States vast amounts of gold and silver? And what is the Government to do with it? It is not needed there, and it would have to be transported at the expense of Government to where it is needed. So that my plan requires the transportation of a packet of bills, where that would require the transportation of a wagon load of specie. I think that the plan of making bank notes at par at the place of payment the test of the receivability of paper will save time, and have quite as good effect as the requisition of gold and silver.

I object to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia chiefly on account of its last clause. As to that part of it which requires the suppression of small notes, (though I believe that, in practice, it will prove perfectly nugatory, that it will effect just nothing,) I am quite willing to indulge him with the experiment. Nothing, I am persuaded, will come out of it; but try it. But the last clause of his amendment says that no notes shall be received which the deposit banks are not willing to receive and credit to the United States. He adds, to be sure, that this shall be under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such a provision leaves the whole country in total uncertainty. Nobody can know to-day what is to be the rule to-morrow. And as to the added clause, it will, in practice, make no difference; without it, the whole matter would have depended on the mere pleasure of the deposit banks; and with it, should the Secretary occasionally revise the proceedings of those banks, he will still be governed by the wishes of the deposit banks. I object to the intrusting of such a power either with the Secretary or with the deposit banks. It places that which should be fixed, and regulated by a known law, at the mere mercy and good pleasure of the banks or the Secretary. But if he will insert in his amendment a clause making the place of payment the test of the notes, we shall then have some rule which all can understand. All parties concerned will know whether the notes offered are at par at the place where payment is made. But, otherwise, no one can know but the Secretary, or the banks may put down to-morrow the notes which, under their auspices, he has received to-day.

I fear, Mr. President, I have forfeited the good opinion I endeavored to conciliate when I began; but I have now done. All we desire is, that something efficacious shall be done; that the session shall not be suffered to pass without the Treasury order being rescinded, either expressly or by implication; and I will now conclude by expressing my hope that, in every portion of the Senate, there will be found a disposition to extend equal and impartial justice to all parts of the country, without any degrading discriminations between one part and another, or one class of citizens and another.

Mr. RUGGLES rose only to correct an error into which the honorable Senator from Kentucky had fallen, no doubt inadvertently. He had mentioned the circumstance of Maine's having imposed restrictions upon the circulation of small notes, and remarked that, if he had not been misinformed, she immediately after sent to Massachusetts to obtain a supply of small notes, to put in circulation in room of those prohibited. He begged leave to assure the Senator that he had been greatly misinformed. He had been led into a great mistake in this matter. Maine had, it is true, passed a law prohibiting the circulation of small bills, but it is not true that she had sought a supply of them afterwards from Massachusetts or elsewhere. The political friends of the Senator from Kentucky in Maine very warmly opposed the measure in the Legislature, and it may be that they carried their opposition beyond the passage of the law, and sent to their friends in Massachusetts for a supply of those small bills to which they were so much attached. But he repeated that it was a mistake that such a course could be justly chargeable to the Government of the State.

Mr. CLAY explained. He did not mean to be understood as charging the Government of Maine, nor any political party there, with having sent out of the State for small notes. It might have been the act of individuals. He only mentioned the circumstance, as showing that the law could not be executed, &c.

Mr. RUGGLES replied that he had no objection to make to the remark, if the Senator would confine it to his own political friends. But he did object to the imputation of such inconsistency upon the Government of the State, or upon the friends of the administration, who participated in the action of the Government on that subject.

Mr. NILES moved to refer the whole subject to the Committee on Public Lands, and, in connexion with some desultory remarks, urged the great and growing importance of the subject, as demanding such a reference.

Mr. CALHOUN briefly characterized the Treasury order as unconstitutional, without law, without precedent, without any authority whatever. Its temporary character, under which refuge had recently been taken, was nowhere to be seen; on the contrary, it still continued in force, when the Executive himself ought to have repeated it, if it had been temporary. If it should be now referred, he could see no reason for referring it to the Committee on Public Lands. It partook wholly of a financial character, and its proper reference was, therefore, to the Committee on Finance. Mr. C. said he depended on the action of that committee whether there should be a recurrence of that state of things in the ensuing year, as well as the past, which had been used as a pretext for the Treasury order. That state of things, he urged, depended entirely on an accumulation of the surplus in the deposit banks, where it would not remain for nothing, but would be employed, as it had been, in speculating on the public lands. To the Committee on Finance he also looked for a reduction of duties, if that should be adopted as a preventive. The whole subject properly belonged to that committee, to which Mr. C. would move to refer it, if the motion of Mr. NILES should fail.

Mr. BLACK opposed the reference. Much time had already been consumed in debating all the questions immediately involved, and all having any relation to it. It was time for action. He was prepared to vote. He had no hesitation in saying that he considered the Treasury order illegal and highly impolitic. It was a question in which his constituents were deeply interested, laboring, as they were, under the embarrassments arising from this executive law or order. It had been intimated by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] that this measure was to be delayed by the committee, to see the result of other measures. Deeming, therefore, prompt action necessary to relieve the people of the State he in part represented, and considering this motion for reference one of delay, he asked the privilege of recording his vote against it, and asked the yeas and nays. He was for action.

Mr. CLAY said he concurred entirely with the Senator from Mississippi. All the propositions before the Senate were simple, and easily understood. He hoped the subject would not be referred at all.

Mr. TIPTON also opposed any reference. Half the session was now nearly gone, and the subject had been well debated. He deemed it very important to his constituents and the community that all doubt on this subject should be removed as soon as possible.

Mr. WEBSTER briefly urged that, if a reference should be made at all, it ought to be made to the Committee on Finance.

The question was then taken on Mr. NILES's motion, and decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Moore, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Sevier, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster—19.

So the whole subject of the Treasury order of July, 1836, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

After a short executive session, the Senate adjourned.

THE SURPLUS REVENUE.

After disposing of the usual morning business, Mr. CALHOUN moved to postpone the previous order, for the purpose of taking up the bill to renew in part the deposit bill of the last session.

Mr. GRUNDY observed that the special order of the day was the bill to regulate the sales of the public lands, and it seemed to him that that bill had better be disposed of first; for if it were passed in any shape there would be a great reduction of the public revenue, and no occasion for dividing a surplus. It seemed to him proper to take up and dispose of this bill, or indeed of any other which looked to a reduction of the revenue, and they could then see whether there would be a surplus in the way contemplated by the Senator from South Carolina.

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his acquiescence in the course proposed by the Senator from Tennessee. He said that he should be much governed in the course he should pursue, not only by what was done in regard to the honorable Senator's bill, but also the action of the Committee on Finance. He (Mr. C.) was anxious to see what they intended to do in the way of a reduction. He wished to know from the chairman of that committee, whether they proposed making a report on that subject and if so, at what time. He desired to make the action on his own bill subordinate to that on the land bill, and to the report of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT replied, that ever since the reference of this subject to the Committee on Finance, it had not, at any time, escaped their attention. The committee were proceeding with it as rapidly as they could obtain information to govern their action; but it was impossible for them to say at what time they would be able to come to a conclusion, or for him to say when they would make a report. This very day they had had the subject under consideration, and had obtained some information with regard to it. He could assure the Senate that every member of the committee was exceedingly anxious to make a speedy report.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that he would be willing that the subject should be postponed to this day week. He wished for all the information possible, and greatly preferred a reduction of the revenue to depositing the surplus with the States. All gentlemen should have a fair opportunity of examining the subject. He must say that, when he looked at the state of things here, he felt but very little faith that a reduction would be made this session, as the time had now so far advanced that there would scarcely be an opportunity of acting on the subject. He had made a call upon the Secretary of the Treasury some days since, by resolution, requesting him to furnish some valuable information which we wished to be in possession of before the committee reported; but that information had not yet been received by the Senate; he trusted it would be at an early day.

The consideration of the bill was postponed, by general consent, to this day week.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill to limit the sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities, having been announced as the order of the day—

Mr. CLAY expressed the hope that a bill of this importance would not be taken up at this time. The bill proposed an entire change in the whole land system of the country, and it so happened that, by the organization of the Committee on Public Lands, the only member opposed to the bill was absent. He did not think that the Senate ought to take up a bill of such importance in the absence of a member of the Land Committee who possessed so much valuable information, and was so intimately acquainted with the subject. He believed that the Senate would derive great aid in their deliberations on the subject from the experience of that gentleman; and as other subjects of importance demanded the attention of the Senate, he hoped some one of them would be taken up, and the bill for the present postponed. Mr. C. alluded to the illness of the lady of the Senator from Ohio, as the cause of that gentleman's absence, and stated that, from information lately received by him, he had reason to believe that he would be in his seat in the course of a few days.

Mr. WALKER hoped the motion would not prevail. About half of the session had now passed away, and consequently there was no time to lose. This bill was one which would be debated, and opposed at every point; and, judging from the sentiments to which the honorable Senator [Mr. CLAY] had given utterance, he presumed that there would be no want of opposition to the bill, notwithstanding the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] might be absent.

There were many gentlemen in that body and the House of Representatives, who were desirous that this subject should be disposed of as speedily as possible; and if the bill should be postponed to this day week, it could not, for want of time, be passed at the present session. He felt the deepest conviction that the subject should be acted upon without delay, and therefore he felt it his duty to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky. With regard to the melancholy event which had called away the Senator from Ohio, he would state that he had seen a paragraph in the National Intelligencer of yesterday, stating that that member of the Senator's family who was said to be dangerously ill had entirely recovered; and he (Mr. W.) considered that ample time had elapsed since the gentleman left the city for his return to it. Mr. W. concluded by expressing his hope that the motion of the Senator from Kentucky would not prevail.

Mr. CALHOUN regretted to hear that the chairman of the committee intended to go on with the bill. He had not the slightest idea that it would be taken up so soon, and had not, therefore, given any examination to the subject of it; he had not even had time to read the bill itself. He deemed it to be one of the most important subjects that could engage the attention of Congress, not only as regarded the revenue, but as it regarded the future policy of the country; and he hoped the Senate would not go on with it until every member had had an opportunity of obtaining all the information necessary to a full understanding of the subject. He himself wished time for an examination, the better to enable him to understand the arguments that might be used either for or against the measure, and therefore proposed that the subject be postponed till Monday next.

Mr. BUCHANAN said: For one, I should be very unwilling to pursue any course which would prevent the Senator from Ohio from speaking on this subject; and so far as my vote is concerned, if he returns in any reasonable time, I shall hear him. But this is a very important subject indeed. I feel the importance of it as much as the gentleman from South Carolina. And it is for that very reason I wish to hear the views of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands.

Let the honorable chairman proceed to-day, and give his views; and, so far as respects my individual vote, I will agree to postpone the consideration of the bill till Monday morning, and take such a course in regard to it as may be satisfactory to all parties.

Mr. BENTON wished to say to the Senate that there was now one half of a short session gone, and that it would be impossible for them, if they wished the business to progress, to go on as they had heretofore done; that is, to take up a subject, hear a speech on it, and adjourn at 3 o'clock, and so go on from day to day. He was fully aware of this at the commencement of the session, and therefore, in his first speech, he refused to adjourn, and preferred rather to omit some things that he wished to say than to consume two days with one speech. The rule which he had thus laid down for himself he wished to see applied to all, and when a subject is taken up, he wished to go on with it like business men.

He would be willing to come early in the morning, and sit late in the evening; but he could not give his consent to the delay of business by taking up a subject, hearing one speech on it, and then laying it over. He would remind these gentlemen, who were the friends of the administration, that they not only had the numerical strength, but the organization of the committees in their favor, and therefore that it was incumbent on them to see that the business was carried on without delay. Last session, though they had the numerical strength in their favor, yet the organization of the committees was against them; and when the question was asked, why the business of the Senate did not go on, they could readily answer, that this organization of the committees deprived them of the control of the business. But now, when the friends of the administration had every advantage in their favor, when the question should be asked, why the business of the Senate did not go on, the public might draw what inference it pleased.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked, that as one of the opposition, and being desirous of as little delay as possible, still he would tell gentlemen on the other side that he would afford them every opportunity of discussing the subject. But whilst he said this, he claimed from the majority that they should hear gentlemen of the opposition patiently, and give a reasonable time for discussion. He would not have asked the delay of one day, had it not been absolutely necessary; and he was not disposed to allow so important a subject as the present to be hurried through the Senate without bestowing on it all the attention it deserved.

Mr. BENTON said that he would sit there early and late; and no gentleman should be deprived by his vote of proceeding in the transaction of the public business. He wished gentlemen to go on, keep moving.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that he was a member of the party friendly to the present administration, and that he felt the responsibility of his situation just as much as the honorable Senator from Missouri did; and, so far as regarded himself, he, for one, need not be reminded of his duty. He was responsible for it. In regard to this bill to regulate the sales of the public lands, he considered it a most important measure. He did not know how he should vote on it. He knew the evils of speculating in the public lands, and wished much to put them down, but he wished to put them down with care. There were interests of his constituents involved; farmers who go to the West to purchase lands to make a provision for their children, (and he considered this description of persons the most desirable settlers on the public lands;) and those interests he should take care to see attended to, so far as his vote was concerned.

He wished to hear the member from Mississippi, because he knew that he should derive much valuable information from him; and then he, for one of the friends of the administration, should take the responsibility of voting for such a reasonable postponement as would allow other gentlemen an opportunity of giving their views. He had no objection to a postponement till Monday next.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, expressed the hope that the postponement might not be quite so long as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] wished. He was willing to give a reasonable time, in order that gentlemen might be prepared to express their opinions on this very important subject. This was confessedly known on all hands to be a most important bill—one that required to be examined with care, and amended in a way that would give every interest in the country its fair proportion of the public domain, as far as practicable. Now, he was one of the Committee on the Public Lands, and he had concurred in reporting this bill, but it had some defects, and it was brought forward with the hope that, by a full discussion in the Senate, sufficient light would be thrown on the subject to render it as perfect as the nature of it would permit. He was disposed to give the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING], who was known to be in opposition to the bill, and to all other gentlemen who were anxious to speak on it, a full opportunity of being heard; and he, for one, as a friend of the administration, thought that in all matters of legislation there should be a sufficient and a perfect understanding of the subject. This was necessary, if they wished the business to be well done. If the chairman of the committee wished to go on to-day, let him (said Mr. K.) go on, and then, by a postponement, give a reasonable time to other gentlemen who wished to be heard on the subject. This indulgence, though a member of the majority, he would never hesitate to give.

Mr. CLAY said, that although he should prefer that the Senator from Ohio had been present to hear the exposition of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] yet, after the manly and independent sentiments he (Mr. C.) had heard expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Alabama, he would not hesitate to withdraw his motion. Under all the circumstances, if the Senator did not see the propriety of a postponement till Monday, perhaps he would go on with his remarks.

Mr. WALKER, after some remarks, then submitted an amendment from the Committee on Public Lands, which was ordered to be printed with the bill; and the further consideration of the subject was postponed till to-morrow.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, the expunging resolution of Mr. BENTON:

Resolution to expunge from the journal the resolution of the Senate of March 28, 1834, in relation to President Jackson and the removal of the deposits.

Whereas on the 26th day of December, in the year 1833, the following resolve was moved in the Senate:

"Resolved, That by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury, because he would not, contrary to his own sense of duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion, and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people;"

Which proposed resolve was altered and changed by the mover thereof, on the 28th day of March, in the year 1834, so as to read as follows:

"Resolved, That, in taking upon himself the responsibility of removing the deposits of the public money from the Bank of the United States, the President of the United States has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people;"

Which resolve, so changed and modified by the mover thereof, on the same day and year last mentioned, was further altered, so as to read in these words:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both;"

In which last-mentioned form the said "resolve, on the same day and year last mentioned, was adopted by the Senate, and became the act and judgment of that body, and, as such, now remains upon the journal thereof:

And whereas the said resolve was not warranted by the constitution, and was irregularly and illegally adopted by the Senate, in violation of the rights of defence which belong to every citizen, and in subversion of the fundamental principles of law and justice; because President Jackson was thereby adjudged and pronounced to be guilty of an impeachable offence, and a stigma placed upon him as a violator of his oath of office, and of the laws and constitution which he was sworn to preserve, protect, and defend, without going through the forms of an impeachment, and without allowing to him the benefits of a trial, or the means of defence:

And whereas the said resolve, in all its various shapes and forms, was unfounded and erroneous in point of fact, and therefore unjust and unrighteous, as well as irregular and unauthorized by the constitution; because the said President Jackson, neither in the act of dismissing Mr. Duane, nor in the appointment of Mr. Taney, as specified in the first form of the resolve; nor in taking upon himself the responsibility of removing the deposits, as specified in the second form of the same resolve; nor in any act which was then, or can now, be specified under the vague and ambiguous terms of the general denunciation contained in the third and last form of the resolve, did do or commit any act in violation or in derogation of the laws and constitution, or dangerous to the liberties of the people:

And whereas the said resolve, as adopted, was uncertain and ambiguous, containing nothing but a loose and floating charge for derogating from the laws and constitution, and assuming ungranted power and authority in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue; without specifying what part of the executive proceedings, or what part of the public revenue, was intended to be referred to; or what parts of the laws and constitution were supposed to have been infringed; or in what part of the Union, or at what period of his administration, these late proceedings were supposed to have taken place; thereby putting each Senator at liberty to vote in favor of the resolve upon a separate and secret reason of his own, and leaving the ground of the Senate's judgment to be guessed at by the public, and to be differently and diversely interpreted by individual Senators, according to the private and particular understanding of each, contrary to all the ends of justice, and to all the forms of legal or judicial proceeding; to the great prejudice of the accused, who could not know against what to defend himself; and to the loss of senatorial responsibility, by shielding Senators from public accountability for making up a judgment upon grounds which the public cannot know, and which, if known, might prove to be insufficient in law, or unfounded in fact:

And whereas the specification contained in the first and second forms of the resolve having been objected to in debate, and shown to be insufficient to sustain the charges they were adduced to support, and it being well believed that no majority could be obtained to vote for the said specifications, and the same having been actually withdrawn by the mover in the face of the whole Senate, in consequence of such objection and belief, and before any vote taken thereupon; the said specifications could not afterwards be admitted by any rule of parliamentary practice, or by any principle of legal implication, secret intendment, or mental reservation, to remain and continue a part of the written and public resolve from which they were thus withdrawn; and, if they could be so admitted, they would not be sufficient to sustain the charges therein contained:

And whereas the Senate being the constitutional tribunal for the trial of the President, when charged by the House of Representatives with offences against the laws and the constitution, the adoption of the said resolve, before any impeachment preferred by the House, was a breach of the privileges of the House, not warranted by the constitution; a subversion of justice; a prejudication of a question which might legally come before the Senate; and a disqualification of that body to perform its constitutional duty with fairness and impartiality, if the President should thereafter be regularly impeached by the House of Representatives for the same offence:

And whereas the temperate, respectful, and argumentative defence and protest of the President against the aforesaid proceeding of the Senate was rejected and repulsed by that body, and was voted to be a breach of its privileges, and was not permitted to be entered on its journal or printed among its documents; while all memorials, petitions, resolves, and remonstrances against the President, however violent or unfounded, and calculated to inflame the people against him, were duly and honorably received, encomiastically commented upon in speeches, read at the table, ordered to be printed with the long list of names attached, referred to the Finance Committee for consideration, filed away among the public archives, and now constitute a part of the public documents of the Senate, to be handed down to the latest posterity:

And whereas the said resolve was introduced, debated, and adopted, at a time and under circumstances which had the effect of co-operating with the Bank of the United States in the parricidal attempt which that institution was then making to produce a panic and pressure in the country; to destroy the confidence of the people in President Jackson; to paralyze his administration; to govern the elections; to bankrupt the State banks; ruin their currency; fill the whole Union with terror and distress; and thereby to extort from the sufferings and the alarms of the people the restoration of the deposits and the renewal of its charter:

And whereas the said resolve is of evil example and dangerous precedent, and should never have been received, debated, or adopted, by the Senate, or admitted to entry upon its journal: Wherefore,

The resolution and preamble having been read, Mr. BENTON rose and said: Mr. President, it is now near three years since the resolve was adopted by the Senate, which it is my present motion to expunge from the journal. At the moment that this resolve was adopted, I gave notice of my intention to move to expunge it; and then expressed my confident belief that the motion would eventually prevail. That expression of confidence was not an ebullition of vanity, or a presumptuous calculation, intended to accelerate the event it affected to foretell. It was not a vain boast, or an idle assumption, but was the result of a deep conviction of the injustice done President Jackson, and a thorough reliance upon the justice of the American people. I felt that the President had been wronged; and my heart told me that this wrong would be redressed. The event proves that I was not mistaken. The question of expunging this resolution has been carried to the people, and their decision has been had upon it. They decide in favor of the expurgation; and their decision has been both made and manifested, and communicated to us in a great variety of ways. A great number of States have expressly instructed their Senators to vote for this expurgation. A very great majority of the States have elected Senators and Representatives to Congress, upon the express ground of favoring this expurgation. The Bank of the United States, which took the initiative in the accusation against the President, and furnished the material and worked the machinery which was used against him, and which was then so powerful on this floor, has become more and more odious to the public mind, and musters now but a slender phalanx of friends in the two Houses of Congress. The late presidential election furnishes additional evidence of public sentiment. The candidate who was the friend of President Jackson, the supporter of his administration, and the avowed advocate for the expurgation, has received a large majority of the suffrages of the whole Union, and that after an express declaration of his sentiments on this precise point. The evidence of the public will, exhibited in all these forms, is too manifest to be mistaken, too explicit to require illustration, and too imperative to be disregarded. Omitting details and specific enumeration of proofs, I refer to our own files for the instructions to expunge—to the complexion of the two Houses for the temper of the people—to the denationalized condition of the Bank of the United States for the fate of the imperious accuser—and to the issue of the presidential election for the answer of the Union. All these are pregnant proofs of the public will; and the last pre-eminently so—because both the question of the expurgation and the form of the process were directly put in issue upon it. A representative of the people from the State of Kentucky formally interrogated a prominent candidate for the presidency on these points, and required from him a public answer, for the information of the public mind. The answer was given, and published, and read by all the voters before the election; and I deem it right to refer to that answer in this place, not only as evidence of the points put in issue, but also for the purpose of doing more ample justice to President Jackson, by incorporating into the legislative history of this case the high and honorable testimony in his favor of the eminent citizen who has just been exalted to the lofty honors of the American presidency:

“Your last question seeks to know ‘my’ opinion as to the constitutional power of the Senate or House of Representatives to expunge or obliterate from the journals the proceedings of a previous session.

“You will, I am sure, be satisfied, upon further consideration, that there are but few questions of a political character less connected with the duties of the office of President of the United States, or that might not with equal propriety be put by an elector to a candidate for that station, than this. With the journals of neither House of Congress can he properly have anything to do. But as your question has doubtless been induced by the pendency of Colonel Benton’s resolutions to expunge from the journals of the Senate certain other resolutions touching the official conduct of President Jackson, I prefer to say that I regard the passage of Colonel Benton’s preamble and resolutions to be an act of justice to a faithful and greatly injured public servant, not only constitutional in itself, but imperiously demanded by a proper respect for the well-known will of the people.”

I do not propose, sir, to draw violent, unwarranted, or strained inferences. I do not assume to say that the question of this expurgation was a leading or a controlling point in the issue of this election. I do not assume to say, or insinuate, that every individual, and every voter, delivered his suffrage with reference to this question. Doubtless there were many exceptions. Still, the triumphant election of the candidate who had expressed himself in the terms just quoted, and who was, besides, the personal and political friend of President Jackson, and the avowed approver of his administration, must be admitted to a place among the proofs in this case, and ranked among the high concurring evidences of the public sentiment in favor of the motion which I make.

Assuming, then, that we have ascertained the will of the people on this great question, the inquiry presents itself, how far the expression of that will ought to be conclusive of our action here. I hold that it ought to be binding and obligatory upon us; and that, not only upon the principles of representative government, which require obedience to the known will of the people, but also in conformity to the principles upon which the proceeding against President Jackson was conducted, when the sentence against him was adopted. Then, every thing was done with especial reference to the will of the people. Their impulsion was assumed to be the sole motive to action, and to them the ultimate verdict was expressly referred. The whole machinery of alarm and pressure, every engine of political and moneyed power, was put in motion, and worked for many months, to excite the people against the President, and to stir up meetings, memorials, petitions, travelling committees, and distress deputations, against him; and each symptom of popular discontent was hailed as an evidence of public will, and quoted here as proof that the people demanded the condemnation of the President. Not only legislative assemblies, and memorials from large assemblies, were then produced here as evidence of public opinion, but the petitions of boys under age, the remonstrances of a few signers, and the results of the most inconsiderable elections, were ostentatiously paraded and magnified as the evidence of the sovereign will of our constituents. Thus, sir, the public voice was every thing, while that voice, partially obtained through political and pecuniary machinations, was adverse to the President. Then, the popular will was the shrine at which all worshipped. Now, when that will is regularly, soberly, repeatedly, and almost universally, expressed through the ballot-boxes, at the various elections, and turns out to be in favor of the President, certainly no one can disregard it, nor otherwise look at it than as the solemn verdict of the competent and ultimate tribunal, upon an issue fairly made up, fully argued, and duly submitted for decision. As such verdict, I receive it. As the deliberate verdict of the sovereign people, I bow to it. I am content. I do not mean to reopen the case, nor to recommence the argument. I leave that work to others, if any others choose to perform it. For myself, I am content; and, dispensing with further argument, I shall call for judgment, and ask to have execution done upon that unhappy journal, which the verdict of millions of freemen finds guilty of bearing on its face an untrue, illegal, and unconstitutional sentence of condemnation against the approved President of the republic.

But, while declining to reopen the argument of this question, and refusing to tread over again the ground already traversed, there is another and a different task to perform; one which the approaching termination of President Jackson’s administration makes peculiarly proper at this time, and which it is my privilege, and perhaps my duty, to execute, as being the suitable conclusion to the arduous contest in which we have been so long engaged: I allude to the general tenor of his administration, and to its effect, for good or for evil, upon the condition of his country. This is the proper time for such a view to be taken. The political existence of this great man now draws to a close. In little more than forty days he ceases to be a public character. In a few brief weeks he ceases to be an object of political hope to any, and should cease to be an object of political hate, or envy, to all. Whatever of motive the servile and time-serving might have found in his exalted station for raising the altar of adulation, and burning the incense of praise before him, that motive can no longer exist. The dispenser of the patronage of an empire—the chief of this great confederacy of States—is soon to be a private individual, stripped of all power to reward or to punish. His own thoughts, as he has shown us in the concluding paragraph of that message which is to be the last of its kind that we shall ever receive from him, are directed to that beloved retirement from which he was drawn by the voice of millions of freemen, and to which he now looks for that interval of repose which age and infirmities require. Under these circumstances, he ceases to be a subject for the ebullition of the passions, and passes into a character for the contemplation of history. Historically, then, shall I view him; and, limiting this view to his civil administration, I demand where is there a chief magistrate of whom so much evil has been predicted, and from whom so much good has come? Never has any man entered upon the chief magistracy of a country under such appalling predictions of ruin and woe! never has any one been so pursued with direful prognostications! Never has any one been so beset and impeded by a powerful combination of political and moneyed confederates! Never has any one in any country, where the administration of justice has risen above the knife or the bow-string, been so lawlessly and shamelessly tried and condemned by rivals and enemies, without hearing, without defence, without the forms of law or justice! History has been ransacked to find examples of tyrants sufficiently odious to illustrate him by comparison. Language has been tortured to find epithets sufficiently strong to paint him in description. Imagination has been exhausted in her efforts to deck him with revolting and inhuman attributes. Tyrant, despot, usurper; destroyer of the liberties of his country; rash, ignorant, imbecile; endangering the public peace with all foreign nations; destroying domestic prosperity at home; ruining all industry, all commerce, all manufactories; annihilating confidence between man and man; delivering up the streets of populous cities to grass and weeds, and the wharves of commercial towns to the encumbrance of decaying vessels, depriving labor of all reward; depriving industry of all employment; destroying the currency; plunging an innocent and happy people from the summit of felicity to the depths of misery, want, and despair. Such is the faint outline, followed up by actual condemnation, of the appalling denunciations daily uttered against this one man, from the moment he became an object of political competition, down to the concluding moment of his political existence.

The sacred voice of inspiration has told us that there is a time for all things. There certainly has been a time for every evil that human nature admits of to be vaticinated of President Jackson's administration; equally certain, the time has now come for all rational and well-disposed people to compare the predictions with the facts, and to ask themselves if these calamitous prognostications have been verified by events? Have we peace, or war, with foreign nations? Certainly, we have peace! peace with all the world! peace with all its benign, and felicitous, and beneficent influences! Are we respected or despised abroad? Certainly the American name never was more honored throughout the four quarters of the globe, than in this very moment. Do we hear of indignity or outrage in any quarter? of merchants robbed in foreign ports? of vessels searched on the high seas? of American citizens impressed into foreign service? of the national flag insulted any where? On the contrary, we see former wrongs repaired; no new ones inflicted. France pays twenty-five millions of francs for spoiliations committed thirty years ago; Naples pays two millions one hundred thousand ducats for wrongs of the same date; Denmark pays six hundred and fifty thousand rixdollars for wrongs done a quarter of a century ago; Spain engages to pay twelve millions of reals velon for injuries of fifteen years' date; and Portugal, the last in the list of former aggressors admits her liability, and only waits the adjustment of details to close her account by adequate indemnity. So far from war, insult, contempt, and spoliation, from abroad, this denounced administration has been the season of peace and good will, and the auspicious era of universal reparation. So far from suffering injury at the hands of foreign Powers, our merchants have received indemnities for all former injuries. It has been the day of accounting, of settlement, and of retribution. The long list of arrearages, extending through four successive previous administrations, has been closed and settled up. The wrongs done to commerce for thirty years back, and under so many different Presidents, and indemnities withheld from all, have been repaired and paid over under the beneficent and glorious administration of President Jackson. But one single instance of outrage has occurred, and that at the extremities of the world, and by a piratical horde, amenable to no law but the law of force. The Malays of Summatra committed a robbery and massacre upon an American vessel. Wretches! they did not then know that Jackson was President of the United States! and that no distance, no time, no idle ceremonial of treating with robbers and assassins, was to hold back the arm of justice. Commodore Downes went out. His cannon and his bayonets struck the outlaws in their den. They paid in terror and in blood for the outrage which was committed; and the great lesson was taught to these distant pirates—to our antipodes themselves—that not even the entire diameter of this globe could protect them! and that the name of American citizen, like that of Roman citizen in the great days of the republic and of the empire, was to be the inviolable passport of all that wore it throughout the whole extent of the habitable world.

At home the most gratifying picture presents itself to the view: the public debt paid off; taxes reduced one half; the completion of the public defences systematically commenced; the compact with Georgia, uncompleted since 1802, now carried into effect, and her soil ready to be freed, as her jurisdiction has been delivered from the presence and encumbrance of an Indian population. Mississippi and Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee and North Carolina, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas, in a word, all the States encumbered with an Indian population, have been relieved from that encumbrance; and the Indians themselves have been transferred to new and permanent homes, every way better adapted to the enjoyment of their existence, the preservation of their rights, and the improvement of their condition.

The currency is not ruined! On the contrary, seventy-five millions of specie in the country is a spectacle never seen before, and is the barrier of the people against the designs of any banks which may attempt to suspend payments, and to force a dishonored paper currency upon the community. These seventy-five millions are the security of the people against the dangers of a depreciated and inconvertible paper money. Gold, after a disappearance of thirty years, is restored to our country. All Europe beholds with admiration the success of our efforts, in three years, to supply ourselves with the currency which our constitution guaranties, and which the example of France and Holland shows to be so easily attainable, and of such incalculable value to industry, morals, economy, and solid wealth. The success of these efforts is styled, in the best London papers, not merely a reformation, but a revolution in the currency! a revolution by which our America is now regaining from Europe the gold and silver which she has been sending to them for thirty years past.

Domestic industry is not paralyzed, confidence is not destroyed, factories are not stopped, workmen are not mendicants for bread and employment, credit is not extinguished, prices have not sunk, grass is not growing in the streets of populous cities, the wharves are not lumbered with decaying vessels, columns of curses, rising from the bosoms of a ruined and agonized people, are not ascending to heaven against the destroyer of a nation's felicity and prosperity. On the contrary, the reverse of all this is true! and true to a degree that astonishes and bewilders the senses. I know that all is not gold that glitters; that there is a difference between a specious and a solid prosperity. I know that a part of the present prosperity is apparent only, the effect of an increase of fifty millions of paper money forced into circulation by one thousand banks; but after making due allowance for this fictitious and delusive excess, the real prosperity of the country is still unprecedentedly and transcendently great. I know that every flow must be followed by its ebb, that every expansion must be followed by its contraction. I know that a revulsion in the paper system is inevitable; but I know, also, that these seventy-five millions of gold and silver is the bulwark of the country, and will enable every honest bank to meet its liabilities, and every prudent citizen to take care of himself.

Turning to some points in the civil administration of President Jackson, and how much do we not find to admire! The great cause of the constitution has been vindicated from an imputation of more than forty years' duration. He has demonstrated, by the fact itself, that a national bank is not "necessary" to the fiscal operations of the Federal Government, and in that demonstration he has upset the argument of General Hamilton, and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and all that ever has been said in favor of the constitutionality of a national-bank. All this argument and decision rested upon the single assumption of the "necessity" of that institution to the Federal Government. He has shown it is not "necessary;" that the currency of the constitution, and especially a gold currency, is all that the Federal Government wants, and that she can get that whenever she pleases. In this single act he has vindicated the constitution from an unjust imputation, and knocked from under the decision of the Supreme Court the assumed fact on which it rested. He has prepared the way for the reversal of that decision; and it is a question for lawyers to answer, whether the case is not ripe for the application of that writ of most remedial nature, as Lord Coke calls it, and which was invented lest in any case there should be an oppressive defect of justice—the venerable writ of audita querela defendantis—to ascertain the truth of a fact happening since the judgment, and upon the due finding of which the judgment will be vacated. Let the lawyers bring their books, and answer us if there is not a case here presented for the application of that ancient and most remedial writ.

From President Jackson the country has first learned the true theory and practical intent of the constitution, in giving to the Executive a qualified negative on the legislative power of Congress. Far from being an odious, dangerous, or kingly prerogative, this power, as vested in the President, is nothing but a qualified copy of the famous veto power vested in the tribunes of the people among the Romans, and intended to suspend the passage of a law until the people themselves should have time to consider it. The qualified veto of the President destroys nothing; it only delays the passage of a law, and refers it to the people for their consideration and decision. It is the reference of the law, not to a committee of the House, or of the whole House, but to the committee of the whole Union. It is a recommitment of the bill to the people, for them to examine and consider; and if, upon this examination, they are content to pass it, it will pass at the next session. The delay of a few months is the only effect of a veto in a case where the people shall ultimately approve a law; where they do not approve it, the interposition of the veto is the barrier which saves them the infliction of a law, the repeal of which might afterwards be almost impossible. The qualified negative is, therefore, a beneficent power, intended, as General Hamilton expressly declares in the Federalist, to protect, first, the executive department from the encroachments of the legislative department; and, secondly, to preserve the people from hasty, dangerous, or criminal legislation on the part of their representatives. This is the design and intention of the veto power; and the fear expressed by General Hamilton was, that Presidents, so far from exercising it too often, would not exercise it as often as the safety of the people required; that they might lack the moral courage to stake themselves in opposition to a favorite measure of the majority of the two Houses of Congress, and thus deprive the people, in many instances, of their right to pass upon a bill before it becomes a final law. The cases in which President Jackson has exercised the veto power has shown the soundness of these observations. No ordinary President would have staked himself against the Bank of the United States, and the two Houses of Congress, in 1832. It required President Jackson to confront that power—to stem that torrent—to stay the progress of that charter, and to refer it to the people for their decision. His moral courage was equal to the crisis. He arrested the charter until it could go to the people, and they have arrested it forever. Had he not done so, the charter would have become law, and its repeal almost impossible. The people of the whole Union would now have been in the condition of the people of Pennsylvania, bestrode by the monster, in daily conflict with him, and maintaining a doubtful contest for supremacy between the Government of a State and the directory of a moneyed corporation.

To detail specific acts which adorn the administration of President Jackson, and illustrate the intuitive sagacity of his intellect, the firmness of his mind, his disregard of personal popularity, and his entire devotion to the public good, would be inconsistent with this rapid sketch, intended merely to present general views, and not to detail single actions, howsoever worthy they may be of a splendid page in the volume of history. But how can we pass over the great measure of the removal of the public moneys from the Bank of the United States in the autumn of 1833? that wise, heroic, and masterly measure of prevention, which has rescued an empire from the fangs of a merciless, revengeful, greedy, insatiate, implacable, moneyed power! It is a remark for which I am indebted to the philosophic observation of my most esteemed colleague and friend, (pointing to Dr. Linn,) that, while it requires far greater talent to foresee an evil before it happens, and to arrest it by precautionary measures, than it requires to apply an adequate remedy to the same evil after it has happened, yet the applause bestowed by the world is always greatest in the latter case. Of this the removal of the public moneys from the Bank of the United States is an eminent instance. The veto of 1832, which arrested the charter which Congress had granted, immediately received the applause and approbation of a majority of the Union; the removal of the deposits, which prevented the bank from forcing a recharter, was disapproved by a large majority of the country, and even of his own friends; yet the veto would have been unavailing, and the bank would inevitably have been rechartered, if the deposits had not been removed. The immense sums of public money since accumulated would have enabled the bank, if she had retained the possession of it, to have coerced a recharter. Nothing but the removal could have prevented her from extorting a recharter from the sufferings and terrors of the people. If it had not been for that measure, the previous veto would have been unavailing; the bank would have been again installed in power, and this entire Federal Government would have been held as an appendage to that bank, and administered according to her directions, and by her nominees. That great measure of prevention, the removal of the deposits, though feebly and faintly supported by friends at first, has expelled the bank from the field, and driven her into abeyance.

ance under a State charter. She is not dead, but, holding her capital and stockholders together under a State charter, she has taken a position to watch events, and to profit by them. The royal tiger has gone into the jungle! and, crouched on his belly, he awaits the favorable moment for emerging from his cover, and springing on the body of the unsuspecting traveller!

The Treasury order for excluding paper money from the land offices is another wise measure, originating in an enlightened forecast, and preventing great mischiefs. The President foresaw the evils of suffering a thousand streams of paper money, issuing from a thousand different banks, to discharge themselves on the national domain. He foresaw that if these currents were allowed to run their course, that the public lands would be swept away, the Treasury would be filled with irredeemable paper, a vast number of banks must be broken by their folly, and the cry set up that nothing but a national bank could regulate the currency. He stopped the course of these streams of paper, and, in so doing, has saved the country from a great calamity, and excited anew the machinations of those whose schemes of gain and mischief have been disappointed, and who had counted on a new edition of panic and pressure, and again saluting Congress with the old story of confidence destroyed, currency ruined, prosperity annihilated, and distress produced, by the tyranny of one man. They began their lugubrious song; but ridicule and contempt have proved too strong for money and insolence; and the panic letter of the ex-president of the denationalized bank, after limping about for a few days, has shrunk from the lash of public scorn, and disappeared from the forum of public debate.

The difficulty with France: what an instance it presents of the superior sagacity of President Jackson over all the common-place politicians who beset and impede his administration at home! That difficulty, inflamed and aggravated by domestic faction, wore, at one time, a portentous aspect; the skill, firmness, elevation of purpose, and manly frankness, of the President, avoided the danger, accomplished the object, commanded the admiration of Europe, and retained the friendship of France. He conducted the delicate affair to a successful and mutually honorable issue. All is amicably and happily terminated, leaving not a wound, nor even a scar, behind—leaving the Frenchman and American on the ground on which they have stood for fifty years, and should forever stand; the ground of friendship, respect, good will, and mutual wishes for the honor, happiness, and prosperity, of each other.

But why this specification? So beneficent and so glorious has been the administration of this President, that where to begin, and where to end, in the enumeration of great measures, would be the embarrassment of him who has his eulogy to make. He came into office the first of generals; he goes out the first of statesmen. His civil competitors have shared the fate of his military opponents; and Washington city has been to the American politicians who have assailed him, what New Orleans was to the British generals who attacked his lines. Repulsed! driven back! discomfited! crushed! has been the fate of all assailants, foreign and domestic, civil and military. At home and abroad, the impress of his genius and of his character is felt. He has impressed upon the age in which he lives the stamp of his arms, of his diplomacy, and of his domestic policy. In a word, so transcendent have been the merits of his administration, that they have operated a miracle upon the minds of his most inveterate opponents. He has expunged their objections to military chieftains! He has shown them that they were mistaken; that military men were not the dangerous rulers they had imagined, but safe and prosperous conductors of the vessel of state. He has changed their fear into love. With visible signs they admit their error, and, instead of deprecating, they now invoke the reign of chieftains. They labored hard to procure a military successor to the present incumbent; and if their love goes on increasing at the same rate, the republic may be put to the expense of periodical wars, to breed a perpetual succession of these chieftains to rule over them and their posterity forever.

To drop this irony, which the inconsistency of mad opponents has provoked, and to return to the plain delineations of historical painting, the mind instinctively dwells on the vast and unprecedented popularity of this President. Great is the influence, great the power, greater than any man ever before possessed in our America, which he has acquired over the public mind. And how has he acquired it? Not by the arts of intrigue, or the juggling tricks of diplomacy; not by undermining rivals, or sacrificing public interests for the gratification of classes or individuals. But he has acquired it, first, by the exercise of an intuitive sagacity which, leaving all book learning at an immeasurable distance behind, has always enabled him to adopt the right remedy, at the right time, and to conquer soonest when the men of forms and office thought him most near to ruin and despair. Next, by a moral courage which knew no fear when the public good beckoned him to go on. Last, and chiefest, he has acquired it by an open honesty of purpose, which knew no concealments; by a straight-forwardness of action, which disdained the forms of office and the arts of intrigue; by a disinterestedness of motive, which knew no selfish or sordid calculation; a devotedness of patriotism, which staked every thing personal on the issue of every measure which the public welfare required him to adopt. By these qualities, and these means, he has acquired his prodigious popularity and his transcendent influence over the public mind; and if there are any who envy that influence and popularity, let them envy, also, and emulate, if they can, the qualities and means by which they were acquired.

Great has been the opposition to President Jackson's administration; greater, perhaps, than ever has been exhibited against any Government, short of actual insurrection and forcible resistance. Revolution has been proclaimed! and every thing has been done that could be expected to produce revolution. The country has been alarmed, agitated, convulsed. From the Senate chamber to the village bar-room, from one end of the continent to the other, denunciation, agitation, excitement, has been the order of the day. For eight years the President of this republic has stood upon a volcano, vomiting fire and flames upon him, and threatening the country itself with ruin and desolation, if the people did not expel the usurper, despot, and tyrant, as he was called, from the high place to which the suffrages of millions of freemen had elevated him.

Great is the confidence which he has always reposed in the discernment and equity of the American people. I have been accustomed to see him for many years, and under many discouraging trials; but never saw him doubt, for an instant, the ultimate support of the people. It was my privilege to see him often, and during the most gloomy period of the panic conspiracy, when the whole earth seemed to be in commotion against him, and when many friends were faltering, and stout hearts were quailing, before the raging storm which bank machination, and senatorial denunciation, had conjured up to overwhelm him. I saw him in the darkest moments of this gloomy period; and never did I see his confidence in the ultimate support of his fellow-citizens forsake him for an instant. He always said the people would stand by those who stand by them; and nobly have they justified that confidence! That verdict, the voice of millions, which now demands the expurgation of that sentence which the Senate and the bank then pronounced upon him, is the magnificent response of the people's hearts to the implicit confidence which he then reposed in them. But it was not in the people only that he had confidence; there was another, and a far higher Power, to which he constantly looked to save the country, and its defenders, from every danger; and signal events prove that he did not look to that high Power in vain.

Sir, I think it right, in approaching the termination of this great question, to present this faint and rapid sketch of the brilliant, beneficent, and glorious administration of President Jackson. It is not for me to attempt to do it justice; it is not for ordinary men to attempt its history. His military life, resplendent with dazzling events, will demand the pen of a nervous writer; his civil administration, replete with scenes which have called into action so many and such various passions of the human heart, and which has given to native sagacity so many victories over practised politicians, will require the profound, luminous, and philosophical conceptions of a Livy, a Plutarch, or a Sallust. This history is not to be written in our day. The contemporaries of such events are not the hands to describe them. Time must first do its office—must silence the passions, remove the actors, develop consequences, and canonize all that is sacred to honor, patriotism, and glory. In after ages the historic genius of our America shall produce the writers which the subject demands—men far removed from the contests of this day, who will know how to estimate this great epoch, and how to acquire an immortality for their own names by painting, with a master's hand, the immortal events of the patriot President's life.

And now, sir, I finish the task which, three years ago, I imposed on myself. Solitary and alone, and amidst the jeers and taunts of my opponents, I put this ball in motion. The people have taken it up, and rolled it forward, and I am no longer any thing but a unit in the vast mass which now propels it. In the name of that mass I speak. I demand the execution of the edict of the people; I demand the expurgation of that sentence which the voice of a few Senators, and the power of their confederate, the Bank of the United States, has caused to be placed on the journal of the Senate, and which the voice of millions of freemen has ordered to be expunged from it.

When Mr. BENTON had concluded, Mr. DANA commenced a speech in support of the resolution, but, after speaking for about fifteen minutes, without concluding, yielded the floor to

Mr. GRUNDY, on whose motion

The Senate adjourned.

The CHAIR presented the credentials of THOMAS CLAYTON, elected a Senator from Delaware, in the place of the Hon. JOHN M. CLAYTON, resigned.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

The Senate proceeded to the further consideration of the special order, the expunging resolution of Mr. BENTON.

Mr. DANA, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: Having so recently taken a seat in this chamber, and having neither inclination nor skill for public debate, I should most gladly have given a silent vote on this subject; but, sir, the citizens of the State which I, in connexion with my colleague, have the honor to represent, take a deep and lively interest in this question, and I should be thought remiss in my duty, and regardless of their feelings, were I to remain silent upon it. Maine, sir, is at one extremity of the Union, in a high latitude and cold climate; but, sir, she has a fertile soil, immense forests of timber, with her thousand streams to bear it to the ocean; she is a border State, skirted by the dominion of his Britannic Majesty; she has a large territory (if she was permitted to enjoy it) and a boundless seaboard, indented with numberless bays and harbors, filled with ship yards, ships, and commerce; these lead her citizens to an intercourse with the subjects of their royal neighbor, and by them we are told that we have no Government; that our "King is deposed;" that our President has been tried and condemned by our Senate, and that soon we shall come under the dominion of their King. However gratifying this thought may be to some in our Union, it has but few advocates with us. This leads the hardy, industrious, inquisitive citizens of the East to inquire, what has our beloved President done? Is it true that the Senate have condemned him? Can it be that he, who has triumphantly carried us through so many perils, and always been the people's friend, has betrayed us at last? Let us look into it; let us examine the subject! With this inquiring spirit, so peculiar to the people of the North, my constituents will be satisfied with nothing short of a fair and full investigation of this subject, and a just and impartial decision of the same. And that I may the more readily come to the investigation of it, and not wander from it, I ask permission to have the resolution of March 28, 1834, read from the desk.

This resolution, (in these words: "Resolved, That the President, in the late proceeding in relation to the revenue, has assumed on himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both,") holds up the President to the people as a usurper; as a violator of that constitution which he has sworn to support.

My first inquiry, Mr. President, is, how was this resolution passed? In what capacity did this honorable Senate act when they passed it? This body has a legislative and executive character, and, in one instance, and in one alone, a judicial character, viz: the trying of impeachments. Although the Senate has a legislative character, yet it is presumed that this body would not act in that capacity only on subjects of legislation. And this surely could not be such; there is no matter on which legislative action could be had. If the President was guilty of a violation of the constitution and laws, if he had committed high crimes and misdemeanors, no legislation would reach him; he must be tried by the constitution and the laws, as they existed at the time of his supposed offence. To me it is clear that this honorable body had no legislative jurisdiction on this subject. Did they then act in their executive capacity? No, sir; for their records show no such proceedings in the executive business. He must have been tried, then, by this honorable Senate in their judicial capacity; and this body has the sole power to try all indictments given it by the constitution, and when sitting for that purpose, in their judicial character. The rules of procedure, as adopted December 31, 1804, in this honorable Senate, to be observed in cases of impeachment, require "that at 12 o'clock of the day appointed for the trial of the impeachment, the legislative and executive business shall be suspended," and the Secretary shall then administer the following oath to the President of the Senate: "You solemnly swear (or affirm) that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of _____, you will do impartial justice, according to the constitution and laws of the United States; and the President shall administer the said oath to each Senator present." This clearly shows, Mr. President, the views which this honorable body had heretofore entertained of their own powers, and at a time, too, when they were cool and dispassionate, and about to exercise their high judicial functions. Here, sir, you find an important fact, that the Senate never did exercise their legislative and judicial functions at the same time; they are distinct in their natures, and have ever been so considered by this honorable body, and so exercised by them until the 28th of March, 1834, when, for some purpose, of which I will not now speak, for the first time, (and God grant that it may be for the last,) the legislative and judicial functions of this body, contrary to their own rules of procedure, and in violation of the constitution, were exercised at one and the same time, and a judicial sentence is clothed in legislative language. If the object was, sir, to bring a bold offender to justice, why not pursue the legal and constitutional course? Why violate both? But if the object was to exhibit the President as a daring usurper, and unworthy of the confidence of the people, this scheme, this project, would seem to have been the most probable to accomplish it. But it has failed, totally failed.

Expunging Resolution.

Again, sir, another rule of this body adopted at the same time as the former, requires that a summons shall be issued to the person accused, which summons shall be signed by their Secretary, sealed with their seal, and served by the Sergeant-at-arms. This rule also shows clearly that this honorable body never contemplated the exercise of their legislative and judicial functions at the same time. Then, sir, if this position is correct, the sentence of condemnation contained in this resolution was a judicial act, and could only have been done by a judicial tribunal.

Again, sir, it is the right of the accused to have the offence with which he is charged clearly and substantially set forth, and to be duly notified of the time and place of trial; to have an opportunity to appear before this august tribunal, hear the allegations and proofs against him, and confront his accusers, face to face, and then to make his defence. Now, Mr. President, let me ask, when the Chief Magistrate of this nation was condemned, in the resolution proposed to be expunged, did this honorable body suspend legislative and executive business? Did they organize themselves as a judicial tribunal? Did the President of the Senate take the above oath, prescribed by the rules of this honorable body? Did he administer the same to each Senator present? Was the accused furnished with a full and clear description of the charges brought against him? Was he notified of the time and place of trial? And was he permitted to face his accusers? If not, then, sir, permit me to ask, has he been tried by the rules presented by this honorable body? No, sir; he has been tried and condemned for a violation of the constitution and laws of his country, which he had sworn to support, contrary to our own rules—rules which this body had adopted for the trial of such offenders as he is accused of being.

Mr. President, having shown that the President was tried and condemned without form, I will now inquire if he has been tried according to the provisions of the constitution and laws of our country. In what cases, let me ask, can this honorable Senate act in their judicial capacity? Let the constitution answer: "The Senate shall have the sole power to lay all impeachments;" and that instrument conveys to this body no authority to try only in cases of impeachment. Here is the extent of our power, and here is our authority limited. Yes, sir, we can try impeachments, and impeachments only; but, sir, can the Senate originate impeachments? No, sir, they cannot. The constitution has declared, in so many words, that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment." Have they exercised that power? Have they accused the President of "assuming on himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and law, and in derogation of both?"

Have they impeached him for so doing? Where is the evidence of it? Have they notified the Senate of such impeachment? No, sir, they have not done it. The impeaching power has never acted in this case. They have not accused the President of any offence whatever. Where, then, sir, I ask, is our jurisdiction? We have no power to try, until the House—the accusing power—have impeached; none at all, not the shadow of any jurisdiction. Can it be, sir, that without even the forms prescribed by this honorable body, without an impeachment, without an accusation of any kind, we have assumed jurisdiction, tried, and condemned the President of the United States for a violation of the constitution and laws of his country? And shall this resolution remain on our journals, or shall it be expunged? Can this be done? Has this Senate a right to do it? There is no rule of more general application than this. The power which creates can destroy—the power which can make, can unmake—the power which puts up, can put down—and why should not this rule apply as well to records as to all other cases? unless, sir, it should be a record of vested rights, about which we have recently been so highly entertained; and I cannot perceive that there are any vested rights contained in this resolution. I think the accused will claim none in this case.

I apprehend, sir, that every legislative, executive, and judicial body have a right to alter, strike out, insert, erase, correct, and amend, their records. It is an inherent, co-ordinate power, without which such bodies could not exist, and transact their business. Is there a time limited, within which such alterations and amendments should be made? If so, what is the time? A day? a month? a year? In the history of records, no such limit is fixed. I trust, then, sir, such alterations may be made at the time deemed most proper by the body to which they belong. If, then, sir, such bodies have their records under their own control, why may they not erase, blot out, expunge, at pleasure? Is there any particular form or manner in which this shall be done? None. Then, sir, if there is no particular time limited for doing this, nor any manner prescribed in which it must be done, the time when, and the manner of doing it, are at the pleasure of the bodies to whom the records belong. If, then, sir, we have the power to expunge this resolution, is it expedient so to do?

JANUARY 13.—Mr. President, in the remarks which I had the honor to submit yesterday, on this subject, I endeavored to show that the resolution now proposed to be expunged was unconstitutional and informal, and that the honorable Senate had a right to amend, alter, correct, or expunge it, at such time and in such manner as they should think proper. If, Mr. President, I have succeeded in this, one question only remains to be discussed, viz: is it expedient to expunge the resolution? In reply to the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] I would say, I would not expunge it merely because the Senate have the power so to do, nor from party motives, nor for the triumphs of party, but from a solemn sense of duty I owe to the country, to the President, and to the honorable Senate of the United States. I would expunge it, sir, because the resolution bears on its face a contradiction, a judicial sentence found on a legislative journal, and no evidence that it came from any judicial tribunal. It is a sui generis case—it is a burlesque on judicial trials—it has no parallel; the like is not to be found in the annals of our country. No, sir, not even the trials among our pilgrim fathers at Salem can compare with this case; their fanaticism triumphed over right, and the innocent fell victims to the prevailing delusion; but even there the accused enjoyed privileges of which the President was denied. The accusations were made known to them; a time and place of hearing was assigned, and the accused had an opportunity of confronting the accuser and his witnesses face to face, and the trial was had before a competent tribunal.

These trials, which cast so much reproach on our puritan fathers, bear no comparison to the one under consideration. Nor does this sentence in the resolution bear any comparison with the summary judgment and execution of that relentless tyrant who stalks through our streets, carrying in his train terror and dismay. There, sir, public indignation bursts forth with fury, (ever to be dreaded,) but soon subsiding. Here, sir, the worm, the canker-worm, is at the heart of the constitution. Yes, sir, in this hall, this citadel of constitutional rights; in this temple, within the veil, the judicial ermine has been stained, the constitution violated, and a blot cast upon our national escutcheon; a blot which many waters cannot wash out, nor many years efface. What, then, shall be done? Let us expunge the resolution. Not, sir, because it detracts from the character of the President, or will in any way affect it. His reputation, his fame, are imperishable. He lives in the hearts and affections of the present generation; and history will place him beside the founder of our republic, and after ages will hail him as the saviour of it. Andrew Jackson has no equal; his whole life is a miracle. See him in youth, a fatherless, friendless, penniless boy, the son of a foreigner, a stranger in a strange land. Examine him in every stage of his existence, and we are impelled to exclaim, wonderful man! reared by Providence to guide the destinies of his country, and to exhibit the perfection and moral grandeur of human nature. I am not clear, sir, but it was necessary to the perfection of his character that he was thus violently assailed and condemned by this resolution.

If this resolution had not been passed, his masterly answer, one of the proudest monuments of his fame, would never have been seen. Like the oak, which has withstood the blasts for years, it must endure the fury of the whirlwind and the tempest, before it can become the king of the forest. That answer, sir, like its author, was doomed to undergo the most violent attacks, the foulest aspersions. It was even denied a place on the files of the Senate; and, like its author, too, it gained admiration wherever it was known. I said, sir, that Andrew Jackson stood alone. Where can you find his fellow! Look among the sovereigns of the earth. Look where you will, and you look in vain. Go to the records of the mighty dead, and where will you find his equal? Shall such a man stand condemned on the records of this honorable Senate, unaccused and unheard? "Tell it not in Gath."

Again, sir, I would expunge this resolution, lest it should be considered as a precedent. If, sir, it is permitted to remain, at some future period of great excitement, when passion and prejudice shall triumph over reason, and the constitution shall be made to subserve the purposes of disappointed ambition; when a President, less powerful than General Jackson, shall be in the way of presidential aspirants, we may see the same scenes of March, 1834, acted over again; and the power of the Chief Magistrate broken, and that branch of the Government prostrated at the feet of this. Then, sir, will our Government be ended, and the last hope of civil liberty be extinguished. Far, far distant be that evil day.

Another reason, sir, why I would expunge this resolution is, because it violates a vital principle in our constitution and destroys one of the dearest and most important rights we possess, viz: a full, fair, and impartial trial; and because, sir, the Chief Magistrate of this nation—one who has done more for it than any man living—yes, the very man "who has filled the measure of his country's glory"—has unjustly and unconstitutionally been deprived of this privilege, one to which the meanest citizen is entitled, and has been condemned without a hearing. And again, sir, I would blot out this resolution from our records, because the American people have pronounced judgment against it; and not only they, but the people of both continents have done it. Nor is this all, sir. The resolution is derogatory to the character and dignity of our Government, and violates the great principles of our national compact. A duty we owe ourselves, as a co-ordinate branch of the Government, requires that we should not suffer this resolution to remain on our records. It is an open, bold, and unprecedented attack, made by this branch of our Government upon the Chief Executive; an act which, had it been successful, must have prostrated our constitution, destroyed our Government, and laid our institutions of civil and religious liberty in the dust. Then, sir, let me say to this honorable body, as we value these rights and privileges, as we respect our own characters and the high reputation of the Senate, let us at once blot out this stain.

Mr. President, one word in reply to the honorable gentleman last up, [Mr. CRITTENDER,] and I will weary your patience no longer. Sir, we were yesterday admonished of our duties, and the sacredness of our oaths, and cautioned not to violate them in expunging this resolution. I trust, sir, that we are not unmindful of the obligations resting upon us, nor indifferent to the manner in which we perform them. And, in turn, let me, sir, remind that honorable Senator, and those who act with him, that this same constitution, which he would so carefully guard, expressly provides that the House of Representatives "shall have the sole power of impeachment." And let me farther remind him and his friends, that the House of Representatives never have impeached President Jackson, and yet he stands condemned by this resolution. Where, then, is the constitution, and where the sanctity of oaths by which it is guarded? Again, sir, the honorable gentleman more than intimated that the vindicators of the President's character were his worshippers. Sir, it is too late to begin now to worship him; it is more natural to worship the rising sun; and appearances indicate that the honorable gentleman and his friends have already selected their object of adoration. As to myself, sir, I have no inclination to worship General Jackson. I have no personal acquaintance with him; have seen him once, and once only, and for five minutes. I have never received any appointment or favor from him, and never expect so to do; yet I esteem him one of the greatest of men, and purest of patriots; and rely upon it that the page of history which shall record his deeds, will be read with enthusiasm through all coming time. His cotemporaries will go down to posterity with him. His coadjutors will gather lustre from his fame, and his revilers, though they may not bask in the effulgence of this great luminary, yet they may continue to be seen as spots upon it, like the spots which bedim the great orb of day.

Mr. President, I am thankful that I have had an opportunity of expressing the views and feelings of my constituents, together with my own, and notwithstanding the awful consequences predicted by the gentlemen opposed to expunging this resolution; yet, sir, I have none of those fears, none at all; but shall esteem it the best act, and one of the happiest days of my life, should I be permitted to record my name in favor of expunging this resolution.

If, Mr. President, in my remarks submitted, I have deviated in any thing from the ordinary course of discussion, I trust some apology will be found in the novelty of my situation, never having been a member of any Legislature until I had the honor of a seat in this body.

Expunging Resolution.

Mr. PRESTON next rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Nothing, Mr. President, (said he,) was farther from my intention, than to have said a single word on this subject. Nor do I now propose to discuss it. That has been done so fully and elaborately on both sides, that I shall not enter upon the argument. I thought I should not have said a word, but I feel a sort of impossibility of withholding the expression of my utter repugnance to this proceeding. If we had not arrived at the very issue; if the question were not ready to be taken, I should have retained my seat, for I have long been endeavoring to school and to subdue my heart down to this submission. During the entire course of events which has gradually brought my mind to the conclusion that this resolution would at some time pass, I have endeavored to discipline my feelings, to curb and restrain them, and bring down my mind to the event, so that when at last the sad moment should arrive, I might meet it with a becoming resignation; and I did suppose that I had succeeded. I had long seen the growing popularity of this measure. I was no stranger to the arts and the industry by which the progress of that popularity had been stimulated and urged on from day to day. I well knew the power and the popularity of the Chief Magistrate. I had heard of his own personal exertions to promote this object. I saw that it was resolved upon as a party measure, and I saw the party which had resolved upon it rapidly and triumphantly succeeding throughout a large part of the Union. These things certainly are sufficient to have forewarned me, and I had hoped, and till this moment believed, that they had forearmed me also. But there was added to all these the still less equivocal evidence arising from the proceedings of several of the State Legislatures. Sir, when first I heard that a State Legislature had instructed her Senators on this floor to vote in favor of this thing, it struck me with inexpressible sorrow and dismay. But when I from time to time beheld various other State Legislatures, acting under the same dictation, or at least misled into the same mistake, sorrow assumed in my bosom the complexion of despair. But there was still one ingredient to be added to this cup, to render the odious draught more intolerably bitter. I could, I will confess it, with some comparative degree of philosophy, have seen certain States of this confederacy one after another giving way, and bringing their successive sacrifices to this altar of executive power. I could have borne to see this and that and the other State prostrating herself and aiding in the general conspiracy to prostrate the Senate. But when at length it came to pass that the ancient and powerful Commonwealth of Virginia was brought to bow her venerable locks before the footstool of power, forgot her past history, forgot who and what she is and what she has been, and associated herself in a combination like this, how shall I describe to you my feelings! As a politician, I might have been mortified at such a spectacle; as a statesman, belonging to the United States, I turned from it with shame; but as a native of Virginia, I deplore, I lament, from the bottom of my heart, that she too has joined the funeral procession of the constitution. Sir, I was proud to remember her in her proud day; to consider her as she once was, and perhaps still is—the mother of great men; to look back to that bright, that immortal period in our history when she recalled her children from these halls of national legislation into her own Legislature, there to vindicate the rights and independence of the State, and to reassert the violated constitution against the usurpations of this Government. Then, indeed, Virginia preserved that illustrious character which had descended with her from the Revolution. Then she put herself on her State rights, and on the popular doctrines of a free Government; and all who witnessed the animating sight must have concluded that, throughout her existence, she would ever continue to vindicate and to perpetuate the doctrine and the spirit of liberty. Sir, I could have wished that the honorable gentleman who now represents that distinguished State could have found in his own mind reasons for taking a different course from that which he has pursued in this matter. With the powers which he unquestionably possesses, with his liberal education and large experience, and especially with the good fortune of growing up amidst the very men who laid the foundations of our republic, I had hoped that he would have invoked the ancient spirit of his State, and would have added the suffrage of his voice to save the trembling constitution, about to be immolated at the footstool of executive power. But it was my lot to be disappointed; and I mourn, from the bottom of my heart, the instruction under which he feels himself constrained to vote for this extraordinary resolution. Where are the sedateness, the gravity, the calm and cautious wisdom of Madison? Where the philosophic spirit, the enlarged views, and popular predilections of Jefferson? Where the sturdy republicanism of John Taylor? Where those bright names which make her history? They are gone—gone and others control her destiny. Sir, I lament, I mourn, that my native State should have lent herself and the remnant of her glory to promote and gloss over this proceeding. I take consolation, however, Mr. President, that there is one State, one free and fearless State, which has kept herself aloof from this combination; whose unbroken spirit, whose pride and honor, demand of me, her representative, to make, as I now do, on behalf of South Carolina, her public and solemn protest against this open and flagrant violation of the constitution.

But, sir, I have done. The argument is exhausted; the verdict has been rendered; the judgment given; execution is demanded—ay, sir, and let me add, the executioners are here with ready hands. Exercise your function, gentlemen. You have been called on to do execution—do it. The axe is in your hand; perform that which is so loudly called for. Execution, sir? Of what? Of whom? Is the axe aimed at me, and at those of us who voted for the resolution you are about to expunge? Is it us you strike at? If so, I would say, and with comparative satisfaction, in God's name, let the blow come, and while the fatal edge fell upon my neck, I would declare, with honest sincerity, that I had rather be the criminal of 1834 than the executioner of 1836. Proceed, gentlemen, do your holy work. Grant judgment. Do execution—execution upon your own records—execution upon the constitution of your country. I do not envy you your office. Personally, however, it does not touch us. No, sir; I am glad, I rejoice, that on that record my name is found as one against whom this act is aimed. I would appeal from the present time to posterity, and ask whether the names of myself and my associates or the names of our executioners are then most likely to be venerated as guardians of the constitution. But can you suppose that your work is to be done on that body of representatives of the States who voted for the obnoxious record? That you will execute us? Our reputation, our character, and standing? No, sir; it is not in the power of your black lines to touch us. I, indeed, was but a common soldier, and served in the ranks under greater men. But would gentlemen strike out of the record of this Government the names of those who offered that resolution? No, no. They are far beyond your reach, and the only result of your impotent attack will be the more firmly to establish their fame. Wrong they may have been, but their business and their aim was to sustain the constitution. An act had been done of equivocal import, and attended with tremendous consequences. Those consequences swept over the Union like an inundation, and in that dark hour, and in the face of a popularity before which nothing could stand, they dared to raise their voice in this hall, and, so far as an expression of opinion could go, to record their censure of that act. And will gentlemen pretend to tell me that these men will not receive the gratitude of posterity? This expunging process may, for a season, promote the reputation of those who perform it; but this deed will bring fresh into remembrance the names of those who passed that resolution which they cannot suffer to stand on the records of the Senate. Some of these individuals are present, and I must forbear. But long after we shall have passed away, when the history of our country is written, and fondly and proudly dwelt upon by our posterity, their names will be mentioned. They will be familiar as household words, and will be taught to children as the names of Washington, and Adams, and Hancock, and Lee, and Lafayette, are now taught to our children. If the hope, if the design, is to efface those names from the leaves of our national memorials, it will fail. Every effort to extinguish will but increase the splendor which surrounds them. An attack upon the constitution may, indeed, confer on those who perpetrate it a sort of immortality, but it is not such as will belong to its defenders. We remember, indeed, but we execrate, the name of the miscreant who, for a sort of fame, destroyed a venerable temple of antiquity. And whom, I again ask, will you do execution upon? Upon the record? Is it the object of offence? Will you make your war on the paper? Will you wreak your spite upon so much rags and cotton? Who or what is it that is to be prostrated and broken down? It is the Senate of the United States. It is one of the co-ordinate branches of the General Government. Proceed, then, to the sacrifice. Do execution on the Senate. Consummate your solemn farce, and then rise and congratulate yourselves that you are yourselves members of the very body that you have bowed to the footstool of power. Offer your glad hosannas—ay, triumph and boast that you have brought that Senate, of which you form a part, to this pass. But while you are making the welkin ring, I will mourn at your jubilee. I shall be present at the scene, but not of it, and my only consolation will be that I can reply to my country, "Thou canst not say I did it." The people, it seems, have decided against the Senate. The people order the Senate to take the constitution in their hand—to bring it into the presence of the "miraculous man," as an honorable Senator [Mr. DANA] has just termed him, and, as an offering for his great services, for his unequalled popularity, for the unsurpassed confidence which he enjoys, sing hosannas in his ears, and while the sky re-echoes to your shouts of exultation, burn the constitution as incense under his nostrils. This, and nothing less than this, will satisfy the idolatrous devotion of his admirers. Do execution on the records of your land. Obliterate your own journal? Do not introduce the report of a committee. Do not revoke your former act by recording a resolution; but perform a physical act of execution. Why, sir, does the Senate of to-day differ from the Senate of yesterday? Has the Senate of 1837 different views from the Senate of 1834? Does the Senate now think that the Senate then grossly transcended its power? And is not language capable of expressing this? Are there no words to express a difference of opinion? Cannot you state the strength of your conviction in all the compass of your mother tongue? No. You must do a physical act. You must put nothing on record. You must perform a deed. You must do something that has no precedent. Your Clerk is to be exhibited, not reading, not writing, not enunciating your decisions, but performing mechanical execution on a bit of paper. He is not to be occupied in his ordinary and legal functions. No, sir. He is to perform the duty of a common hangman. Might it not be as well to order in a file of soldiers with their bayonets? Or would it not be better still to purify the journal by fire? Fire is the ancient ordeal. Give the victim to the flames; and then, like a company of the native Sagamores, sit round and inhale the agreeable fragrance as the smoke of the guilty lines shall darkly ascend to heaven. When the act is performed, you will have set a memorable precedent. And do you think there will be no improvement on this patent mode of conciliating the Executive? May it not be profitably applied to some other purposes? Why not expunge those who made the record? If the proceeding had a guilt so monstrous as to render necessary this novel and extraordinary course, the men themselves who perpetrated the deed—it is they who should be expunged. Men who entered so foul a page upon your journals cannot be worthy of a seat here. Remove us. Turn us out. Expel us from the Senate. Would to God you could. Call in the prætorian guard. Take us—apprehend us—march us off.

Expunging Resolution.

But the honorable Senator who has just resumed his seat takes the ground that this expunging resolution is merely a strong mode of expressing an opinion. I put it to the candor of that honorable gentleman whether this is a mere expression of opinion? The resolution which is to be expunged asserted, on behalf of the Senate, a difference of opinion from the President of the United States. It expressed that difference fairly and openly. The whole extent of its offence is, the expression of a difference of opinion from the President on a constitutional question. It never once entered the minds of the authors of that resolution to stain your record by an official act of hatred. I admit, indeed, that the bosoms of some of them may not have been wholly free from some feelings of that description, and that some of the speeches on this floor manifested at times a strong sentiment of hostility towards the President. But did it ever enter their thoughts to make the journal of this body a record of personal spite? They expressed a difference of sentiment, and this surely may be done in the very kindest spirit. But sir, is that the temper of the present proceeding? Is it to express a difference of opinion that we are now invited? Is it to express an opinion at all? What is it the expression of? Vengeance. That is what is to be expressed. The compass of the English language is not able to bring forth a tone sufficient for the purpose. Vengeance! vengeance! must be taken on the records. They are to be put in mourning. They are to be hung with black. In this there may be a double purpose. The Senate may intend that their journals shall bear imperishable evidence of their deep mourning that the feelings of the President should have been wounded. The record is to be carried into his presence, that we may show the Chief Magistrate that we have put ourselves permanently into mourning for the offence we have committed, and to express our humble hope that this may go some little way towards healing the wounds which have been inflicted on his sensibility. Possibly the President may deign to listen to us; nay, he may even give a gracious smile of approbation, a glance of complacency, on those who humbly present to him this most grateful oblation. Yes, sir, the proceeding is intended to inscribe upon our records more than language can impart, more than we are willing or able to put into words; a deed, an overtact, wi, it is humbly hoped, prove more grateful than any words could have been rendered to the august, the "miraculous" being who is to be propitiated. Attend, sir, to the palinode which has just been sung to the honor and glory of the President of the United States. The attenuated period, both of political and physical existence, of the President, makes me very reluctant indeed to offer any remarks on the very extravagant language in which he has been praised; nor should I advert to the gentleman's speech at all, but to notice the ground on which this measure is advocated. "Expunge! expunge!" cries the gentleman; "expunge a resolution which is an attack on the good, the glorious, the popular, the powerful, the 'miraculous,' President of the United States!" This, sir, was the tone, and this the argument, in three fourths, nay, in four fifths of the venerable gentleman's discourse. He puts this resolution on the ground of his eulogy of the President. That is the sole argument. Because President Jackson is praiseworthy and glorious, expunge! expunge! Why, sir, what is the connexion? The Senator has certainly not given us a very logical conclusion. General Jackson is to be praised; that forms the premises of his argument. This record is to be expunged; that is the conclusion. We are to obliterate our records, and bring them, in the habiliments of mourning, to his feet, because President Jackson is gracious, glorious, popular, powerful, miraculous! And all these properties, and all this glory, is to be transferred bodily to another gentleman who is just like himself. Alter et idem. We are to abolish our journal, because General Jackson is thus and thus, and his successor will be thus and thus. That is the argument. I say nothing now of the truth of the premises, because this is not a convenient opportunity for the investigation of that subject. Those who are in ecstasies, who are in exultations of admiration, who are shouting, clapping hands, and singing hallelujahs, are not exactly in a condition of mind to listen or be argued with. They may be within the extreme pale of reason, but they are, to say the least, on the confines of enthusiasm. But, admitting that the President is that exalted, that immaculate, that unequalled, that miraculous person which he is represented; allowing that he leaves out of sight all that history has left us of ancient Rome, and all that we have read of modern worth and virtue; and admitting that all this is transferable, and has been transferred, for the glory and blessedness of our country, to one worthy to be his successor, let me ask, how does this bring us to the conclusion that the record of our proceedings is to be expunged?

Let the gentleman introduce a resolution embodying the substance of his speech, to wit: that General Jackson is the greatest and best man that now lives, has lived, or will ever live again; that he is worthy of all honor and glory, that the constitution is to be sacrificed, and the records of one branch of the Government defaced and mutilated, for his gratification. Let him lay that resolution before the people, to whose verdict he has appealed, and see how it will be received.

The honorable gentleman, however, stated one fact in reference to the President, which is more novel, at least, than many of the remarks with which he favored the Senate. It is, if I mistake not, something entirely novel on this floor. He told us that the President was miraculous. But the miracle, it seems, lies in the fact that he was born a foreigner, and is President of the United States. Sir, General Jackson, I admit, has overcome great difficulties. He has fought the battle of life; he has fought it every where for success, and with success. But I never knew, until I was now officially informed, that he was born in Ireland. [A laugh.] To prevent his future historians from falling into a difficulty like that which happened in the case of a more obscure individual in Greece, for whose birthplace seven cities are said to have contended, the gentleman from Maine has kindly fixed the spot; and when that cloud of future historians of whom we have been told, and who are themselves to become immortal by writing General Jackson's life, shall be searching for panegyric to adorn their rival pages on that deathless theme, they will at least be relieved from the pains of uncertain conjecture as to the nativity of the hero of their story.

It is said, from high authority, that men make to themselves idols and worship them, and I shall not now pause to censure this propensity of our nature; and I know when the idol is fashioned it is difficult to restrict its worshippers as to the mode of worship, or the extent of the sacrifice. To the idols in the East men sacrifice themselves, and sometimes their wives and children. But these gentlemen are far wiser. They do not sacrifice themselves—nothing is farther from their thoughts. Such a thing does not enter into their purposes. But still the sacrifice must be conspicuous, impressive, such as will produce effect. They look round for a victim. But will they, like Eastern devotees, cast themselves beneath the onward crushing car of executive power. Oh, no, sir. Nothing like it. They stand cautiously out of the way of its career, and cast down the constitution of their country. That is the victim—crush it. There is the official record of the Senate—crush it. There is the very body itself, the collected Senate of the United States—crush it. And do you crush it, gentlemen? Do you expunge the Senate for daring to speak a word in its last expiring hours, to indicate that it is still a co-ordinate branch of the Government, and in favor of the dying liberty of the land? I ask, again, whom it is that you thus offer to stigmatize? On whom is this resolution to act? Against what body is your blow directed? What body will you brand with infamy, as the aristocratic branch of the Government? It is the Senate of the United States; your own Senate. That is the victim dragged out for immolation to the powers that be.

But this expunging process is defended by the gentleman from Virginia, on the ground that it is a great engine to maintain the cause of human liberty. And how does he attempt to maintain his position? Why, truly, because it was resorted to in England in support of the right of popular election. Ay? And will gentlemen seek to wrest out of the hands of the British whigs a weapon so powerfully wielded by them, but in a cause so different? For whom did they employ it? and against whom? Was it not used to protect popular rights? to guard the rights of popular bodies? the rights of the people and the rights of Parliament against the arbitrary power of the King and of the royal party in the House of Commons? Was it wielded for the whigs against the Tories? or for the Tories against the whigs? Let the gentleman answer. Yes; when the beams of liberty struggle out to day and gild the British history once in two hundred years, you find this process of expunging resorted to by our sturdy ancestors in their struggles with the Crown, and as an extreme measure, to resist the encroachments of lawless power; not, as here, to wipe out and obliterate forever the last effort for freedom. If the resolution of Parliament in the great Westminster election had been in favor of Wilkes, and against Mr. Luttrell, would it have been expunged? No, sir. It was because it was entered at the instance of Luttrell against John Wilkes, the Patroclus over whose body this fight for freedom was maintained; that was the reason of its expunction from the journals. And it forms one of the most ominous signs of the times we live in, that here, the most powerful engines wielded in the land of our ancestors in favor of popular rights, are all seized upon and employed for the increase and advancement of executive power. All that belongs to the people is invoked only to betray them. The people, the people, the voice of the people, gentlemen claim as their own. They cite every popular argument; and all for what? To hold up the cause of the many against the few; of the millions against the grasping power of the one? No, sir; no, no. All these mighty motive powers are called up to exalt the executive, and to put down the legislative power; to increase the power of the one against the rights of the many. They are brought forward to silence, for all future time, the voice of the Senate, whenever it shall be raised against the encroachments of power. Yes, sir, they seek to hang up in terrore over your head, and in full view of every Senator, a scourge, to be applied without mercy to any who shall dare to use aught but the language of eulogy.

"Horribili sedere flagello," that is the fate which awaits him. It is to be set up by way of memento, to muzzle this body for all future time. No, sir, our voice must never be heard save in strains of adulation, and in chanting palinodes like that which has recently been furnished as a pattern to this body.

A gentleman, whose talents and intelligence I highly honor, has asked us to strip this matter of all the humbuggery which has been thrown around it. Well, sir, let us do so. And what is it, when thus denuded, but a bit in the mouth of this Senate, to bring it down when it becomes too restive for the taste or safety of those in power; so that the Chief Magistrate may, undisturbed by its curvettings, proceed to seize upon the national treasure, and repeal the decisions of the Supreme Court; and if any adventurous mouth shall dare to whisper he is acting against the constitution, such rashness may instantly be checked by the warning "hush! take care! remember the expunging resolution!—do you wish to bring us again under the discipline of the black lines?" I suppose the fac simile of that blotted and defaced page of our records will be fixed up in some conspicuous position above the seat of our presiding officer, so that when we would dare to think, to feel, and to speak, as freemen and American legislators, we may look up, and, beholding the awful monitor, may put our hands on our mouths, and our mouths in the dust, and repent, while it is yet time, all such presumptuous aspirations.

In other days it has often happened that successive Senates have differed from each other in opinions and policy, and have in like manner differed from the Executive, and each Senate has freely expressed its own sentiments. In regard to the United States Bank, for example, the opinions of this body have varied at different periods. The Senate, at one time, thought that bank constitutional; at another time, they thought it unconstitutional; a majority now consider it as a monster. Why not, then, expunge? Why not draw your black lines round that part of your journal which records the act by which that bank was chartered? The resolution against which your magnanimous wrath is now directed has done no harm. It has led to no action. It has brought no long train of evils on the country. But the charter of the Bank of the United States—what did not that effect? That was no empty declaration of opinion. It was a substantial act. And to what a long black catalogue of national calamities did it not in your opinion lead? If any thing is to be expunged, why not expunge that? It seems not to have entered the imaginations of gentlemen on the other side to draw their lines round that resolution. Yet the honorable Senator from Virginia believes most sincerely that the act was unconstitutional. He holds that it led to consequences greatly detrimental to the national good, and tells us that the President deserves the everlasting gratitude of the country for having abolished and destroyed the bank. Well, sir, if it is not fit in that case, how and why is it fit in this? Because this violates the rights of the people? So did that. Is this unconstitutional? So was the other. Is this derogatory to the feelings and wishes of the President? So was that. Is the Senate bound in duty to express its disapprobation of this act? Why not of the other? But is it really so great an offence to differ from the President on a constitutional question, inasmuch that all traces of such a thing must be obliterated from our records? that it must be effaced—expunged—purged off? Why, sir, the President differs from us constantly on constitutional points; and both he and this Senate differ widely from President Washington on a constitutional point, viz: on the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States. Why is not the opinion of Washington to be expunged? Why not go back, and hold him up as a sacrifice? It has, indeed, in some sort, been already done. You have not broken into the sepulchre of Mount Vernon, and dug up his bones and burnt them, like Wickliffe's, but you have immolated his name; his virtues, his glory, have been taken from him and transferred to another. Why not make your sacrifice complete? If the principle on which you act is jealousy for the honor and power of the Executive, why not, when former Presidents have sent us messages containing unconstitutional notions, expunge their messages from your archives? The President sent us a message in the panic session of 1834. How would gentlemen have taken it, had those who constituted the majority at that day proposed to expunge it from the records?

Both Houses of Congress have differed from other Presidents. Does any gentleman here dream of a leading member in either House under the Jefferson administration proposing to expunge any presidential opinion which did not correspond with his own? Or would any supporter of the wise, the grave, the sedate, the temperate, the forbearing Madison, ever conceive the notion that he was to be propitiated by effacing the records? Did he ever require his friends to depart from their public duties, neglect the exigencies of the public business, and address themselves to this most extraordinary method of silencing the indignation of a President? There was a great struggle in '98, and after a long course of most bitter and acrimonious party warfare, the republican party eventually triumphed, and came into power; but in the very heat of conquest, and still covered, as it was, with the sweat and the dust of battle, did it once enter into their heads to expunge from the public journals the acts of their predecessors? Or could it now occur to the minds of intelligent and honorable men that they are called upon to vindicate the ashes of the illustrious dead by removing from the national archives all traces of difference of opinion on the part of either House of Congress from the departed saviours of our country? Dare the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania rise in his place, and, with a reverend regard to yonder image of Washington, introduce a resolution to expunge whatever on our journal intimates a difference of opinion from that great man? Will he venture to look into that venerable and venerated countenance, * and make such a motion in this chamber? No, sir. His own heart tells him that the image would frown upon him from its frame, and, could it speak, would cry, Forbear. Destroy not your constitution. Dishonor not your own archives. Draw no black lines upon your journal on my account. Write no history for me. My history is written in a nation's eyes. I desire you to play off no mountebank farce for my glory; it is safe in the keeping of my countrymen. Yes, sir; such would be the language of Washington; and I well know that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania has its response in his heart. And, sir, if we are not called to do this for the illustrious, great, and good, who have departed, shall we do it for the living, because he is powerful? Because he is the dispenser of office, who is to propagate his own system of policy through another generation, and to transuse his own vital spirit into a living branch of the same stem? If this sacrifice was to be offered to the illustrious dead, whom history has already fixed in niches of imperishable honor, we might endure it with greater patience. But to a living man, and a man who can reward the deed, sir, I cannot look the thing steadily in the face. I protest to you that my inmost heart is bowed down at the thought with sorrow and shame.

But the deed is to be done. States have spoken. Whether the people of the United States have spoken might bear a question. Certainly many States have uttered their voice, whose right to speak I should be the last to question. That they have acted under mistaken views, I have not a doubt. The act is fraught with most dangerous consequences. It inflicts deep wounds on the dignity and the potency of this body; for I see in the countenances of many honorable gentlemen that they would gladly avoid this thing, and would, if they could, avoid the deed. I do believe that, in the very moment of inflicting the blow, their hearts will be haunted by the same emotions which fill and oppress my own. And while, under the pressure of dire necessity, they raise the axe, they feel prepared, like other executioners, first to ask pardon of the victim. Ay, sir, I believe that when it comes to the actual performance of the tragedy, there will be a secret whisper in their ear that will say to them, perhaps in this case our party feelings have pressed us a little too far. And when, after a solemn and mournful pause, the Secretary has performed his detested office, and has mangled the record of the Senate, will any here rise in his place and cry aloud, thus perish all traitors? Or will they not rather hang their heads, and, smiting on their breasts, heave mournful sighs over so hard a necessity? I shall witness it, and whatever I may feel, I shall feel nothing personally. So far as I am personally concerned, I can fold my arms in perfect coolness, and witness the deed without shrinking. All I feel now is for the Senate—is for the constitution—is for the country. I may cry wo, wo, to England, but not to me. In a moment I shall recover my self-possession, shall rise, shall rejoice, that it was my good fortune to have my name entered on the same page where the rights of this body were recorded, and that there, in company with the Senate's honor, it shall safely abide forever, in spite of your black lines.

Mr. RIVES followed, and addressed the Senate at great length in support of the resolution. [It appears that, from some cause unknown to the publishers, this speech was never reported.]

When Mr. RIVES had taken his seat,

Mr. MOORE rose and said: Allusions had been made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] to instructions by the Legislatures, in order to influence the votes of Senators relative to this very extraordinary procedure. And as the gentleman may have intended a compliment to Alabama by including her in his allusions, he felt it to be his duty to explain the character of her legislative action on this subject.

[Here Mr. RIVES rose and said he intended nothing special as regarded Alabama; his remark was intended to be general.]

Mr. M. resumed and said, although the explanation was satisfactory, yet, as he was up, he hoped he would be indulged in making a few comments only. He did not entertain the vain hope that he could add any thing to the interesting debate that had already occurred upon the resolutions now before the Senate; and, as one who intended to vote against them, he felt that he might well content himself with the argument and views that had been urged by others, not only on a former occasion, but the very able exposition with which the Senate was favored by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] on yesterday, and also by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] to-day.

But the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] has not been able to see the force of any argument from that quarter. This is not unlikely. The peculiar situation of that gentleman, as connected with the question, was not well calculated to carry conviction to his mind. Yet others may well imagine, to say their argument was lucid and forcible would not do justice to those gentlemen. Sir, they were withering in sarcasm, eloquent and convincing in argument.

Mr. M. could not say how certain Senators, advocates for the black-line process, felt, but assured the President he himself was delighted, and could fain have wished that crowds of those who had dispensed with the trouble of thinking and judging for themselves upon great political questions, contenting themselves with transferring this important political privilege into the hands of others, to be exercised for them, had been present upon the occasion.

Mr. M. reminded his colleague that when these resolutions were first discussed at a former session, he and himself were found side by side, shoulder to shoulder, exercising their united influence in opposition to them, although at that time they had received the instructions of the General Assembly, commanding their vote in their favor; that his colleague and himself then followed the lead of that stern and inflexible, but much abused and slandered patriot and statesman, the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE,] who proposed an amendment, having for its object the repeal and rescinding the obnoxious resolution of the Senate, which censured the President, (and which they had not voted for,) thereby stamping it with the disapprobation of this body, and at the same time preserving the constitution inviolate.

We then thought this was all that could have been reasonably expected, and that this would do ample justice to General Jackson. We thought then, as he (Mr. M.) thought now, that this was not a legitimate subject upon which the General Assembly possessed the right to give instructions. To render instructions binding, the subject-matter must be constitutional and proper; they must not require the public servant to perform an unworthy or an immoral act; they cannot require him to violate the constitution of the land. That sacred instrument, which we have pledged ourselves to support by taking a solemn oath at your desk, requires the Senate to keep a journal of its proceedings, for the most important and valuable purposes. Among these were the following, viz: that our constituents and posterity may read and know our acts, in order that, if they be evil, we may receive merited censure, and if virtuous, that the journals may be resorted to as the means of defence and justification. To expunge, therefore, any portion of the journals of the Senate, to his mind, would be a most flagrant and palpable violation of that sacred instrument.

The appeal which his colleague and himself had made from the judgment of the General Assembly had been responded to by the people; a more mature deliberation had taken place as to the propriety of expunging the journals of the Senate, and at the two last sessions of the Legislature the effort was again renewed to repass the resolutions of instructions, in order to command our votes. They failed; they could not be forced through the Senate. Here was a triumph of principle over party spirit and party drill and discipline, in favor of the constitution and laws of the land. And now he was called upon again to vote upon the expunging resolution; his opinion remained unchanged; he should again vote against them, and he hoped again in company with his colleague, which he could not doubt. The instructions being withdrawn, he had great pleasure in voting under circumstances so strongly indicating the approval of the citizens of the State, as it was in accordance with the dictates of his own judgment and conscience.

Mr. M. said his colleague would recollect that when they returned to the bosom of their constituents, the same measure of justice had not been meted out to him that his colleague had been favored with; that it had been his misfortune to have the vote referred to in opposition to the expunging resolutions made the subject of censure and denunciation, by a contemptible public meeting, called in the vicinity of, and doubtless at the instance of, a public functionary high in office in Alabama, a slave to the kitchen cabinet; and this meeting, composed of his slavish partisans, had the indecency and gross injustice to denounce and censure him for not obeying the instructions of the General Assembly; while his colleague, who gave the same vote, and made a longer speech against the right and propriety of the instructions of the Legislature, received laudatory resolutions. He (Mr. M.) would not say this was done on account of his colleague's vote on the expunging resolutions, but mainly, he presumed, for his support of those measures calculated to promote the success of the individual selected by General Jackson to succeed him. It was upon this subject that his difference in his official conduct from his colleague was so criminal. It matters not in these modern times of democratic republicanism how consistent and faithful a public servant may be, as regards principles and measures; this availeth nothing; he must advocate the caucus nominee; this was the only true test of merit; and although he had known the time when a great majority, perhaps nine tenths, of his constituents were with him on this very question, yet, by means of a borrowed capital, this obsequious nominee of the President and his office-holders had succeeded in obtaining the vote of the State.

SENATE.]

Expunging Resolution.

He (Mr. M.) would bow with due submission to the will of his constituents, but he hoped his enemies would not succeed, by making up false issues, in their efforts to deceive the people. All he wished was sheer justice. While he was proud to be in company with those with whom he was associated on this question, he yet claimed to be a true republican, a Jeffersonian republican, a republican of the old school; and if he was not claimed as belonging to the democratic republican party, according to the modern acceptance of the term, which he believed meant nothing more nor less than a tame and servile submission to the will of one man, as regarded his favorite selected to succeed him, yet he claimed to have been a consistent advocate of all the great principles and measures which were proclaimed by the Chief Magistrate and his friends, in that memorable contest which resulted in his triumph, in which many of those who now seek to distinguish themselves as his (Mr. M.'s) political enemies and persecutors, were active and bitter in the ranks of General Jackson's opponents; and among these was the very individual who is now at the head of the party, who, as soon as victory had crowned our efforts, deserted his friends and his party, and proposed to enter in the service of the old hero, provided he could receive pardon for the past, and rewards for his future service.

Mr. M. said he had stated that he had given a liberal support to all the leading measures avowed by General Jackson and his friends in their contest for power. Among these were reform and retrenchment, as regarded the expenditures of this Government; opposition to that system of internal improvement which sought to tax one portion of the citizens of this country for the benefit of another, including the tariff; the policy relative to the Indians; the reservation of the elective franchise in its purity; opposition to the practice, so corrupting, of appointing members of Congress to office, &c.; and he challenged his political enemies to point their finger to any instance in which he had not faithfully sustained all these great principles; and although he and his friends had been proscribed, he could view his course without regret, and with an approving conscience, which he would not exchange for all the satisfaction his enemies might enjoy for their vindictive persecution. He hoped, at some future day, that justice would be awarded to him which is now withheld.

If he had come here to get office for himself or his friends, and, looking to that object alone, had forgotten the interest of his constituents, he might easily have supported, as others did, every measure of the administration, right or wrong. He might have sustained the Chief Magistrate in the extraordinary prerogative of nominating his successor, and in that equally dangerous, but more unworthy and contemptible object of mutilating the journals of the Senate.

But the black-line process was not original with the mover, the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] The resolution, as originally introduced, proceeded boldly to the object. He was sorry to say this metaphorical mode of expunging emanated from Virginia. He deeply regretted it. He had been taught to entertain for that renowned State the highest respect; but this was a project which sought to do that by indirection which the friends of the measure did not dare do by direct means. The modification, therefore, was far from recommending the measure to his favor.

Mr. NILES asked for the reading of the resolution, omitting the preamble; which having been read by the Secretary, Mr. N. said that he had some thoughts of moving to strike out that part of the resolution which related to the black lines, which seemed to disturb the feelings of honorable Senators so much. He had no partiality to that part of the resolution, and should prefer that the process or mode of expunging should be omitted. But the resolution was so drawn that he could not well move to amend it; and as he was not very solicitous about that part which relates to the black lines, one way or the other, he should not make the motion. What he esteemed as the essential and substantive part of the resolution, or what the lawyers call the gist and gravamen, the pith and substance of the whole, would stand as well, and answer the purpose intended quite as effectually, without the part relating to the black lines. He considered that the sum and substance of the whole consisted in that expressive and appropriate word, "expunge"—that he could by no means consent to part with it; it was the word which he liked, and which the people seemed to like. It had become a very popular word of late, and it expressed fully and completely what was intended to be done; but the form of doing it was of little consequence with him. Whether it was done typically or physically, or by drawing black lines around the obnoxious resolution, or by the legal import, efficacy, and effect, of the word "expunge," was with him a matter of indifference. He looked at the substance, and not the form; and the object aimed at was to purify our journal, by removing from it the obnoxious and unconstitutional resolution of March, 1834, or to place upon its face the mark and stamp of reprobation.

I am, however, sorry, said Mr. N., that those black lines have had so serious an effect on the imaginations of honorable Senators. They seem to have filled their imaginations with all sorts of dark and sombre images, and to have cast so dark a shade, so thick a gloom, over the subject, that they cannot illustrate their ideas in any other way than by reference to those solemn ceremonies, those mournful and sacred rites, which comprise the last duties that man, in this mortal world, performs for his fellow-man. This expunging business, it seems, has at last become a sort of funeral ceremony. Well, sir, if this is so, if this matter has become so solemn and sorrowful, he hoped it might be a monitory and useful lesson to us all, individually and collectively, as a striking and impressive example of the instability and mutations of all things in this world, whether public or private. Sir, this solemn scene, which is now compared to a funeral ceremony, is only the sequel of a scene of quite an opposite character. The proceedings, sir, under the resolution which it is now proposed to expunge, instead of resembling the most solemn and sorrowful of all earthly rites, was of the most joyous character; it was a great national jubilee, which continued from day to day, and week to week, for more than three months.

Expunging Resolution.

The trial and condemnation of the President, the denunciatory speeches, and the whole process of panic-making, was a very animating and ignoble business; there were no black lines then to disturb gentlemen's imaginations, or fill them with gloomy visions; the scene was lively and animated, full of high hopes, and characterized by fierce conflicts of party strife and contention. But now comes the end. How great the change? Those black expunging lines have cast so gloomy a shade over the whole subject, that they can be compared only to the solemn pall. Well, sir, if this last act in this long drama must be compared to a funeral ceremonial, he thought there was no difficulty in assigning to each actor his part. The resolution of March, 1834, which is to be expunged, is the corpse; the black lines to be drawn around it are the pall; and his friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] it is evident from his speech yesterday, was prepared to act as officiating priest, and the gentleman from South Carolina who has just addressed us [Mr. PASTOR] will be associated with him; if we look around this hall, it will not be difficult to discover the relatives and the mourners. The priests have already performed their part, they have praised the dead, and admonished the living; we have heard their fervid invocations, and their rehearsal of the solemn dirge.

Mr. President, we have been told, in the eloquent speech of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PASTOR,] that the resolution before us, and the whole expunging proceeding, is intended to operate against the Senators who voted for the resolution of March, 1834; that it is they who are to be expunged from the Senate; that they are arraigned, put upon their trial, and are to be condemned and offered up as victims to exalt and honor the President. He asserts that he is one of the number, and is prepared for the sacrifice, and calls on the executioners to come forward and strike the deadly blow. Having placed the question in this light, considered himself and his friends as the accused, and voluntarily taken the criminal's seat, it was to have been expected that we should have heard something partaking of the character of a defence. That gentleman appears to have been selected as the counsel of the accused, and, considering his acknowledged ability, he (Mr. N.) had expected an able defence; for one, he had indulged the hope that if he had not been able to make out a complete justification, he would at least have shown such circumstances of extenuation, which, if they did not produce a verdict of acquittal, would at least have induced the triers to have recommended the accused to mercy, or to some mitigation of the severity of the punishment. But in these reasonable expectations he had been disappointed. What sort of a defence have we witnessed? Why, sir, the gentleman, after having voluntarily assumed the criminal's seat, immediately changed the character of an accused to an accuser; he at once becomes the prosecutor, and attempts to defend his own acts, by boldly denouncing the conduct of others. In the first place, he arraigns and brings before the bar of the Senate, for condemnation, a large number of the sovereign States of this Union; all the States, and there was not less than eleven, and he believed more, which have instructed their Senators to vote to expunge the obnoxious resolution of March, 1834, are boldly denounced. His own State was one of the number; a very small and unimportant member of the confederacy, yet jealous of its rights and honor; one of the good old "thirteen" which carried the country safely through the Revolution; "God bless them," if I may be permitted to repeat a declaration, often used, of a distinguished gentleman of Virginia, now no more. The Legislature of his State, by a very large majority, about two thirds, he believed, had passed resolutions condemning the resolution of the Senate of March, 1834, as false in point of fact, unconstitutional, an unwarrantable assumption of power, and dangerous to the liberties of the country. For this act, his State, with others, was arraigned, ridiculed, and condemned. And what is it that these States have done, that they are denounced, and their Legislatures treated as no better than so many caucuses? They have had the independence, and felt it to be a duty, to express an opinion concerning an act of one branch of this Government, and to pronounce it unconstitutional and dangerous. Is a proceeding of this description to be denounced as factious, a mere caucus movement, and that, too, by the great champion of State rights? Is there no example for this measure on the part of the States? Has the Senator forgot that memorable crisis in our political history, when many of the States, following the lead of the "Ancient Dominion," which the Senator has attempted, in an especial measure, to hold up to scorn and contempt, declared an act of Congress to be unconstitutional, and dangerous to the rights of the States and the liberties of the people? In their bold and patriotic course then they were sustained by the people, as they have been and will be now.

The next point in the defence consists in a general denunciation of the people. Mr. N. said he hoped he might be excused for alluding to the people of the States; for notwithstanding, on another occasion, the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PASTOR] seemed to doubt their existence, still he thought that as yet they were not entirely excluded from our political system. They still form an element of political power. He was not surprised at the sneers and the contemptuous manner in which the people and popular opinion had been spoken of; but he was somewhat astonished at the effort to hold up the Legislatures of the States to contempt, coming from the quarter that it did: from a professed advocate of State rights, who seemed to regard all political power as rightfully belonging to the constituted authorities of the States.

The able and eloquent advocate of the accused, still acting as public prosecutor, next arraigns the majority of the Senate. This seems to be an important point in his defence. We are charged with a bold and daring violation of the constitution, and of being ready to imolate, on the shrine of party, the liberties of our country; of humbling and degrading the American Senate at the feet of the Executive, and to bestow the homage of our adoration on the President. Sir, we deny the charge; we repel and throw it back on those from whom it comes. It is not our purpose to exalt the President at the expense of the Senate; it is not our purpose to humble or disgrace the Senate; far from it. Our object is directly the reverse: we seek to remove the disgrace which was cast upon it by a former factious majority; we wish to restore its tarnished honor, to purify its journals, to regain that confidence in the public opinion which it had lost.

It is also said, we are thirsting for the blood of the victims; that we are now demanding judgment and execution against them. But from whom does this demand come? who is it that is praying for execution? Is it the majority here, or is it the States and the people? Do we not faithfully represent their will? Sir, it is the States and the people who have come up here, and are demanding judgment and execution; they have decided this question; they have given in their verdict, and they now demand execution; they demand it in a voice that cannot be misunderstood, nor safely disregarded. But we are told that the expressions of public opinion in support of the expunging process, whether by the Legislatures or the people, have all resulted from party; that it is all the miserable and dirty work of caucuses and party machinery, which have been brought to bear on the question. This is the common slang of those who defy public opinion, or who have become obnoxious to its censures. But if there has been anything of party in this matter, and he was not disposed to deny that there had, from whence did it originate? Did it commence with the expunging resolution? or with the resolution of March, 1834? Sir, what was the obnoxious resolution, and the whole proceeding under it, but the work of party? It was a party measure, and so regarded by all parties and all classes at the time; it was the work of party at a time of great excitement; it was something more than party—it was faction, the very madness of party. And is it to be wondered at that the opposition to a violent party measure should partake, in some degree, of a party character? How could it be otherwise? The original measure was designed to effect political purposes; it was intended to overthrow the administration; to aid the bank in the work of agitation and panic-making. The charge of party comes with an ill grace from the authors of the proceedings of 1834.

What further have we heard in defence of the extraordinary measure of the Senate in 1834; a proceeding considered by a large majority of the people as unconstitutional, irregular, and highly dangerous, and which agitated the country from one extreme to the other; aroused the most violent passions, destroyed credit, and occasioned a general panic? What have we heard in relation to the merits of the resolution of 1834, and in justification of the proceedings of the Senate? He alluded rather to the debate of the last session than the present, as nothing having even the appearance of a justification of those proceedings had been witnessed in this debate. Sir, since the commencement of the discussion of the resolution before us, the principal if not the only ground of defence which had been relied upon, and which had been pressed upon the Senate with so much zeal and such an array of talent, was nothing more than a poor, miserable, contemptible plea in abatement, founded upon a pitiable quibble upon the little word "keep." Surely gentlemen were under great obligations to that little word, as it appeared to be the only thing there was to keep them in countenance. He did not propose an argument in the case, and certainly should not go into one on this question of abatement. It was not suited to the dignity and gravity of the subject, but much more fitting some petty cause before a justice's court. It would compare with a question he had heard before a justice's court in his own State, which was, whether the wife of the defendant could be admitted as a witness; the point was learnedly argued, and the magistrate took time for consideration, and finally decided that she could not be admitted as a witness, yet he would permit her to testify as a circumstance. Pleas in abatement were not favored in courts, and they had much less claims to favor in a deliberative assembly. The Senate has no jurisdiction! This is the defence. But if we have no jurisdiction of this matter, there must be jurisdiction somewhere. There can be no great political question in this country in which there is not a tribunal competent to decide it. If there is no other, there is the tribunal of public opinion; and it is there this question has been considered and decided. The Senator [Mr. PRESTON] seems to admit that the question has been decided, and that all which remains is to enter up judgment and do execution.

But he was sorry to see gentlemen take shelter under this plea in abatement. Why do they not come up to the merits of the case, and put themselves on their country? Guilty, or not guilty: that is the issue. Do they deny the facts charged, or do they justify them? And what is the justification? It was one of the most extraordinary justifications he had ever witnessed. We have heard little of it now; but the two distinguished gentlemen who addressed the Senate last session, with all their zeal, industry, and ability, had not been able to assume any other ground of justification than the very extraordinary one, that the resolution of 1834, and the proceedings under it, meant just nothing at all; that they were totally without meaning, object, or purpose. The resolution, we are told, charges no crime or offence whatever upon the President. It was a mere expression of our opinion, but imparted no censure, and no condemnation of the acts of the President. It was nothing more than a declaration that the President had made a mistake; that the honest old soldier was not so good a constitutional lawyer as some of the great expounders of the constitution in the Senate; he meant well, his motives were good and patriotic, but, with the most honest purposes, he had fallen into error; or, as they say of the King in England, he had been badly advised; his advisers or cabinet had misjudged as to the constitution and the laws. To this very extraordinary justification he would only say, that if the majority of the Senate in 1834 were not in earnest, if they meant nothing by their proceedings, they very much deceived their friends and partisans throughout the country, who really took them to be in earnest. They really thought that the trial of the President, which was going on here for more than three months, meant something; and they were certainly in earnest; no men ever labored with more zeal, industry, and perseverance, than did the bank partisans throughout the country, in the business of agitation and panic-making. With their fears aroused, their passions inflamed, their hopes excited, impelled and hurried on by a general excitement, they became almost frantic, and actually worked like men putting out fire. He thought it a pity that the majority of the Senate had not at the time let their friends know that they were not in earnest; that they did not intend to charge the President with anything wrong. Had they done this, they might have saved to their own partisans, and those of the bank, much time, money, and trouble.

But is this account of the proceedings of 1834 consistent with the conduct of the majority of the Senate at that time? Is it consistent with the speeches made on that occasion, or any part of the proceedings? Was the Senate then told that the President had only fallen into a mistake as to his constitutional powers? Far, very far from it. Sir, the whole debate, the entire proceedings, which occupied the Senate for nearly four months, all rested on the ground that the President was a tyrant, a usurper; that he had trampled under foot the constitution and laws, invaded the rights of Congress, and endangered the liberties of the country. These were the topics which served to exasperate and inflame the public mind to a state bordering on madness. Here it was that the spirit of violence was wrought up to its highest pitch, from whence it was disseminated throughout the country. Here it was that the people were taught to denounce the President as a military despot, a tyrant, and usurper, who, possessing the sword, or the command of the military force, had, by a most lawless and daring act, seized upon the national purse; and, by uniting the two elements of power, was setting the laws at defiance, and trampling in the dust the liberties of the country. This hall was then the great laboratory of agitation and panic-making. Here the country was told, by the very author of the resolution which, it is now said, charged no crime on the President, and really meant nothing at all, "that we are in the midst of a revolution, hitherto bloodless, but rapidly tending towards a total change of the pure republican character of the Government, and the concentration of all power in the hands of one man. The eyes of the American people are anxiously turned towards Congress; they feel that they have been deceived and insulted, their confidence abused, their interests betrayed, and their liberties in danger; they see a rapid and alarming concentration of power in one man's hands; they see that, by the exercise of the positive authority, and his negative power exerted over Congress, the will of one man alone prevails and governs the republic. The question is no longer what laws will Congress pass, but what will the Executive not veto? We already behold the usual incidents of approaching tyranny; the land is filled with spies and impostors, and detraction and denunciations are the orders of the day. People, especially official incumbents in this place, no longer dare to speak in the fearless tones of manly freedom, but in the cautious whispers of trembling slaves. The premonitory symptoms of despotism are upon us; and if Congress do not apply an instantaneous and effective remedy, the fatal collapse will soon come on, and we shall die—ignobly die—base, mean, and abject slaves, the scorn and contempt of mankind, unpitied, unwept, and unmourned."

Such were the dreadful consequences which were to follow from the act of the President which we are now told was nothing more than an error or mistake as to his constitutional powers. Sir, the speech I have referred to, and all the speeches in support of the resolution of March, 1834, treated the removal of the deposits as a lawless outrage, a daring invasion of the rights and liberties of the people. Then the impeachment resolution was not spoken of as a mere expression of opinion, but gentlemen boasted that the President had been arraigned, tried, and found guilty. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] need not be reminded of his having publicly declared, in the city of the bank, that "Jackson had been arraigned, found guilty, and condemned. He, like the Legislature, has appealed to the country; and, fellow-citizens, you are the country. In you be the verdict, whether the issue of the contest be despotism or a free Government." How does this language compare with what we now hear. The Senator now says that the resolution of 1834 did no harm; that it amounted to nothing, and was a mere expression of an opinion; and asks for the reasons why it shall be expunged. Sir, that resolution is a sentence of condemnation against the President, false in point of fact, irregular in point of form, and in open violation of the constitution. Does it not charge the President with criminal conduct? It asserts that his acts were in violation of the constitution and laws, or in derogation of them, which is the same thing. And is it not a high misdemeanor, and a crime, for the Chief Executive Magistrate to violate the constitution and laws of his country? Is it not a gross abuse of his official trust? And are we to be told that no bad motive is charged in the resolution? This cannot alter the case. We are to look at the substance of the charge, and not the form. Does not the charge against any person, and especially the Chief Executive, of violating the constitution and laws, import a criminal purpose? What was it but an alleged violation of the constitution and laws on the part of the Executive of that country, which led to a civil war in England? What was it but a violation of the constitution and laws which led our patriotic ancestors to resist the inroads of power in '76? Sir, there can be no higher crime charged upon the Executive of any country, than the violation of the constitution and laws.

But it is said, that if this resolution can be expunged, any part or the whole of the journal may be expunged, and that the expunging process may be extended to the records of the Supreme Court. There may be other reasons to justify the expunction of this resolution, but I place it on the ground that the proceeding was not only irregular and unconstitutional, but altogether beyond the jurisdiction of the Senate, and totally void; and the record no better than an interpolation upon our journals.

It is, however, asked, where is the necessity and what is the object of expunging the resolution of 1834? I can answer this for myself, and for myself only; other gentlemen may have different reasons, but there are two which are sufficient for me. The first is, that it is due as an act of simple justice to the party injured, who has been arraigned, tried, and condemned, unheard, and in violation of all the forms of the constitution, and the established rules of judicial proceedings. I know it is asserted that the whole purpose is to exalt still higher the name and fame of the President, to enable him to triumph over a humbled and degraded Senate, and to make him an object of almost divine adoration. Sir, this is not my purpose; I believe it is not the purpose of any one; so far as the President was regarded at all in this matter, we seek only to do him justice, the same justice, and no more, which the humblest individual in the country would be entitled to at our hands. If a sentence of condemnation has been recorded against him, false in point of facts, and illegal and unconstitutional in point of principle, does not justice require that it should be removed? Are not the rights of the Chief Magistrate as dear to us, and as much entitled to protection, as those of a private citizen? Sir, if the President was as bad as he has been represented to be, by imbibed partisans—which we all know is bad enough—if he was as great a tyrant as he has been charged with being, if he was another Cæsar, or Cromwell, a military chieftain, hostile to the principles of free government, and prepared to trample into the dust the liberties of his country, still he would be entitled to justice; and if a sentence had been falsely and illegally recorded against him, it ought not to be permitted to stand. Sir, gentlemen are altogether mistaken when they assert that this proceeding is designed to honor the President; it is only intended to do him justice.

But there is another, and, in my mind, a very strong and cogent reason, why the obnoxious resolution of 1834 ought to be expunged. It is a dangerous example, and, if suffered to stand, to acquire the character of a precedent, might unsettle and derange our whole political system. It has a direct and unavoidable tendency to array and bring into conflict one independent and co-ordinate branch of the Government with another independent and co-ordinate department. If one independent branch of the Government can, in a way not known to the constitution, accuse, try, and condemn, another independent branch, does it not tend to bring on a conflict between them? Each will have his friends and partisans, the people will take sides, and the whole population become involved in the controversy. If the Senate can, by its direct action, examine into and condemn the conduct of the Executive, and promulgate sentence against him, it can do the same in regard to the House of Representatives, or the Supreme Court. The President is as independent, and as distinctly a co-ordinate branch of the Government, as is the Judiciary. If the Senate can by resolution try and condemn the President for any executive act or measure, the President may, by proclamation or otherwise, pass sentence of condemnation against the Senate, or House of Representatives, or the Supreme Court. Sir, this doctrine will not do; it is not the doctrine of the constitution; one independent department of the Government cannot inquire into and pass sentence of condemnation against the acts of another independent department, except so far as the constitution has allowed it to be done, and according to its forms. This example, if permitted to stand, will be a dangerous breach in the constitution. A distinguished political writer in England, (Lord Bolingbroke,) in speaking of the constitution of that country, says: "We understand our constitution to be in danger, not only when it is attacked, but as soon as a breach is made by which it may be attacked; and we understand this danger to be greater or less, in proportion to the breach that is made, without regard to the probability or improbability of an attack."

But to show the danger of these conflicts between the different departments of the Government, he would refer to the history of that country from whence our ancestors came, and brought with them the great principles of our free institutions. If we look into the long controversy which preceded the civil war, it will be found to have sprung from the very principle contained in the resolution of 1834: the right of one independent branch of the Government to try and condemn the acts of another. He would beg leave to refer the Senate to Whitlocke, who was an actor in those scenes, a member of Parliament, he believed an officer of the army, and a chronicler of the events of his own times. He says, "it is strange to note how we have insensibly slid into the beginning of this civil war, by one unexpected incident after another, as waves of the sea, which have brought us this far, we hardly know how; but from paper combats, by declarations, remonstrances, protests, votes, messages, answers, and replies, we are now come to the question of raising forces, and naming a general and officers of an army." We are here told, by an actor in those bloody scenes, that it was a paper warfare, carried on between the Parliament and the Executive, which involved that country in all the horrors of a civil war; which armed father against son, and brother against brother; which depopulated its towns, desolated its fair fields, and stained their soil with the blood of Englishmen. These lessons of history, written in characters of blood, should not be lost on a free and intelligent people. It was, in his opinion, not more on the account of the injustice, flagrant as that was considered, than the dangerous tendency of the proceedings of 1834, which has roused up the spirit of the country against them. It is the danger of such a precedent, rather than its unconstitutional character, which has brought upon the resolution in question so marked a reprobation. On a recent occasion he attempted to assign the reasons which had attached, for nearly half a century, a high degree of opprobrium to the sedition law; and asserted that the reprobation of that act did not arise so much from its being regarded as unconstitutional, as from its dangerous character, and its being considered as a deadly blow aimed at public opinion, the essential element of our Government. It is the same with respect to the resolution of March, 1834. The people have regarded it as dangerous and pernicious; they have regarded the whole proceeding of the Senate as factious and violent, fraught with mischief and danger to our institutions, calculated to lead to commotion and recrimination between the different departments of the Government, which may result, as was the case in England, in rancorous dissensions, and even in civil war. Under the influence of sentiments like these, they were not content that the dangerous precedent should remain upon your records, and now demand at our hands that it shall be removed or expunged.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] has informed us that those of us who may vote for this resolution will have a fair chance for immortality; that our names would be as imperishable as the black lines, and seems to insinuate that both are destined to be damned to everlasting fame. But if there is any immortality connected with this matter, I am sure the gentleman and his friends will come in for a full share, and something more. They will, indeed, be double sharers in the harvest of immortal fame, for the proceedings on the resolution of 1834 are destined to the same immortality as those on the resolution now before the Senate. In those proceedings, too, the field was vastly more ample, and all will be entitled to come in for some share in the glory and fame which is to be borne down the tide of time to the latest posterity. Even the vast host of witnesses who came up here in the form of petitioners, to testify against the President and for the bank, will share in the immortality, as I believe their testimony was all published with their names, making five large volumes. Here, sir, is a golden harvest of fame for the partisans of the bank, who either volunteered as witnesses, or promptly came forward at the request of their honorable friends in the Senate.

And in regard to this proceeding, he did not see but that those who oppose the resolution would have the same chance for immortality as those who support it; the nays will be recorded on the same page with the yeas, and both go down along with the black lines to posterity. All will have an equal chance of immortality from this day's work; but whether it will be of honor or dishonor, and to which of us one or the other, remains to be known. As was said by a popular writer, Judas is as well known as Paul, but history ascribes his fame to very different actions. Having discharged what we believe to be our duty, the whole subject, the black lines and all, will be handed over to those who are to succeed us, and it will remain for posterity to decide who is right and who is wrong, and to award to each and all their share of the honor or infamy which belongs to the transaction. He was content with this; he rejoiced that it should be so; he rejoiced that the deeds of this day, that the merits of this long and painful controversy, will have to be decided upon by posterity, when all the angry passions which it has engendered will have subsided, when it can be viewed calmly and dispassionately, when the judgment will be free from personal prejudice or party rancor, and when the transaction can be viewed with a single eye to the great principles involved. The decision thus made will be final; from it there will be no appeal, and all must acquiesce.

Although he could not view the present proceeding in so solemn a light as some gentlemen seemed to regard it, he thought he was fully sensible of its importance, and of the responsibility which belongs to it. He had considered the matter long and well, and, so far as concerned himself, he was prepared to assume the responsibility. He could not doubt the power of the Senate to purify its journal, by removing from its pages a resolution which ought never to have been entered there; and, believing that we have the power, he considered it our duty to exercise it. Not being willing (said Mr. N.) to detain the Senate longer, I will say, in conclusion, that, with these views of the whole subject, I am prepared to stake what little of reputation I have, either here or elsewhere, on the final issue of the question before us. I am prepared to record my vote in favor of this resolution, and to permit it to go down along with the black lines to posterity, and abide their impartial judgment. I am prepared to vote to purify our journal, to erase, obliterate, blot out, or expunge, the obnoxious resolution—any way, to remove it from our records. Nay, more: had I, like the prophet of old, the gift of divination, I would raise my voice on high, and devoutly invoke that Being in whose hands are the destinies of nations, who is the searcher of all hearts, and in whose presence we all stand, to send fire from heaven and consume the desecrated page.

Mr. MOORE said that the appropriate suggestion with which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] had closed his speech, brought to his mind a very important and useful amendment, the propriety of which he had no doubt would be evident and obvious to that Senator, and he would beg leave to recommend its adoption to the friends of this black-line resolution, viz: that this record of the Senate's proceedings, made and preserved by the requirements of the constitution, shall be destroyed by fire to be extracted from heaven by means of a sun-glass. For this he believed they might plead something like a precedent from the General Assembly of Georgia. He thought this would complete the farce.

Mr. SOUTHARD having expressed a wish to speak on this subject at a proper time, and when the minds of Senators were not exhausted, moved that the Senate do now adjourn. Negatived, by yeas 20, nays 21; the yeas and nays having been ordered on the call of Mr. BRYTON.

Mr. SOUTHARD then declined speaking at so late an hour.

Mr. MOORE moved and urged an adjournment, that proper opportunity might be given for further debate. Negatived: Yeas 20, nays 22.

Mr. CALHOUN then rose and addressed the Senate nearly as follows:

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] says that the argument in favor of this expunging resolution has not been answered. Sir, there are some questions so plain that they cannot be argued. Nothing can make them more plain; and this is one. No one, not blinded by party zeal, can possibly be insensible that the measure proposed is a violation of the constitution. The constitution requires the Senate to keep a journal; this resolution goes to expunge the journal. If you may expunge a part, you may expunge the whole; and if it is expunged, how is it kept? The constitution says the journal shall be kept; this resolution says it shall be destroyed. It does the very thing which the constitution declares shall not be done. That is the argument, the whole argument. There is none other. Talk of precedents? and precedents drawn from a foreign country? They don't apply. No, sir. This is to be done, not in consequence of argument, but in spite of argument. I understand the case. I know perfectly well the gentlemen have no liberty to vote otherwise. They are coerced by an exterior power. They try, indeed, to comfort their conscience by saying that it is the will of the people, and the voice of the people. It is no such thing. We all know how these legislative returns have been obtained. It is by dictation from the White House. The President himself, with that vast mass of patronage which he wields, and the thousand expectations he is able to hold up, has obtained these votes of the State Legislatures; and this, forsooth, is said to be the voice of the people. The voice of the people! Sir, can we forget the scene which was exhibited in this chamber when that expunging resolution was first introduced here? Have we forgotten the universal giving way of conscience, so that the Senator from Missouri was left alone? I see before me Senators who could not swallow that resolution; and has its nature changed since then? Is it any more constitutional now than it was then? Not at all. But executive power has interposed. Talk to me of the voice of the people! No, sir. It is the combination of patronage and power to coerce this body into a gross and palpable violation of the constitution. Some individuals, I perceive, think to escape through the particular form in which this act is to be perpetrated. They tell us that the resolution on your records is not to be expunged, but is only to be endorsed "Expunged." Really, sir, I do not know how to argue against such contemptible sophistry. The occasion is too solemn for an argument of this sort. You are going to violate the constitution, and you get rid of the infamy by a falsehood. You yourselves say that the resolution is expunged by your order. Yet you say it is not expunged. You put your act in express words. You record it, and then turn round and deny it.

But what is the motive? What is the pretext for this enormity? Why, gentlemen tell us the Senate has two distinct consciences—a legislative conscience, and a judicial conscience. As a legislative body we have decided that the President has violated the constitution. But gentlemen tell us that this is an impeachable offence; and, as we may be called to try it in our judicial capacity, we have no right to express the opinion. I need not show how inconsistent such a position is with the eternal, inprescriptible right of freedom of speech, and how utterly inconsistent it is with precedents drawn from the history of our British ancestors, where the same liberty of speech has for centuries been enjoyed. There is a shorter and more direct argument in reply. Gentlemen who take that position cannot, according to their own showing, vote for this resolution; for if it is unconstitutional for us to record a resolution of condemnation, because we may afterwards be called to try the case in a judicial capacity, then it is equally unconstitutional for us to record a resolution of acquittal. If it is unconstitutional for the Senate to declare before a trial that the President has violated the constitution, it is equally unconstitutional to declare before a trial that he has not violated the constitution. The same principle is involved in both. Yet, in the very face of this principle, gentlemen are here going to condemn their own act.

But why do I waste my breath? I know it is all utterly vain. The day is gone; night approaches, and night is suitable to the dark deed we meditate. There is a sort of destiny in this thing. The act must be performed; and it is an act which will tell on the political history of this country forever. Other preceding violations of the constitution (and they have been many and great) filled my bosom with indignation, but this fills it only with grief. Others were done in the heat of party. Power was, as it were, compelled to support itself by seizing upon new instruments of influence and patronage; and there were ambitious and able men to direct the process. Such was the removal of the deposits, which the President seized upon by a new and unprecedented act of arbitrary power; an act which gave him ample means of rewarding friends and punishing enemies. Something may, perhaps, be pardoned to him in this matter, on the old apology of tyrants—the plea of necessity. But here there can be no such apology. Here no necessity can so much as be pretended. This act originates in pure, unmixed, personal idolatry. It is the melancholy evidence of a broken spirit, ready to bow at the feet of power. The former act was such a one as might have been perpetrated in the days of Pompey or Cæsar; but an act like this could never have been consummated by a Roman Senate until the times of Caligula and Nero.

Mr. CLAY inquired whether the question involved both the preamble and the resolution.

The CHAIR said it embraced the whole subject-matter. Mr. CLAY having enumerated some of the topics on which he had designed to speak, relating to this resolution, gave way to

Mr. MOORE, who again moved an adjournment: Ayes 22, noes not counted.

So the Senate adjourned.

NATIONAL BANK IN NEW YORK.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from the board of trade in the city of New York, praying the creation of a national bank, to be located in that city.

Mr. T. said he presented this memorial at the request of the committee deputed by the board of trade to convey it to Washington. The memorialists stated that in consequence of the derangement existing in the currency and exchanges of the country, it was important that a national bank should be created by Congress. They entertained the opinion that that was the only remedy for the evils growing out of that state of things. They prayed that Congress would create such an institution, according to the plan set forth by the President of the United States in his message of 1832. Whilst he (Mr. T.) bore testimony to the high character of the gentlemen composing the board of trade, and who had sent the memorial here, he felt it due to himself to say that he did not concur in the views of the memorialists on the subject. His views had been often expressed, here and elsewhere, so that it was unnecessary that he should say any thing on the subject.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance.

TEXAS.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. DAVIS, calling on the President of the United States for copies of any correspondence which may have passed between him and General Santa Anna, or any other of the authorities of Mexico, in relation to the independence of Texas, being under consideration—

Mr. GRUNDY suggested the propriety, under existing circumstances, of letting it lie for a few days, unless the honorable mover had some special reason for urging its immediate adoption.

Mr. DAVIS remarked, that as General Santa Anna was said to be now on his way to this city, with some purpose relating to the independence of Texas, it was to be presumed that some communications on the subject had passed between him, or other authorities of Mexico, and the President. It was desirable that such correspondence, if any had taken place, should be seasonably in the possession of the Senate, but he was willing to let the resolution lie till Monday; and it was accordingly laid on the table.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill prohibiting sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers and in limited quantities, as amended by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER said, the great principle contained in the bill now under consideration was to arrest monopolies of the public lands, and limit the sales to settlers or cultivators. The adoption of this measure would have a material influence upon the revenue of the Government and the prosperity of the country. Before investigating the details of the bill, it would be proper to examine the preliminary question, whether the great principle upon which the bill reposes is such as to recommend it to the favorable consideration of the American Senate. So long as Congress offers for sale hundreds of millions of acres of land, with no limitation upon the extent of the purchase, vast quantities of these lands must pass into the hands of a few capitalists, thus authorized and invited by the Government to make the purchase; and when these capitalists confined their operations to the acquisition of lands unoccupied by any settler, it was clearly erroneous to denounce such speculations during the continuance of the existing system. It was the system that was wrong; and so long as it was continued, any denunciation of those who purchased large bodies of the unoccupied public lands was worse than ridiculous. Such purchases had been made, and would continue to be made, by many respectable citizens, in accordance with the invitation of the Government; and any denunciation of such purchasers would only react upon the Congress which adopted the existing system, as well as every succeeding Congress which refuses its repeal or modification. But the question recurs, does this system best promote the prosperity of the American people? and shall we continue to invite and encourage the monopoly of the public lands by a few individuals, or so amend the existing system as to sell the public lands only in limited quantities, sufficient for farms or plantations, and thus reserve for these great and useful purposes this noble public domain? Whether these lands shall thus be reserved for sale only for settlement or cultivation, or whether they shall be permitted to pass into the hands of a few individuals, by townships, counties, and even entire States, in a single year, is the true question which we must determine.

The evils of the existing system were only fully developed during the past year and that which preceded it. By the returns from the Land Office, the sales, exclusive of those at Pontotoc, Mississippi, during the first three quarters of the past year, amounted to $20,063,430, and the number of acres sold to 15,934,430. Thus, upon the same ratio, the sales of the year 1836 amounted to twenty millions of acres, and upwards of twenty-five millions of dollars; and, including the sales at Pontotoc, to more than twenty-one millions of acres, and more than twenty-seven millions of dollars. In a single year, thus, a portion of the public domain has been sold, nearly equal in superficial extent to the great State of Ohio, and exceeding the superficies of five New England States, containing more than two millions of people. In this manner, entire States are swept in a single year into the hands of speculators, who may thus exercise a greater control over the destiny of these States, for half a century to come, than the national and State Legislatures combined. Can any system be devised more destructive of equal rights and republican principles? In vain shall we have struck down the feudal system, with its accompanying relation of lord and vassal, if we create and continue here this worse than feudal vassalage, this system of American landlords, engrossing millions of acres, and regulating the terms of sale or settlement. In vain shall we have abolished the system of primogeniture and entailments, as calculated to create landed monopolies, if we sustain the existing policy, by which a few capitalists may engross in a single year the ownership of States, and control the destiny of millions. An extent of territory equal to five States passing in a single year into the hands of speculators! must not this create here a landed aristocracy, without the title, but more wealthy and powerful than the sinking nobility of England? It will establish a fourth estate, more controlling than the legislative, executive, and judicial power. It will control agriculture and its products, by regulating the price of landed property. It will certainly introduce into the new States the system of landlord and tenant, by which the occupant will not be the owner of the soil he cultivates, but the tributary of some absentee landlord, who will, in the shape of an annual rent, reap nearly all the profits of the labor of the cultivator. It will establish a relation of abject dependence on the one hand, and tyrannical power on the other. It will impoverish the many, and enrich the few. It will create a war of capital against labor, of the producer against the non-producer, of the cultivator against the speculator; a war in which this Government will be arrayed on the side of the speculator, enlarging his dominion, increasing his power, until, in a few years more, he will acquire a complete monopoly, and maintain an undisputed empire, throughout the valley of the West.

There can be no greater injury to any country than the monopoly of its lands by a few individuals; thus keeping those lands out of the hands of settlers and cultivators, and condemning vast regions of fertile lands to remain for years waste and uncultivated. The West, for many years, has been endeavoring to obtain from Congress a reduction of the price of the public lands; but the continuation of the existing system is worse than a refusal to reduce the price; it is equivalent to a law raising the price to settlers and cultivators from one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to a price varying from five to thirty dollars per acre. It is well known that, within the last few years, vast bodies of public lands have been purchased by speculators at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and resold to settlers or cultivators at prices varying from five to thirty dollars per acre. And what must soon be the inevitable result of continuing the existing system? At the rate of twenty-one millions of acres per annum, speculators in a very few years must own nearly every acre of good land in the present new States and organized Territories of the Union. When this monopoly shall be complete, and no good land remains the property of the Government, will not a still higher price be demanded for those lands by those who hold them? If we abolish the system of sales to speculators, these millions of acres of good land, now owned by the Government, will pass, from time to time, at the minimum price, into the hands of settlers or cultivators, which otherwise would be purchased by speculators, and resold by them at from five to thirty dollars per acre. Every Senator who votes against this bill votes for continuing a system by which this vast enhancement to settlers and cultivators, of the price of the public lands, must soon take place. There can be no greater curse to any country, no more serious impediment to its prosperity, than the high price of its unoccupied lands. It prevents or postpones the settlement of those lands, and decreases the wealth, products, and population, of a State. It is equivalent to a decree of man, condemning to remain waste and uncultivated vast regions created by nature inexhaustibly fertile, and inviting the hand of improvement. What Senator from any new State has not seen whole townships of land remaining in the hands of speculators, waste and unoccupied, where otherwise purchases by settlers or cultivators would have been made at the minimum price of the Government, and where would now be smiling farms and prosperous villages.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] tells us that, under the present system, the new States have grown and prospered. No, sir; it was before the present system of speculation had seized the public mind, and when settlers and cultivators purchased the public lands at the minimum price per acre. But will it be contended that a State will flourish more by enabling speculators to sell to settlers and cultivators, at from five to thirty dollars per acre, those very lands which otherwise they would obtain at a dollar and a quarter per acre? The facts in our past history are against the argument of the Senator from Kentucky. The average sales of the public lands from 1796 to 1830 amounted to less than one million of acres per annum. Sales must, therefore, then have been made almost exclusively to settlers and cultivators by the Government, at the minimum price, when the West increased so rapidly. But what is the case now? Why, more than four fifths of the sales are made to speculators. Thus we have seen the sales of the year 1836, including those at Pontotoc, amounting to more than - 21,000,000 acres.
And the sales of 1835 - 13,000,000
Do. 1834 - 4,658,000

Total of sales of 1834, 1835, and 1836 -	38,658,000
Total of sales from 1796 to 1824 -	32,843,019

Thus it is proved that the sales of the last three years exceed, by nearly six millions of acres, the entire sales for nearly forty years preceding. The system of sales, then, at the minimum price, by the Government, to settlers or cultivators, was, in fact, the system under which the new States grew and prospered; but let any new State realize what will soon be the situation of all of them under the existing sales, when every acre of unoccupied good land within their limits will be in the hands of speculators, and not an acre to be obtained at the Government price; and can they continue, as heretofore, to increase and prosper? He who thinks so must believe that a State will flourish more rapidly by enhancing to settlers and cultivators the price of its unoccupied lands; and he who thinks so should oppose the reduction of the price of the public lands. The reduction to settlers of the price of the public lands is certainly an important measure to the new States, and one which (Mr. W. said) he yet hoped to see adopted. But this reduction of the price of refuse land, on an average, of twenty-five cents per acre, is by no means so important to the new States as the passage of this bill. If the maximum required for settlement and cultivation annually be five millions of acres, which under this bill would be sold for these purposes at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, but, by the continuance of the existing system, sold by speculators to settlers at an average profit of five dollars per acre, there would, by this bill, be saved annually to the settlers and cultivators of the new States twenty-five millions of dollars in the price of their lands. But admitting that of these refuse lands, long in market, proposed to be reduced, on an average, twenty-five cents per acre, a million of acres were purchased annually for settlement and cultivation, there would be saved annually to the settlers of the new States, in the price of their lands, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; being less, by upwards of twenty-four millions annually, than is saved to the settlers of the new States by the adoption of this measure. If it were proposed at once, by an act of Congress, to transfer the whole public domain to speculators, at the minimum price per acre, what Senator from any new State would not at once object to it? Would we not all say it would be equivalent to raising to settlers the price of these lands, on an average, five dollars per acre? And yet, can we close our eyes to the fact that, by continuing the present system for a few years, the same consequences must follow, when, could we even obtain from Congress a reduction of the price of the public lands, there will remain none worth purchasing upon which the reduction could operate? Continue this system a few years, and the land offices of the United States will be abolished for all practical purposes, and offices opened in their place by speculating companies. Already has this been done in at least one of the new States, and half a million of acres advertised for sale by a single company, at prices varying from two to thirty dollars per acre. Another company is progressing with its entries, with a capital of six millions of dollars; and this, with other similar associations now formed and forming, and individual capitalists embarked in these operations, will monopolize the public domain, leaving, in a very short time, not an acre worth cultivating, to be purchased at the Government price per acre. We do not yet feel fully all the evils of the system, because in most of the new States the Government still has considerable bodies of good land for sale at the minimum price, and competes with the speculator in the market; but when this ceases, as it soon will under the present system, and every acre of good unoccupied land is in the hands of speculators, and the monopoly complete, who can foretell the high price that will be demanded? The proposition seems almost too clear for argument, that the monopoly of the lands of a State by a few individuals must deeply injure its prosperity. The Territories of the Union will suffer most by continuing this system, and Florida, Iowa, and Wisconsin, re tained much longer in territorial pupilage. The spirit of speculation will sweep over them, like the hurricane of the tropics, subverting all within the range of its wild and desolating career. These Territories will, in fact, so far as regards the public domain, cease to be the Territories of the United States, and become the Territories of speculators, owning their soil, controlling their destiny for half a century, and postponing their admission as States of the Union. To the truly wise and patriotic American, there can be no spectacle more truly sublime than the admission of new States of the Union—to behold another region reclaimed from solitude, and added to liberty and civilization; another country emerging from territorial pupilage, and assuming the attitude of one of the States of the American Union. Pass this bill, and in a few years more Iowa and Wisconsin, containing the mountain streams and fountains of the great Mississippi, will, together with Florida, send their Senators here to co-operate with us in advancing the prosperity of our common country. These Territories are unrepresented on this floor; and should we not all feel disposed to legislate for them in a spirit of parental kindness, and, above all, save them from the grasp of speculating monopolists? This bill embraces within its munificent provision the whole Union and all its parts. It reserves our noble public domain as a precious inheritance for the whole American people, to be purchased only by settlers or cultivators, from the Government, at the minimum price. It encourages agriculture, that mother of freemen, that nurse of virtue, liberty, and independence—that truly useful and virtuous vocation, heretofore depressed by exorbitant tariffs. It will enable every American citizen to obtain a farm at a reasonable price from a paternal Government, for more than half a century to come. It reserves for the noblest purposes, as the inheritance of the whole people of this Union, what, under the existing system, will soon be the property of a few speculating monopolists.

There is another method in which the existing system retards the prosperity of the new States. Of the twenty-seven millions of dollars paid this past year for public lands, at least fifteen millions are paid by the people of the new States, and at least ten millions of this for purchases for speculation. Thus is ten millions taken in a single year from the people of the new States, for investment in wild lands, remaining a dead capital, and withdrawn from investment in farms, or buildings, or railroads, or some of the useful branches of productive industry; and thus injuriously affecting the business and prosperity of the new States. Nor is it only the new States in which this evil is experienced. No; the old States are perhaps the greatest sufferers. Exclusive of the entries made for cultivation or settlement upon the ratio of the present year, we have seen that upwards of ten millions annually from the old States will be withdrawn for the purchase of wild lands for speculation. This is a process equally injurious to the old and to the new States. To the new States, we have seen that it is equivalent to a law advancing the price of the public lands to settlers and cultivators, for the benefit of speculators, at least five dollars per acre. To the old States, it is a withdrawal of ten millions annually from the channels of productive industry, for investment in wild lands, thus doomed to remain for years waste and uncultivated. Who can deny that ten millions taken annually from commerce, agriculture, manufactures, and public improvements, in the old States, must prove deeply injurious to those communities? Under the existing system, capitalists, great and small, and borrowers from banks, will send from the old States millions of money annually for land speculations, which they would otherwise invest in some useful business, or in some public improvements at home; but these investments will be not made, yielding only an annual profit of five or ten per cent., when five hundred per cent. can be made in a series of years, at a single operation, by purchases of wild lands. Many of these capitalists purchased these lands as a permanent investment, intending to withhold them from sale for periods ranging from five to twenty years, calculating that the continued advance would be more than equivalent to the ordinary interest of money or profits of business. In the mean time, during this long interval, this ten millions annually might as well be sunk in the ocean. There is thus opened a golden stream from the East to the West, which, whilst it drains the East of millions of capital, condemns to a period of long sterility vast portion of the beautiful valley of the West, containing a soil inexhaustibly fertile, but remaining in the hands of speculators barren and unproductive. From the old and the new States combined, we have seen that there was this year withdrawn more than twenty millions of dollars, for investment in lands for speculation. For the present, this twenty millions might as well be annihilated; and if the system is continued, great indeed will be the distress and embarrassment of the whole country. Indeed, to this cause, more than all others combined, must be attributed any existing difficulties in the money market. No one at all versed in the principles of political economy can for a moment doubt that twenty millions taken annually from commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, must embarrass the business of any nation. These results of this system (Mr. W. said) he clearly foresaw and predicted at the last session of Congress. Mr. W. here read the following extract from the report made by him at the last session, from the select committee in favor of the bill confining the sales of public lands to settlers or cultivators:

“Until within a few years past the sales were made almost exclusively for settlement, but now the reverse is the fact. The sales within the last year have amounted to nearly thirteen millions of acres, being almost three times the amount sold in any preceding year. Eight millions of acres of these sales have probably been made for speculation, and not for settlement. This spirit of speculation in the public lands is increasing with alarming rapidity. Companies are forming in all directions to monopolize the ownership of the public domain, and thus be enabled to arrest the settlement and regulate the prosperity of the new States and Territories of the Union. A total and complete monopoly of the public lands by speculators is now contemplated, and the consequent withdrawal from the Government of all its power over this subject. This system will be deeply injurious to the interest of the old as well as of the new States. Vast sums will be taken from investment in the channels of productive industry in the old States, and invested in purchases of uncultivated lands. It is a bounty offered by Government for the annual withdrawal of capital from the useful pursuits of productive industry, for investment in waste lands, producing nothing, and, consequently, adding nothing to the general prosperity of the country. Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, are all injuriously affected by this process. For a great period of time, the moneys thus invested might as well be sunk in the ocean. Agriculture is not benefited, for settlement is retarded, and not advanced, by this system. Commerce and manufactures are injured by the annual sinking of so much of the active capital of the country. The vast sums thus invested during the present year have certainly greatly contributed to create the existing embarrassments, and, as the evil progresses, the embarrassments will be increased and aggravated. It is, then, the interest of the old as well as the new States to arrest this annual investment of millions in unproductive pursuits. Were it arrested, these millions of dead capital would be adding yearly to the commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, of the whole country. When money is invested, even from the old States, in lands for settlement and cultivation only, in the new States, the annual products of the soil increase the wealth and prosperity of the whole country, and soon give back to the old States, through the channels of trade and business, more than the amount of the purchase-money of the land. But if the citizens of a nation appropriate millions annually in the purchase of property yielding no income, the result is a great national loss. It is, then, the interest of the whole Union that those monopolies of the public lands should be arrested, and that capital should continually flow in the various channels of productive industry. If, among other causes, the existing embarrassments are now greatly attributable to the speculating investment of millions, during the past year, in wild lands, what will be the result if the system is permitted to continue for a series of years unabated? It is easy to foresee that the necessary consequence will be, increasing distress and embarrassment, or at least a diminution of the national prosperity."

Mr. W. asked, had not the predictions contained in this report been fully realized, and would it not have been well for the community if the bill then proposed by this committee for arresting these speculations had been adopted by Congress? And if we continue the existing system, will not these evils continue to augment from year to year, till the whole public domain, which is of any value, shall be swept within the vortex of speculating monopoly? Continue the existing system but a few years more, and the nation will awake, as it were, from a trance, and find itself despoiled, by speculators, of every acre of good land east of the river Mississippi. Nor will it stop there. No; it will roll on, it is rolling on, over the regions of the far West, reaching from the Ohio to the Missouri, and from near the sources of the great Mississippi to its outlet in the Gulf. In a few years more, and speculators will command an empire, and parcel it out at their pleasure; and yet we refuse to interpose, nay, we sustain and encourage this system, by which whole States and Territories will be placed beneath the degrading control of a few speculating monopolists. National interest and national honor alike prompt us to interpose. And what restrains us? Sir, it is the surplus, the fatal surplus spirit, that pushes onward this Government to the very verge of the precipice. It is this spirit which dares to demand from the people more revenue than is required for the wants of the Government; it is this spirit which must be gratified, and would soon sell, if it could, not only the land, but the people of the new States, for unnecessary revenue. But, God be thanked, this spirit has been rebuked by the people, and their decree has been proclaimed, that no more money shall be collected from them than is required for the wants of the Government, administered in a spirit of republican economy, and within the strict limits of the constitution. This principle is becoming fundamental, and must be carried into full and practical effect.

If you will not bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government, by confining to settlers or cultivators the sales of the public lands, reduce! reduce! repeal! repeal the tariff! will be the voice that will be echoed by the people through these walls. Already this voice is breaking upon us, and within the hall of the House of Representatives, demanding that the revenue from the tariff be reduced more than six millions of dollars. Has the manufacturing interest no eyes to see the difficulties which surround it? has it no ears to hear the voice of the people, demanding more and more loudly the reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government? If the manufacturing interest now unites itself with the surplus party, it will be swept before the torrent of public sentiment. A surplus tariff coalition can never resist the mandate of the people's will. The tariff and surplus coalition will be more odious than any which have preceded it; it will be the union of sin and death; and both, both will be driven out together from the halls of Congress. Let me tell the manufacturing interest, in the spirit of truth and candor, that to them a union with the surplus party will be the embrace of death. By the surplus party I mean not those who voted to deposit with the States an already accumulated surplus, but I mean the party that wishes to legislate, or refuse to legislate, for the purpose of creating a surplus. Last year that party had perhaps an uncertain majority, or nearly a majority, in this chamber. Where is that majority now? Gone, swept away by the majesty of the people's will; and the anti-surplus, anti-distribution party now constitute a great majority in both Houses of Congress, and have carried the President elect. If, then, the manufacturing interest leans for support upon the surplus party, it will lean upon a small and decreasing minority. Sir, (said Mr. W.,) I do not wish to renew the scenes of 1832; I never again wish to behold the very fabric of this Government rocking upon its foundation, when every patriot heart throbbed with apprehension, and each tyrant's bosom bounded with the exulting hope that this Union—freedom's, the world's last hope—was blotted from the scroll of nations. Never, therefore, without necessity, never in a wanton, reckless spirit, would I disturb the main provisions of the compromise act of March, 1833. But there is one great constitutional principle too sacred to be yielded to any compromise, and that is this: the revenue must be reduced to the wants of the Government; for, if not so reduced, the Government will be subverted or changed into a central despotism, collecting millions upon millions of unnecessary revenue, for a distribution unknown to the framers of the constitution. If, then, the revenue can be reduced to the wants of the Government by this bill, blind indeed must be the manufacturing interest to its true policy if it oppose this salutary measure. The necessary reduction cannot be accomplished except by such a measure as this. The revenue this year from customs is $19,391,310. Estimating the revenue from this source hereafter, by the decreasing scale of the act of March, 1833, as it now stands, and the increased importations, augmenting with our increasing wealth and population, and the maximum would be as follows:

1839,	-	-	-	17,000,000
1840,	-	-	-	16,500,000
1841,	-	-	-	16,000,000
1842,	-	-	-	15,000,000

Now, add to this the twenty-five millions received annually for lands, upon the basis of the receipts of this year, and the maximum result of the aggregate revenue from lands and customs would be as follows:

1837,	-	-	-	$43,000,000
1838,	-	-	-	42,500,000
1839,	-	-	-	42,000,000
1840,	-	-	-	41,500,000
1841,	-	-	-	41,000,000
1842,	-	-	-	40,000,000

The above calculation would present an excess, in six years, of ten millions above an annual revenue of forty millions, and, including our bank stock, a total excess of eighteen millions over an annual revenue of forty millions, exclusive of the amount accruing from incidental sources not embraced in this estimate. The above estimates, though maximums, and therefore beyond the actual amount, would seem to demonstrate that no change of the tariff ever proposed would bring down our receipts to the wants of the Government. The twenty-five millions of dollars alone received annually from the sales of the public lands to speculators, under the existing system, would be too great for the proper, regular, annual, expenditures of the Government. Any Senator, then, who is for the present system, is either for an annual revenue of nearly forty millions of dollars, for wild and extravagant expenditures, or for an annual distribution. Any Senator who votes to continue the present system, votes to create a surplus. Any Senator who votes against limiting to settlers or cultivators the sales of the public lands, votes to accumulate a surplus. This fact cannot be disguised from the people, and will constitute the true criterion between the surplus and anti-surplus party, unless, indeed, we almost entirely repeal the tariff. Under the system we propose, the public domain, exclusive of sales for settlement, will remain the property of the Government, and in case of war or any great emergency we may sell again for revenue.

There is no subject in regard to which so many erroneous estimates have been made, as the number of acres of public land required annually for settlement or cultivation. It is demonstrable that five millions of acres is the maximum required for these purposes. This is ascertained by the augmentation of population in the new States and Territories in a given term of years, and the correspondent amount of lands entered during the same period. The increase of population in the new States and Territories, from 1820 to 1830, was 1,070,998. The total amount of entries and purchases of the public lands, for all purposes, during the same period, was 8,216,858 acres. Thus, an annual increase of one million of population, in the new States and Territories, would require less than eight millions of acres for the purposes of settlement or cultivation. Now, the most extravagant estimate of the annual increase of population in the new States and Territories does not exceed two hundred thousand; at this rate, requiring annually only one million six hundred thousand acres. But suppose the quantity trebled, and the amount will not reach five millions of acres; thus making a difference in the revenue of nearly nineteen millions of dollars per annum, according to the receipts of the present year. As, then, a mere financial measure—as a measure to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government—there is nothing proposed so important as this bill.

Assuming these five millions of acres as the largest amount that would be sold annually under the system now proposed, and the maximum of revenue hereafter accruing annually from lands and customs would be as follows:

1838,	-	-	-	23,500,000
1839,	-	-	-	23,000,000
1840,	-	-	-	22,500,000
1841,	-	-	-	22,000,000
1842,	-	-	-	21,000,000

The great difference between the years 1837 and 1838, in the above estimates, arises from the fact that, in any event, for a large portion of the year 1837, the sales must take place under the existing system. If we make a still further reduction, by the repeal of the duties on all articles now paying a less duty than twenty per cent. ad valorem, as authorized by the sixth section of the compromise act of 1833, we would probably strike off one million and a half annually from the taxes of the people, and the maximum of our annual revenue would be—

1837,	-	-	-	$26,500,000
1838,	-	-	-	22,000,000
1839,	-	-	-	21,500,000
1840,	-	-	-	21,000,000
1841,	-	-	-	20,500,000

But it is to be hoped that there are some articles, particularly those of universal use or consumption by all classes, and especially by the poor, upon which we may be enabled to reduce the duties, though not embraced within the provisions of the sixth section of the compromise act, without reviving the strife and difficulties of 1832, so as not only to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government, but to graduate our expenditures by a standard of republican economy in all our appropriations.

Such are the great principles of the bill, and the details are designed to promote the great object. Sales of the public lands at public auction, though not entirely abolished, are confined to those who purchase for settlement or cultivation. The speculator is excluded from the public sales, as he is from private entries. This is indispensable; for when the speculator is excluded only from private entries, but permitted to purchase at public auction, he would engross nearly all the lands offered at any future land sales. And what has the Government gained by sales of its lands at public auction? Nothing deserving an estimate. Upon comparing the official records, the total number of acres sold, and the total price received, the following have been the results of the auction system: From the 1st of July, 1820, to the present period, we have received, from sales of the public lands, an average of three cents per acre over the minimum price; from 1796 to 1st July, 1820, nearly three cents per acre over the minimum price; from 1796 to the present period, three cents per acre over the minimum price; for the year 1835, one cent and a half per acre over the minimum price; for the year 1836, less than one cent per acre over the minimum price. Hence it is obvious that nothing is gained by the Government by continuing the auction system.

Mr. W. here proceeded to explain to the Senate the details of the bill; the clause confining the sales to settlers or cultivators; the limitation to two sections; the authority to parents to purchase for their children, with a view to the establishment of farms; the pre-emption section; the privilege of purchasing in forty-acres lots; and, finally, the taxing power conceded to the States, by which they might raise a revenue from unoccupied lands, whether held by their own or non-resident speculators, and thus, to a certain extent, repress speculation. And Mr. W. concluded by returning his thanks to the Senate for the very general and indulgent attention with which they had received his remarks.

Mr. CLAY said he was gratified to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands the assurance that the Treasury order of July, 1836, would, in some way, be dispensed with. He wished to ask of the chairman when the committee would probably report on this subject.

Mr. WALKER could not certainly tell; but probably by Tuesday next.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, the bill, with the amendments, was postponed till Monday.

The expunging resolution of Mr. BENTON now coming up for further consideration, and Mr. CLAY having the floor—

On motion of Mr. KENT,

The Senate adjourned: Yeas 22, nays 18.

MONDAY, JANUARY 16.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

After disposing of the usual morning business, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, which was Mr. BENTON's resolution to expunge from the journal of the Senate the resolution of the 28th March, 1834, censuring the President for having removed the deposits from the Bank of the United States.

Expunging Resolution.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CLAY rose and said that, considering that he was the mover of the resolution of March, 1834, and the consequent relation in which he stood to the majority of the Senate by whose vote it was adopted, he had felt it to be his duty to say something on this expunging resolution; and he had always intended to do so when he should be persuaded that there existed a settled purpose of pressing it to a final decision. But it had been so taken up and put down at the last session—taken up one day, when a speech was prepared for delivery, and put down when it was pronounced—that he had really doubted whether there existed any serious intention of ever putting it to the vote. At the very close of the last session, it will be recollected that the resolution came up, and in several quarters of the Senate a disposition was manifested to come to a definitive decision. On that occasion he had offered to waive his right to address the Senate, and silently to vote upon the resolution; but it was again laid upon the table, and laid there forever, as the country supposed, and as he believed. It is, however, now revived; and, sundry changes having taken place in the members of this body, it would seem that the present design is to bring the resolution to an absolute conclusion.

I have not risen (continued Mr. C.) to repeat, at full length, the argument by which the friends of the resolution of March, 1834, sustained it. That argument is before the world, was unanswered at the time, and is unanswerable. And I here, in my place, in the presence of my country and of my God, after the fullest consideration and deliberation of which my mind is capable, reassert my solemn conviction of the truth of every proposition contained in that resolution. But, whilst it is not my intention to commit such an infliction upon the Senate as that would be of retracing the whole ground of argument formerly occupied, I desire to lay before it, at this time, a brief and true state of the case. Before the fatal step is taken of giving to the expunging resolution the sanction of the American Senate, I wish, by presenting a faithful outline of the real questions involved in the resolution of 1834, to make a last, even if it is to be an ineffectual, appeal to the sober judgments of Senators. I begin by reasserting the truth of that resolution.

Our British ancestors understood perfectly well the immense importance of the money power in a representative Government. It is the great lever by which the Crown is touched, and made to conform its administration to the interests of the kingdom and the will of the people. Deprive Parliament of the power of freely granting or withholding supplies, and surrender to the King the purse of the nation, he instantly becomes an absolute monarch. Whatever may be the form of government, elective or hereditary, democratic or despotic, that person who commands the force of the nation, and at the same time has uncontrolled possession of the purse of the nation, has absolute power, whatever may be the official name by which he is called.

Our immediate ancestors, profiting by the lessons on civil liberty which had been taught in the country from which we sprung, endeavored to encircle around the public purse, in the hands of Congress, every possible security against the intrusion of the Executive. With this view, Congress alone is invested, by the constitution, with the power to lay and collect the taxes. When collected, not a cent is to be drawn from the public Treasury but in virtue of an act of Congress. And among the first acts of this Government was the passage of a law establishing the Treasury Department, for the safe keeping and the legal and regular disbursement of the money so collected. By that act a Secretary of the Treasury is placed at the head of the Department; and, varying in this respect from all the other Departments, he is to report, not to the President, but directly to Congress, and is liable to be called to give information in person before Congress. It is impossible to examine dispassionately that act, without coming to the conclusion that he is emphatically the agent of Congress, in performing the duties assigned by the constitution to Congress. The act further provides that a Treasurer shall be appointed, to receive and keep the public money; and none can be drawn from his custody but under the authority of a law, and in virtue of a warrant drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, countersigned by the Comptroller, and recorded by the Register. Only when such a warrant is presented can the Treasurer lawfully pay one dollar from the public purse. Why was the concurrence of these four officers required in disbursements of the public money? Was it not for greater security? Was it not intended that each, exercising a separate and independent will, should be a check upon every other? Was it not the purpose of the law to consider each of these four officers, acting in his proper sphere, not as a mere automaton, but as an intellectual, intelligent, and responsible person, bound to observe the law, and to stop the warrant, or stop the money, if the authority of the law were wanting?

Thus stood the Treasury from 1789 to 1816. During that long time no President had ever attempted to interfere with the custody of the public purse. It remained where the law placed it, undisturbed, and every Chief Magistrate, including the Father of his Country, respected the law.

In 1816 an act passed to establish the late Bank of the United States for the term of twenty years, and, by the 16th section of the act, it is enacted "that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and the branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct; in which case, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and, if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction."

Thus it is perfectly manifest, from the express words of the law, that the power to make any order or direction for the removal of the public deposits is confided to the Secretary alone, to the absolute exclusion of the President, and all the world besides. And the law, proceeding upon the established principle that the Secretary of the Treasury, in all that concerns the public purse, acts as the direct agent of Congress, requires, in the event of his ordering or directing a removal of the deposits, that he shall immediately lay his reasons therefor before whom? The President? No; before Congress.

So stood the public Treasury and the public deposits from the year 1816 to September, 1833. In all that period of seventeen years, running through or into four several administrations of the Government, the law had its uninterrupted operation, no Chief Magistrate having assumed upon himself the power of diverting the public purse from its lawful custody, or of substituting his will to that of the officer to whose care it was exclusively intrusted.

In the session of Congress of 1832-'3 an inquiry had been instituted by the House of Representatives into the condition of the Bank of the United States. It resulted in a conviction of its entire safety, and a declaration by the House, made only a short time before the adjournment of Congress, on the 4th of March, 1833, that the public deposits were perfectly secure. This declaration was probably made in consequence of suspicions then afloat of a design on the part of the Executive to remove the deposits. These suspicions were denied by the press friendly to the administration. Nevertheless, the members had scarcely reached their respective homes before measures were commenced by the Executive to effect a removal of the deposits from that very place of safety which it was among the last acts of the House to declare existed in the Bank of the United States.

In prosecution of this design, Mr. McLane, the Secretary of the Treasury, who was decidedly opposed to such a measure, was promoted to the Department of State, and Mr. Duane was appointed to succeed him. But Mr. Duane was equally convinced with his predecessor that he was forbidden by every consideration of duty to execute the power with which the law had intrusted the Secretary of the Treasury, and refused to remove the deposits; whereupon he was dismissed from office, a new Secretary of the Treasury was appointed, and, in September, 1833, by the command of the President, the measure was finally accomplished. That it was the President's act was never denied, but proclaimed, boasted, defended. It fell upon the country like a thunder-bolt, agitating the Union from one extremity to the other. The stoutest adherents of the administration were alarmed; and all thinking men, not blinded by party prejudice, beheld in the act a bold and dangerous exercise of power; and no human sagacity can now foresee the tremendous consequences which will ensue. The measure was adopted not long before the approaching session of Congress; and, as the concurrence of both branches might be necessary to compel a restoration of the deposits, the object was to take the chance of a possible division between them, and thereby defeat the restoration.

And where did the President find the power for this most extraordinary act? It has been seen that the constitution, jealous of all executive interference with the Treasury of the nation, has confided it to the exclusive care of Congress, by every precautionary guard, from the first imposition of the taxes to the final disbursement of the public money.

It has been seen that the language of the 16th section of the law of 1816 is express and free from all ambiguity, and that the Secretary of the Treasury is the sole and exclusive depositary of the authority which it confers.

Those who maintain the power of the President have to support it against the positive language of the constitution, against the explicit words of the statute, and against the genius and theory of all our institutions.

And how do they surmount these insuperable obstacles? By a series of far-fetched implications, which, if every one of them were as true as they are believed to be incorrect or perverted, would stop far short of maintaining the power which was exercised.

The first of these implied powers is, that of dismissal, which is claimed for the President. Of all the questioned powers ever exercised by this Government, this is the most questionable. From the first Congress down to the present administration, it had never been examined. It was carried then, in the Senate, by the casting vote of the Vice President. And those who, at that day, argued in behalf of the power, contended for it upon conditions which have been utterly disregarded by the present Chief Magistrate. The power of dismissal is nowhere in the constitution granted, in express terms, to the President. It is not a necessary incident to any granted power; and the friends of the power have never been able to agree among themselves as to the precise part of the constitution from which it springs.

But if the power of dismissal was as incontestable as it is justly controvertible, we utterly deny the consequences deduced from it. The argument is, that the President has, by implication, the power of dismissal. From this first implication another is drawn; and that is, that the President has the power to control the officer, whom he may dismiss, in the discharge of his duties, in all cases whatever; and that this power of control is so comprehensive as to include even the case of a specific duty expressly assigned by law to the designated officer.

Now, we deny these results from the dismissing power. That power, if it exists, can daaw after it only a right of general superintendence. It cannot authorize the President to substitute his will to the will of the officer charged with the performance of official duties. Above all, it cannot justify such a substitution in a case where the law, as in the present instance, assigns to a designated officer exclusively the performance of a particular duty, and commands him to report, not to the President, but to Congress, in a case regarding the public purse of the nation, committed to the exclusive control of Congress.

Such a consequence as that which I am contesting would concentrate in the hands of one man the entire executive power of the nation, uncontrolled and unchecked.

It would be utterly destructive of all official responsibility. Instead of each officer being responsible, in his own separate sphere, for his official acts, he would shelter himself behind the orders of the President. And what tribunal, in heaven above or on earth below, could render judgment against any officer for an act, however atrocious, performed by the express command of the President, which, according to the argument, he was absolutely bound to obey?

Whilst all official responsibility would be utterly annihilated in subordinate officers, there would be no practical or available responsibility in the President himself.

But the case has been supposed, of a necessity for the removal of the deposits, and a refusal of the Secretary of the Treasury to remove them; and it is triumphantly asked if, in such a case, the President may not remove him, and command the deed to be done. That is an extreme case, which may be met by another. Suppose the President, without any necessity, orders the removal from a place of safety to a place of hazard? If there be danger that a Secretary may neglect his duty, there is equal danger that a President may abuse his authority. Infallibility is not a human attribute. And there is more security for the public in holding the Secretary of the Treasury to the strict performance of an official duty, specially assigned to him, under all his official responsibility, than to allow the President to wrest the work from his hands, annihilate his responsibility, and stand himself practically irresponsible. It is far better that millions should be lost by the neglect of a Secretary of the Treasury, than to establish the monstrous principle that all the checks and balances of the Executive Government shall be broken down, the whole power absorbed by one man, and his will become the supreme rule. The argument which I am combating places the whole Treasury of the nation at the mercy of the Executive. It is in vain to talk of appropriations by law, and the formalities of warrants upon the Treasury. Assuming the argument to be correct, what is to prevent the execution of an order from the President to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a warrant, without the sanction of a previous legal appropriation, to the Comptroller to countersign it, to the Register to register it, and to the Treasurer to pay it? What becomes of that quadruple security which the precaution of the law provided? Instead of four substantive and independent wills, acting under legal obligations, all are merged in the executive vortex.

But there was, in point of fact, no cause, none whatever, for the measure. Every fiscal consideration (and no other had the Secretary or the President a right to entertain) required the deposits to be left undisturbed in the place of perfect safety where by law they were. We told you so at the time. We asserted that the charges of insecurity and insolvency of the bank were without the slightest foundation. And time, that great arbitrer of human controversies, has confirmed all that we said. The bank, from documents submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the present session, appears to be able not only to return every dollar of the stock held in its capital by the public, but an addition of eleven per cent. beyond it.

Those who defend the executive act have to maintain not only that the President may assume upon himself the discharge of a duty specially assigned to the Secretary of the Treasury, but that he may remove that officer, arbitrarily, and without any cause, because he refused to remove the public deposits without cause.

My mind conducts me to a totally different conclusion. I think, I solemnly believe, that the President "assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both," in the language of the resolution. I believed then in the truth of the resolution; and I now, in my place, and under all my responsibility, reavow my unshaken conviction of it.

But it has been contended on this occasion, as it was in the debate which preceded the adoption of the resolution of 1834, that the Senate has no right to express the truth on any question which, by possibility, may become a subject of impeachment. It is manifest that if it may, there is no more usual or appropriate form in which it may be done than that of resolutions, joint or separate, orders, or bills. In no other mode can the collective sense of the body be expressed. But Senators maintain that no matter what may be the executive encroachment upon the joint powers of the two Houses, or the separate authority of the Senate, it is bound to stand mute, and not breathe one word of complaint or remonstrance. According to the argument, the greater the violation of the constitution or the law, the greater the incompetency of the Senate to express any opinion upon it! Further, that this incompetency is not confined to the acts of the President only, but extends to those of every officer who is liable to impeachment under the constitution. Is this possible? Can it be true? Contrary to all the laws of nature, is the Senate the only being which has no power of self-preservation—no right to complain or to remonstrate against attacks upon its very existence?

The argument is, that the Senate, being the constitutional tribunal to try all impeachments, is thereby precluded from the exercise of the right to express any opinion upon any official malfeasance, except when acting in its judicial character.

If this disqualification exist, it applies to all impeachable officers, and ought to have protected the late Postmaster General against the resolution, unanimously adopted by the Senate, declaring that he had borrowed money contrary to law. And it would disable the Senate from considering that Treasury order which has formed such a prominent subject of its deliberations during the present session.

And how do Senators maintain this obligation of the Senate to remain silent and behold itself stript, one by one, of all its constitutional powers, without resistance, and without murmur? Is it imposed by the language of the constitution? Has any part of that instrument been pointed to which expressly enjoins it? No, no; not a syllable. But it is attempted to be deduced by another far-fetched implication. Because the Senate is the body which is to try impeachments, therefore it is inferred the Senate can express no opinion on any matter which may form the subject of impeachment. The constitution does not say so. That is undeniable; but Senators think so.

The Senate acts in three characters—legislative, executive, and judicial—and their importance is in the order enumerated. By far the most important of the three is its legislative. In that, almost every day that it has been in session from 1789 to the present time, some legislative business has been transacted; whilst, in its judicial character, it has not sat more than three or four times in that whole period.

Why should the judicial function limit and restrain the legislative function of the Senate, more than the legislative should the judicial? If the degree of importance of the two should decide which ought to impose the restraint, in case of conflict between them, none can doubt which it should be.

But if the argument is sound, how is it possible for the Senate to perform its legislative duties? An act in violation of the constitution or laws is committed by the President, or a subordinate executive officer, and it becomes necessary to correct it by the passage of a law. The very act of the President in question was under a law to which the Senate had given its concurrence. According to the argument, the correcting law cannot originate in the Senate, because it would have to pass in judgment upon that act. Nay, more: it cannot originate in the House and be sent to the Senate, for the same reason of incompetency in the Senate to pass upon it. Suppose the bill contained a preamble reciting the unconstitutional or illegal act, to which the legislative corrective is applied: according to the argument, the Senate must not think of passing it. Pushed to its legitimate consequence, the argument requires the House of Representatives itself cautiously to abstain from the expression of any opinion upon an executive act, except when it is acting as the grand inquest of the nation, and considering articles of impeachment.

Assuming that the argument is well founded, the Senate is equally restrained from expressing any opinion which would imply the innocence or the guilt of an impeachable officer, unless it be maintained that it is lawful to express praise and approbation, but not censure or difference of opinion. Instances have occurred in our past history, (the case of the British minister, Jackson, was a memorable one,) and many others may arise in our future progress, when, in reference to foreign Powers, it may be important for Congress to approve what has been done by the Executive, to present a firm and united front, and to pledge the country to stand by and support him. May it not do that? If the Senate dare not entertain and express any opinion upon an executive measure, how do those who support this expunging resolution justify the acquittal of the President which it proclaims?

No Senator believed, in 1834, that, whether the President merited impeachment or not, he ever would be impeached. In point of fact he has not been, and we have every reason to suppose that he never will be, impeached. Was the majority of the Senate, in a case where it believed the constitution and laws to have been violated, and the liberties of the people to be endangered, to remain silent, and to refrain from proclaiming the truth, because, against all human probability, the President might be impeached by a majority of his political friends in the House of Representatives?

If an impeachment had been actually voted by the House of Representatives, there is nothing in the constitution which enjoins silence on the part of the Senate. In such a case, it would have been a matter of propriety, for the consideration of each Senator, to avoid the expression of any opinion on a matter upon which, as a sworn judge, he would be called to act.

Hitherto, I have considered the question on the supposition that the resolution of March, 1834, implied such guilt in the President that he would have been liable to conviction on a trial by impeachment before the Senate of the United States. But the resolution, in fact, imported no such guilt. It simply affirmed that he had "assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both." It imputed no criminal motives. It did not profess to penetrate into the heart of the President. According to the phraseology of the resolution, the exceptionable act might have been performed with the purest and most patriotic intention. The resolution neither affirmed his innocence, nor pronounced his guilt. It amounts, then, say his friends on this floor, to nothing. Not so. If the constitution be trampled upon, and the laws be violated, the injury may be equally great, whether it has been done with good or bad intentions. There may be a difference to the officer, none to the country. The country, as all experience demonstrates, has most reason to apprehend those encroachments which take place on plausible pretexts, and with good intentions.

SENATE.]

Expunging Resolution.

I put it, Mr. President, to the calm and deliberate consideration of the majority of the Senate, are you ready to pronounce, in the face of this enlightened community, for all time to come, and whoever may happen to be the President, that the Senate dare not, in language the most inoffensive and respectful, remonstrate against any executive usurpation, whatever may be its degree or danger?

For one, I will not, I cannot. I believe the resolution of March, 1834, to have been true; and that it was competent to the Senate to proclaim the truth. And I solemnly believe that the Senate would have been culpably neglectful of its duty to itself, to the constitution, and to the country, if it had not announced the truth.

But let me suppose that in all this I am mistaken; that the act of the President, to which exception was made, was in conformity with the spirit of our free institutions and the language of our constitution and laws; and that, whether it was or not, the Senate of 1834 had no authority to pass judgment upon it: what right has the Senate of 1837, a component part of another Congress, to pronounce judgment upon its predecessor? How can you, who venture to impute to those who have gone before you an unconstitutional proceeding, escape a similar imputation? What part of the constitution communicates to you any authority to arraign and try your predecessors? In what article is contained your power to expunge what they have done? And may not the precedent lead to a perpetual code of defacement and restoration of the transactions of the Senate, as consigned to the public records?

Are you not only destitute of all authority, but positively forbidden, to do what the expunging resolution proposes? The injunction of the constitution to keep a journal of our proceedings is clear, express, and emphatic. It is free from all ambiguity: no sophistry can pervert the explicit language of the instrument, no artful device can elude the force of the obligation which it imposes. If it were possible to make more manifest the duty which it requires to be performed, that was done by the able and eloquent speeches, at the last session, of the Senators from Virginia and Louisiana, [Messrs. LEIGH and PORTER,] and at this of my colleague. I shall not repeat the argument. But, I would ask, if there were no constitutional requirement to keep a journal, what constitutional right has the Senate of this Congress to pass in judgment upon the Senate of another Congress, and to expunge from its journal a deliberate act there recorded? Can an unconstitutional act of that Senate, supposing it to be so, justify you in performing another unconstitutional act?

But in lieu of any argument upon the point from me, I beg leave to cite for the consideration of the Senate two precedents: one drawn from the reign of the most despotic monarch in modern Europe, under the most despotic minister that ever bore sway over any people, and the other from the purest fountain of democracy in this country. I quote from the interesting life of the Cardinal Richelieu, written by that most admirable and popular author, Mr. James. The Duke of Orleans, the brother of Louis XIII, had been goaded into rebellion by the wary Richelieu. The King issued a decree declaring all the supporters of the Duke guilty of high treason, and a copy of it was despatched to the Parliament of Paris, with an order to register it at once. The Parliament demurred, and proceeded to what was called un arrêt de partage. "Richelieu, however, could bear no contradiction in the course which he had laid down for himself;" [How strong a resemblance does that feature of his character bear to one of an illustrious individual whom I will not further describe!] "and hurrying back to Paris with the King, he sent, in the monarch's name, a command for the members of the Parliament to present themselves at the Louvre, in a body and on foot. He was obeyed immediately; and the King receiving them with great haughtiness, the Keeper of the Seals made them a speech, in which he declared that they had no authority to deliberate upon affairs of state; that the business of private individuals they might discuss, but that the will of the monarch in other matters they were alone called upon to register. The King then tore with his own hands the page of the register on which the arrêt de partage had been inscribed, and punished with suspension from their functions several of the members of the various courts composing the Parliament of Paris." How repeated acts of the exercise of arbitrary power are likely to subdue the spirit of liberty, and to render callous the public sensibility and the fate which awaits us, if we had not been recently unhappily taught in this country, we may learn from the same author. "The finances of the State were exhausted, new impositions were devised, and a number of new offices created and sold. Against the last-named abuse the Parliament ventured to remonstrate; but the Government of the Cardinal had for its first principle despotism, and the refractory members were punished, some with exile, some with suspension of their functions. All were forced to comply with his will; and the Parliament, unable to resist, yielded, step by step, to his exactions."

The other precedent is supplied by the archives of the democracy of Pennsylvania in 1816, when it was genuine, and unmixed with any other ingredient.

The provisions of the constitution of the United States and of Pennsylvania, in regard to the obligation to keep a journal, are substantially the same. That of the United States requires that "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, except such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one fifth of the members present, be entered on the journal." And that of Pennsylvania is, "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish them weekly, except such parts as require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members on any question shall, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on the journals." Whatever involubility, therefore, is attached to a journal, kept in conformity with the one constitution, must be equally stamped on that kept under the other. On the 10th February, 1816, in the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, "the Speaker informed the House that a constitutional question being involved in a decision by him yesterday, on a motion to expunge certain proceedings from the journal, he was desirous of having the opinion of the House on that decision, viz: that a majority can expunge from the journal any proceedings in which the yeas and nays have not been called." Whereupon Mr. Holgate and Mr. Smith appealed from said decision; and on the question, Is the Speaker right in his decision? the members present voted as follows: yeas three, nays seventy-eight. Among the latter are to be found the two Senators now representing in this body the State of Pennsylvania. On the same day a motion was made by one of them [Mr. BUCHANAN] and Mr. Kelly, and read, as follows: "Resolved, That in the opinion of this House no part of the journals of the House can be expunged, even by unanimous consent."

The Senate observes that the question arose in a case where the yeas and nays had not been called. Even in such a case there were but four members out of eighty-two that thought it was competent to the House to expunge. Had the yeas and nays been called and recorded, as they were on the resolution of March, 1834, there would not have been a solitary vote in the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania in support of the power of expunging. And if you can expunge the resolution, why may you not expunge also the recorded yeas and nays attached to it?

But if the matter of expunction be contrary to the truth of the case, reproachful for its base subversivency, derogatory from the just and necessary powers of the Senate, and repugnant to the constitution of the United States, the manner in which it is proposed to accomplish this dark deed is also highly exceptionable. The expunging resolution, which is to blot out or enshroud the four or five lines in which the resolution of 1834 stands recorded, or rather the recitals by which it is preceded, are spun out into a thread of enormous length. It runs, whereas, and whereas, and whereas, and whereas, and whereas, &c., into a formidable array of nine several whereases. One who should have the courage to begin to read them, unaware of what was to be their termination, would think that at the end of such a tremendous display he must find the very devil. It is like a kite or a comet, except that the order of nature is inverted, and the tail, instead of being behind, is before the body to which it is appended.

I shall not trespass on the Senate by inquiring into the truth of all the assertions of fact and of principle contained in these recitals. It would not be difficult to expose them all, and to show that not one of them has more than a colorable foundation. It is asserted by one of them that the President was put upon his trial, and condemned, unheard, by the Senate, in 1834. Was that true? Was it a trial? Can the majority now assert, upon their oaths, and in their consciences, that there was any trial or condemnation? During the warmth of debate, Senators might endeavor to persuade themselves and the public that the proceeding of 1834 was, in its effects and consequences, a trial, and would be a condemnation of the President; but now, after the lapse of near three years, when the excitement arising from an animated discussion has passed away, it is marvellous that any one should be prepared to assert that an expression of the opinion of the Senate upon the character of an executive act was an arraignment, trial, and conviction, of the President of the United States!

Another fact, asserted in one of these recitals, is, that the resolution of 1834, in either of the forms in which it was originally presented or subsequently modified, prior to the final shape which it assumed when adopted, would have been rejected by a majority of the Senate. What evidence is there in support of this assertion? None. It is, I verily believe, directly contrary to the fact. In either of the modifications of the resolution, I have not a doubt that it would have passed! They were all made in that spirit of accommodation by which the mover of the resolution has ever regulated his conduct as a member of a deliberative body. In not one single instance did he understand from any Senator at whose request he made the modification, that, without it, he would vote against the resolution. How, then, can even the Senators who were of the minority of 1834 undertake to make the assertion in question? How can the new Senators, who have come here since, pledge themselves to the fact asserted in the recital of which they could not have had any consance? But all the members of the majority—the veterans and the raw recruits—the six years men and the six weeks men—are required to concur in this most unfounded assertion, as I believe it to be. I submit it to one of the latter (looking towards Mr. DANA, from Maine, here by a temporary appointment from the Executive) whether, instead of inundating the Senate with a torrent of fulsome and revolting adulation poured on the President, it would not be wiser and more patriotic to illustrate the brief period of his senatorial existence by some great measure fraught with general benefit to the whole Union? Or, if he will not or cannot elevate himself to a view of the interests of the entire country, whether he had not better dedicate his time to an investigation into the causes of an alien jurisdiction being still exercised over a large part of the territory of the State which he represents? And why the American carrying trade to the British colonies, in which his State was so deeply interested, has been lost by a most improvident and bungling arrangement?

Mr. President, what patriotic purpose is to be accomplished by this expunging resolution? What new honor or fresh laurels will it win for our common country? Is the power of the Senate so vast that it ought to be circumscribed, and that of the President so restricted that it ought to be extended? What power has the Senate? None, separately. It can only act jointly with the other House, or jointly with the Executive. And although the theory of the constitution supposes, when consulted by him, it may freely give an affirmative or negative response, according to the practice, as it now exists, it has lost the faculty of pronouncing the negative monosyllable. When the Senate expresses its deliberate judgment, in the form of resolution, that resolution has no compulsory force, but appeals only to the dispassionate intelligence, the calm reason, and the sober judgment, of the community. The Senate has no army, no navy, no patronage, no lucrative offices, nor glittering honors, to bestow. Around us there is no swarm of greedy expectants, rendering us homage, anticipating our wishes, and ready to execute our commands.

How is it with the President? Is he powerless? He is felt from one extremity to the other of this vast republic. By means of principles which he has introduced and innovations which he has made in our institutions, alas! but too much countenanced by Congress and a confiding people, he exercises uncontrolled the power of the State. In one hand he holds the purse, and in the other brandishes the sword of the country. Myriads of dependants and partisans, scattered over the land, are ever ready to sing hosannas to him, and to laud to the skies whatever he does. He has swept over the Government, during the last eight years, like a tropical tornado. Every department exhibits traces of the ravages of the storm. Take as one example the Bank of the United States. No institution could have been more popular with the people, with Congress, and with State Legislatures. None ever better fulfilled the great purposes of its establishment. But it unfortunately incurred the displeasure of the President; he spoke, and the bank lies prostrate. And those who were loudest in its praise are now loudest in its condemnation. What object of his ambition is unsatisfied? When disabled from age any longer to hold the sceptre of power, he designates his successor, and transmits it to his favorite! What more does he want? Must we blot, deface, and mutilate, the records of the country, to punish the presumptuousness of expressing an opinion contrary to his own?

What patriotic purpose is to be accomplished by this expunging resolution? Can you make that not to be which has been? Can you eradicate from memory and from history the fact that in March, 1834, a majority of the Senate of the United States passed the resolution which excites your enmity? Is it your vain and wicked object to arrogate to yourselves that power of annihilating the past which has been denied to Omnipotence itself? Do you intend to thrust your hands into our hearts, and to pluck out the deeply rooted convictions which are there? Or is it your design merely to stigmatize us? You cannot stigmatize us.

Ne'er yet did base dishonor blur our name.

Standing securely upon our conscious rectitude, and bearing aloft the shield of the constitution of our country, your puny efforts are impotent; and we defy all your power. Put the majority of 1834 in one scale, and that by which this expunging resolution is to be carried in the other, and let truth and justice, in heaven above and on earth below, and liberty and patriotism, decide the preponderance.

What patriotic purpose is to be accomplished by this expunging resolution? Is it to appease the wrath and to heal the wounded pride of the Chief Magistrate? If he be really the hero that his friends represent him, he must despise all mean condescension, all grovelling sycophancy, all self-degradation and self-abasement. He would reject, with scorn and contempt, as unworthy of his fame, your black scratches and your baby lines in the fair records of his country. Black lines! Black lines! Sir, I hope the Secretary of the Senate will preserve the pen with which he may inscribe them, and present it to that Senator of the majority whom he may select, as a proud trophy, to be transmitted to his descendants. And hereafter, when we shall lose the forms of our free institutions, all that now remain to us, some future American monarch, in gratitude to those by whose means he has been enabled, upon the ruins of civil liberty, to erect a throne, and to commemorate especially this expunging resolution, may institute a new order of knighthood, and confer on it the appropriate name of the Knight of the Black Lines.

But why should I detain the Senate, or needlessly waste my breath in fruitless exertions. The decree has gone forth. It is one of urgency, too. The deed is to be done—that foul deed which, like the blood-stained hands of the guilty Macbeth, all ocean's waters will never wash out. Proceed, then, to the noble work which lies before you, and, like other skilful executioners, do it quickly. And when you have perpetrated it, go home to the people, and tell them what glorious honors you have achieved for our common country. Tell them that you have extinguished one of the brightest and purest lights that ever burnt at the altar of civil liberty. Tell them that you have silenced one of the noblest batteries that ever thundered in defence of the constitution, and bravely spiked the cannon. Tell them that, henceforward, no matter what daring or outrageous act any President may perform, you have forever hermetically sealed the mouth of the Senate. Tell them that he may fearlessly assume what powers he pleases, snatch from its lawful custody the public purse, command a military detachment to enter the halls of the Capitol, overawe Congress, trample down the constitution, and raze every bulwark of freedom; but that the Senate must stand mute, in silent submission, and not dare to raise its opposing voice. That it must wait until a House of Representatives, humbled and subdued like itself, and a majority of it composed of the partisans of the President, shall prefer articles of impeachment. Tell them, finally, that you have restored the glorious doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance. And, if the people do not pour out their indignation and imprecations, I have yet to learn the character of American freemen.

When Mr. CLAY had concluded,

Mr. BUCHANAN rose and spoke as follows:

Mr. President: after the able and eloquent display of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] who has just resumed his seat, after having so long enchained the attention of his audience, it might be the dictate of prudence for me to remain silent. But I feel too deeply my responsibility as an American Senator, not to make the attempt to place before the Senate and the country the reasons which, in my opinion, will justify the vote which I intend to give this day.

A more grave and solemn question has rarely, if ever, been submitted to the Senate of the United States, than the one now under discussion. This Senate is now called upon to review its own decision, to rejudge its own justice, and to annihilate its own sentence, deliberately pronounced against the co-ordinate executive branch of this Government. On the 28th of March, 1834, the American Senate, in the face of the American people, in the face of the whole world, by a solemn resolution, pronounced the President of the United States to be a violator of the constitution of his country—of that constitution which he had solemnly sworn “to preserve, protect, and defend.” Whether we consider the exalted character of the tribunal which pronounced this condemnation, or the illustrious object against which it was directed, we ought to feel deeply impressed with the high and lasting importance of the present proceeding. It is in fact, if not in form, the trial of the Senate for having unjustly and unconstitutionally tried and condemned the President; and their accusers are the American people. In this cause I am one of the judges. In some respects, it is a painful position for me to occupy. It is vain, however, to express unavailing regrets. I must, and shall, firmly and sternly, do my duty, although in the performance of it I may wound the feelings of gentlemen whom I respect and esteem. I shall proceed no further than the occasion demands, and will, therefore, justify.

Who was the President of the United States against whom this sentence has been pronounced? Andrew Jackson—a name which every American mother, after the party strife which agitates us for the present moment shall have passed away, will, during all the generations which this republic is destined to endure, teach her infant to lisp with that of the venerated name of Washington. The one was the founder, the other the preserver, of the liberties of his country.

If President Jackson has been guilty of violating the constitution of the United States, let impartial justice take its course. I admit that it is no justification for such a crime that his long life has been more distinguished by acts of disinterested patriotism than that of any American citizen now living. It is no justification that the honesty of his heart and the purity of his intentions have become proverbial, even amongst his political enemies. It is no justification that in the hour of danger, and in the day of battle, he has been his country's shield. If he has been guilty, let his name be “damned to everlasting fame,” with those of Cæsar and of Napoleon.

If, on the other hand, he is pure and immaculate from the charge, let us be swift to do him justice, and to blot out the foul stigma which the Senate have placed upon his character. If we are not, he may go down to the grave in doubt as to what may be the final judgment of his country. In any event, he must soon retire to the shades of private life. Shall we, then, suffer his official term to expire without first doing him justice? It may be said of me, as it has already been said of other Senators, that I am one of the gross adulators of the President. But, sir, I have never said thus much of him whilst he was in the meridian of his power. Now, that his political sun is nearly set, I feel myself at liberty to pour forth my grateful feelings, as an American citizen, to a man who has done so much for his country. I have never, for myself, either directly or indirectly, solicited office at his hands; and my character must greatly change, if I should ever do so from any of his successors. If I should bestow upon him the meed of my poor praise, it springs from an impulse far different from that which has been attributed to the majority on this floor. I speak as an independent freeman and American Senator: and I feel proud now to have the opportunity of raising my voice in his defence.

On the 28th day of March, 1834, the Senate of the United States resolved "that the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

In discussing this subject, I shall undertake to prove, first, that this resolution is unjust; secondly, that it is unconstitutional; and in the last place, that it ought to be expunged from our journals, in the manner proposed by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.]

First, then, it is unjust. On this branch of the subject, I had intended to confine myself to a bare expression of my own decided opinion. This point has been so often and so ably discussed, that it is impossible for me to cast any new light upon it. But as it is my intention to follow the footsteps of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] wherever they may lead, I must again tread the ground which has been so often trodden. As the Senator, however, has confined himself to a mere passing reference to the topics which this head presents, I shall, in this particular, follow his example.

Although the resolution condemning the President is vague and general in its terms, yet we all know that it was founded upon his removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States. The Senator from Kentucky has contended that this act was a violation of law. And why? Because, says he, it is well known that the public money was secure in that institution; and by its charter the public deposits could not be removed from it, unless under a just apprehension that they were in danger. Now, sir, I admit that if the President had no right to remove these deposits, except for the sole reason that their safety was in danger, the Senator has established his position. But what is the fact? Was the Government thus restricted by the terms of the bank charter? I answer, no. Such a limitation is nowhere to be found in it. Let me read the sixteenth section, which is the only one relating to the subject. It enacts, "that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct; in which case, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction."

Is not the authority thus conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury as broad and as ample as the English language will admit? Where is the limitation, where the restriction? One might have supposed, from the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, that the charter had restricted the Secretary of the Treasury from removing the deposits, unless he believed them to be insecure in the Bank of the United States; but the language of the law itself completely refutes his argument. They were to remain in the Bank of the United States, "unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct."

The sole limitation upon the discretion of that officer was his immediate and direct responsibility to Congress. To us he was bound to render his reasons for removing the deposits. We, and we alone, are constituted the judges as to the sufficiency of these reasons.

It would be an easy task to prove that the authors of the bank charter acted wisely in not limiting the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury over the deposits to the single case of their apprehended insecurity. We may imagine many other reasons which would have rendered their removal both wise and expedient. But I forbear, especially as the case now before the Senate presents as striking an illustration of this proposition as I could possibly imagine. Upon what principle, then, do I justify the removal of the deposits?

The Bank of the United States had determined to apply for a recharter at the session of Congress immediately preceding the last presidential election. Preparatory to this application, and whilst it was pending, in the short space of sixteen months, it had increased its loans more than $28,000,000. They rose from forty-two millions to seventy millions between the last of December, 1830, and the 1st of May, 1832. Whilst this boasted regulator of the currency was thus expanding its discounts, all the local banks followed the example. The impulse of self-interest urged them to pursue this course. A delusive prosperity was thus spread over the land. Money, every where, became plenty. The bank was regarded as the beneficent parent, who was pouring her money out into the laps of her children. She thought herself wise and provident in thus rendering herself popular. The recharter passed both Houses of Congress by triumphant majorities. But then came "the frost, the killing frost." It was not so easy to propitiate "the Old Roman." Although he well knew the power and influence which the bank could exert against him at the then approaching presidential election, he cast such considerations to the winds. He vetoed the bill, and, in the most solemn manner, placed himself for trial upon this question before the American people.

From that moment the faith of many of his former friends began to grow cold. The bank openly took the field against his re-election. It expended large sums in subsidizing editors, and in circulating pamphlets, and papers, and speeches, throughout the Union, calculated to inflame the public mind against the President. I merely glance at these things.

Let us pause, for a single moment, to consider the consequences of such conduct. What right had the bank, as a corporation, to enter the arena of politics, for the purpose of defending itself, and attacking the President? Whilst I freely admit that each individual stockholder possessed the same rights, in this respect, as every other American citizen, I pray you to consider what a dangerous precedent the bank has thus established. Our banks now number nearly a thousand, and our other chartered institutions are almost innumerable. If all these corporations are to be justified in using their corporate funds for the purpose of influencing elections, of elevating their political friends, and crushing their political foes, our condition is truly deplorable. We shall thus introduce into the State a new, a dangerous, and an alarming power, the effects of which no man can anticipate. Watchful jealousy is the price which a free people must ever pay for their liberties; and this jealousy should be argus-eyed in watching the political movements of corporations.

After the bank had been defeated in the presidential election, it adopted a new course of policy. What it had been unable to accomplish by making money plenty, it determined it would wrest from the sufferings of the people by making money scarce. Pressure and panic then became its weapons; and with these it was determined, if possible, to extort a recharter from the American people. It commenced this warfare upon the interests of the country about the 1st of August, 1833. In two short months it decreased its loans more than four millions of dollars, whilst the deposits of the Government with it had increased, during the same period, two millions and a quarter. I speak in round numbers. It was then in the act of reducing its discounts at the rate of two millions of dollars per month.

Expunging Resolution.

The State banks had expanded their loans with the former expansion of the Bank of the United States. It now became necessary to contract them. The severest pressure began to be felt every where. Had the Bank of the United States been permitted a short time longer to proceed in this course, fortified as it was with the millions of the Government which it held on deposit, a scene of almost universal bankruptcy and insolvency must have been presented in our commercial cities. It thus became absolutely necessary for the President either to deprive the bank of the public deposits, as the only means of protecting the State banks, and, through them, the people, from these impending evils, or calmly to look on and see it spreading ruin throughout the land. It was necessary for him to adopt this policy for the purpose of preventing a universal derangement of the currency, a general sacrifice of property, and, as an inevitable consequence, the recharter of this institution.

By the removal of the deposits, he struck a blow against the bank from which it has never since recovered. This was the club of Hercules with which he slew the Hydra. This was the master-stroke by which he prostrated what a large majority of the American people believe to have been a corrupt and a corrupting institution. For this he is not only justified, but deserves the eternal gratitude of his country. For this the Senate have condemned him; but the people of the United States have hailed him as a deliverer.

It has been said by the Senator from Kentucky, that the President, by removing the deposits from the Bank of the United States, united in his own person the power of the purse of the nation with that of the sword. I think it is not difficult to answer this argument. What was to become of the public money, in case it had been removed from the Bank of the United States, under its charter, for the cause which the Senator himself deems justifiable? Why, sir, it would then have been immediately remitted to the guardianship of those laws under which it had been protected before the Bank of the United States was called into existence. Such was the present case. In regard to this point, no matter whether the cause of removal were sufficient or not, the moment the deposits were actually removed, they became subject to the pre-existing laws, and not to the arbitrary will of the President.

The Senator from Kentucky has contended that the President violated the constitution and the laws by dismissing Mr. Duane from office because he would not remove the deposits, and by appointing Mr. Taney to accomplish this purpose. I shall not discuss at any length the power of removal. It is now too late in the day to question it. That the Executive possesses this power was decided by the first Congress. It has often since been discussed and decided in the same manner, and it has been exercised by every President of the United States. The President is bound by the constitution to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." If he cannot remove his executive officers, it is impossible that he can perform this duty. Every inferior officer might set up for himself; might violate the laws of the country, and put him at defiance, whilst he would remain perfectly powerless. He could not arrest their career. A foreign minister might be betraying and disgracing the nation abroad, without any power to recall him until the next meeting of the Senate. This construction of the constitution involves so many dangers, and so many absurdities, that it could not be maintained for a moment, even if there had not been a constant practice against it of almost half a century.

But it is contended by the Senator that the Secretary of the Treasury is a sort of independent power in the State, and is released from the control of the Executive. And why? Simply because he is directed by law to make his annual report to Congress, and not to the President. If this position be correct, then it necessarily follows that the Executive is released from the obligation of taking care that the numerous and important acts of Congress regulating the fiscal concerns of the country shall be faithfully executed. The Secretary of the Treasury is thus made independent of his control. What would be the position of this officer under such a construction of the constitution and laws, it would be very difficult to decide. And this wonderful transformation of his character has arisen from the mere circumstance that Congress have by law directed him to make an annual report to them! No, sir; the Executive is responsible to Congress for the faithful execution of the laws; and if the present or any other President should prove faithless to his high trust, the present Senate, notwithstanding all which has been said, would be as ready as their predecessors to inflict condign punishment upon him, in the mode pointed out by the constitution.

I have now arrived at the great question of the constitutional power of the Senate to adopt the resolution of March, 1834. It is my firm conviction that the Senate possesses no such power; and it is now my purpose to establish this position. The decision on this point must depend upon a true answer to the question, does this resolution contain any impeachable charge against the President? If it does, I trust I shall demonstrate that the Senate violated its constitutional duty in proceeding to condemn him in this manner. I shall again read the resolution;

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

This language is brief and comprehensive. It comes at once to the point. It bears a striking impress of the character of the Senator from Kentucky. Does it charge an impeachable offence against the President?

The fourth section of the second article of the constitution declares that "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

It has been contended that this condemnatory resolution contains no impeachable offence, because it charges no criminal intention against the President; and I admit that it does not attribute to him any corrupt motive in express words. Is this sufficient to convince the judgment of any impartial man that none such was intended? Let us, for a few moments, examine this proposition. If it be well founded, the Senate may forever hereafter usurp the power of trying, condemning, and destroying, any officer of the Government, without affording him the slightest opportunity of being heard in his defence. They may thus abuse their power, and prostrate any object of their vengeance. It seems we have now made the discovery that the Senate are authorized to exert this tremendous power; that they may thus assume to themselves the office both of accuser and of judge, provided the indictment contains no express allegation of a criminal intention. The President, or any officer of the Government, may be denounced by the Senate as a violator of the constitution of his country, as derelict in the performance of his public duties, provided there be no express imputation of an improper motive. The characters of men whose reputation is dearer to them than their lives may thus be destroyed. They may be held up to public execration by the omission of a few formal words. The condemnation of the Senate carries with it such a moral power, that perhaps there is no man in the United States, except Andrew Jackson, who could have resisted its force. No, sir; such an argument can never command conviction. That which we have no power to do directly, we can never accomplish by indirect means. We cannot by resolution convict a man of an impeachable offence, merely because we may omit the formal words of an impeachment. we must regard the substance of things, and not the mere form.

But again: Although a criminal intention be not charged in so many words, by this resolution, yet its language, even without the attendant circumstances, clearly conveys this meaning. The President is charged with having "assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both." "Assumed upon himself!" What is the plain, palpable meaning of this phrase, connected with what precedes and follows? Is it not "to arrogate," "to claim or seize unjustly?" These are two of the first meanings of the word assume, according to the lexicographers. To assume upon one's self, is a mode of expression which is rarely taken in a good sense. As it is used here, I ask if any man of plain, common understanding, after reading this resolution, would ever arrive at the conclusion that any Senator voted for it under the impression that the President was innocent of any improper intention, and that he violated the constitution from mere mistake, and from pure motives? The common sense of mankind revolts at the idea. How can it be contended, for a single moment, that you can denounce the President as a man who had "assumed upon himself" the power of violating the laws and the constitution of his country, and in the same breath declare that you had not the least intention to criminate him, and that your language was altogether inoffensive? The two propositions are manifestly inconsistent.

But I go one step further. If we were sitting as a court of impeachment, and the bare proposition were established to our satisfaction, that the President had, in violation of the constitution and laws, withdrawn the public revenue of the country from the depository to whose charge Congress had committed it, and assumed the control over it himself, we would be bound to convict him of a high official misdemeanor. Under such circumstances, we should be bound to infer a criminal intention from this illegal and unconstitutional act. Criminal justice could never be administered, society could not exist, if the tribunals of the country should not attribute evil motives to illegal and unconstitutional conduct. Omniscience alone can examine the heart. When poor, frail man is placed in the judgment seat, he must infer the intentions of the accused from his actions. That "the tree is known by its fruits," is an axiom which we have derived from the fountain of all truth. Does a poor, naked, hungry wretch, at this inclement season of the year, take from my pocket a single dollar, the law infers a criminal intent, and he must be convicted and punished as a thief, though he may have been actuated by no other motive than that of saving his wife and children from starvation. And shall a different rule be applied to the President of the United States? Shall it be said of a man elevated to the highest station on earth, for his wisdom, his integrity, and his virtues, with all his constitutional advisers around him, when he violates the constitution of his country, and usurps the control over its entire revenue, that he may successfully defend himself by declaring that he had done this deed without any criminal intention? No, sir; in such a case, above all others, the criminal intention must be inferred from the unconstitutional exercise of high and dangerous powers. The safety of the republic demands that the President of the United States should never shield himself behind such flimsy pretexts. This resolution, therefore, although it may not have assumed the form of an article of impeachment, possesses all the substance.

It was my fate some years ago to have assisted as a manager, in behalf of the House of Representatives, in the trial of an impeachment before this body. It then became my duty to examine all the precedents in such cases which had occurred under our Government since the adoption of the federal constitution. On that occasion I found one which has a strong bearing upon this question. I refer to the case of Judge Pickering. He was tried and condemned by the Senate upon all the four articles exhibited against him, although the three first contained no other charge than that of making decisions contrary to law, in a cause involving a mere question of property, and then refusing to grant the party injured an appeal from his decision, to which he was entitled. From the clear violation of the law, in this case, the Senate must have inferred an impure and improper motive.

If any thing further were wanting to prove that the resolution of the Senate contained a criminal and impeachable charge against the President, it might be demonstrated from all the circumstances attending the transaction. Whilst this resolution was in progress through the Senate, the Bank of the United States was employed in producing panic and pressure throughout the land. Much actual suffering was experienced by the people; and where that did not exist, they dreaded unknown and awful calamities. Confidence between man and man was at an end. There was a fearful pause in the business of the country. We were then engaged in the most violent party conflict recorded in our annals. To use the language of the Senator from Kentucky, we were in the midst of a revolution. On the one side it was contended that the power over the purse of the nation had been usurped by the President; that in his own person he had united this power with that of the sword, and that the liberties of the people were gone, unless he could be arrested in his mad career. On the other hand, the friends of the President maintained that the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States was an act of stern justice to the people; that it was strictly legal and constitutional; that he was impelled to it by the highest and purest principles of patriotism; and that it was the only means of prostrating an institution which threatened the destruction of our dearest rights and liberties. During this terrific conflict, public indignation was aroused to such a degree, that the President received a great number of anonymous letters, threatening him with assassination, unless he should restore the deposits.

It was during the pendency of this conflict throughout the country, that the Senator from Kentucky thought proper, on the 26th of December, 1833, to present his condemnatory resolution to the Senate. And here, sir, permit me to say, that I do not believe there was any corrupt connexion between any Senator upon this floor and the Bank of the United States. But it was at this inauspicious moment that the resolution was introduced. How was it supported by the Senator from Kentucky? He told us that a revolution had already commenced. He told us that by the 3d of March, 1837, if the progress of innovation should continue, there would be scarcely a vestige remaining of the Government and policy, as they had existed prior to the 3d of March, 1829. That in a term of years, a little more than that which was required to establish our liberties, the Government would be transformed into an elective monarchy—the worst of all forms of government. He compared the measure adopted by General Jackson with the conduct of the usurping Cæsar, who, after he had overrun Italy in sixty days, and conquered the liberties of his native country, terrified the tribune Metellus, who guarded the Treasury of the Roman people, and seized it by open force. He declared that the President had perpetrated an open, palpable, and daring usurpation. He concluded by asserting that the premonitory symptoms of despotism were upon us; and if Congress did not apply an instantaneous and effective remedy, the fatal collapse would soon come on, and we should die—ignobly die—base, mean, and abject slaves, the scorn and contempt of mankind, unpitied, unwept, and unmourned. What a spectacle was then presented in this chamber! We are told, in the reports of the day, that, when he took his seat, there was repeated and loud applause in the galleries. This, it will be remembered, was the introductory speech of the Senator. In my opinion, it was one of the ablest and most eloquent of all his able and eloquent speeches. He was then riding upon the whirlwind and directing the storm. At the time I read it, for I was not then in the Senate, it reminded me of the able, the vindictive, and the eloquent appeal of Mr. Burke before the House of Lords, on the impeachment of Warren Hastings, in which he denounced that Governor General as the ravager and oppressor of India, and the scourge of the millions who had been placed under his authority.

And yet, we are now told that this resolution did not intend to impute any criminal motive to the President; that he was a good old man, though not a good constitutional lawyer; and that he knew better how to wield the sword than to construe the constitution.

[Mr. CLAY here rose to explain. He said, "I never have said, and never will say, that personally I acquitted the President of any improper intention. I lament that I cannot say it. But what I did say was, that the act of the Senate of 1834 is free from the imputation of any criminal motives."]

Sir, (said Mr. B.,) this avowal is in character with the frank and manly nature of the Senator from Kentucky. It is no more than what I expected from him. The imputation of any improper motive to the President has been again and again disclaimed by other Senators upon this floor. The Senator from Kentucky has now boldly come out in his true colors, and avows the principles which he held at the time. He acknowledges that he did not acquit the President from improper intentions, when charging him with a violation of the constitution of his country.

This trial of the President before the Senate continued for three months. During this whole period, instead of the evidence which a judicial tribunal ought to receive, exciting memorials, signed by vast numbers of the people, and well calculated to inflame the passions of his judges, were poured in upon the Senate. He was denounced upon this floor by every odious epithet which belongs to tyrants. Finally, the obnoxious resolution was adopted by the vote of the Senate, on the 28th day of March, 1834.

After the exposition which I have made, can any impartial mind doubt but that this resolution intended to charge against the President a wilful and daring violation of the constitution and the laws? I think not.

The Senator from Kentucky has argued, with his usual power, that the functions of the Senate, acting in a legislative capacity, are not to be restricted, because it is possible that the same question, in another form, may come before us judicially. I concur in the truth and justice of this position. We must perform our legislative duties; and if, in the investigation of facts, having legislation distinctly in view, we should incidentally be led to the investigation of criminal charges, it is a necessity imposed upon us by our condition, from which we cannot escape. It results from the varying nature of our duties, and not from our own will. I admit that it would be difficult to mark the precise line which separates our legislative from our judicial functions. I shall not attempt it. In many cases, from necessity, they are in some degree intermingled. The present resolution, however, stands far in advance of this line. It is placed in bold relief, and is clear of all such difficulties. It is a mere naked resolution of censure. It refers solely to the past conduct of the President, and condemns it in the strongest terms, without even proposing any act of legislation by which the evil may be remedied hereafter. It was judgment upon the past alone; not prevention for the future. Nay, more: the resolution is so vague and general in its terms, that it is impossible to ascertain from its face the cause of the President's condemnation. The Senate have resolved that the Executive "has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both." What is the specification under this charge? Why, that he has acted thus, "in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue." What executive proceedings? The resolution leaves us entirely in the dark upon this subject. How could any legislation spring from such a resolution? It is impossible. None such was ever attempted.

If the resolution had preserved its original phraseology; if it had condemned the President for dismissing one Secretary of the Treasury because he would not remove the deposits, and for appointing his successor to effect this purpose, the Senator might then have contended that the evil was distinctly pointed out; and, although no legislation was proposed, the remedy might be applied hereafter. But he has deprived himself even of this feeble argument. He has left us upon an ocean of uncertainty, without chart or compass. "The late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue" is a phrase of the most general and indefinite character. Every Senator who voted in favor of this resolution may have acted upon different principles. To procure its passage, nothing more was necessary than that a majority should unite in the conclusion that the President had violated the constitution and the laws in some one or other of his numerous acts in relation to the public revenue. The views of Senators constituting the majority may have varied from each other to any conceivable extent; and yet they may have united in the final vote. That this was the fact to a considerable extent, I have always understood. It is utterly impossible either that such a proceeding could ever have been intended to become the basis of legislation, or that legislative action could have ever sprung from such a source.

I flatter myself, then, I have succeeded in proving that this resolution charged the President with a high official misdemeanor, wholly disconnected from legislation, which, if true, ought to have subjected him to impeachment.

This brings me directly to the question, had the Senate any power, under the constitution, to adopt such a resolution? In other words, can the Senate condemn a public officer, by a simple resolution, for an offence which would subject him to an impeachment? To state the proposition, is to answer this question in the negative. Dreadful would be the consequences, if we possess and should exercise such a power.

This body is invested with high and responsible powers, of a legislative, an executive, and a judicial character. No person can enter it until he has attained a mature age. Our term of service is longer than that of any other elective functionary. If Senators will have it so, it is the most aristocratic branch of our Government. For what purpose did the framers of the constitution confer upon it these varied and important powers, and this long tenure of office? The answer is plain. It was placed in this secure and elevated position that it might be above the storms of faction which so often inflame the passions of men. It never was intended to be an arena for political gladiators. Until the second session of the third Congress, the Senate always sat with closed doors, except in the single instance when the eligibility of Mr. Gallatin to a seat in the body was the subject under discussion. Of this particular practice, however, I cannot approve. I merely state it to show the intention of those who formed the constitution. I was informed by one of the most eminent statesmen and Senators which this country has ever produced, now no more, (the late Mr. King,) that for some years after the Federal Government commenced its operation, the debates of the Senate resembled conversations rather than speeches, and that it originated but few legislative measures. Senators were then critics rather than authors in legislation. Whether its gain in eloquence, since it has become a popular assembly, and since the sound of thundering applause has been heard in our galleries at the denunciation of the President, has been an equivalent for its loss in true dignity, may well be doubted. To give this body its just influence with the people, it ought to preserve itself as free as possible from angry political discussions. In the performance of our executive duties—in the ratification of treaties and in the confirmation of nominations—the constitution has connected us with the Executive. The efficient and successful administration of the Government, therefore, requires that we should move on together in as much harmony as may be consistent with the independent exercise of our respective functions.

But, above all, we should be the most cautious in guarding our judicial character from suspicion. We constitute the high court of impeachment of this nation, before which every officer of the Government may be arraigned. To this tribunal is committed the character of men, whose character is far dearer to them than their lives. We should be the rock, standing in the midst of the ocean, for the purpose of affording a shelter to the faithful officer from unjust persecution, against which the billows might dash themselves in vain. Whilst we are a terror to evil-doers, we should be a praise to those who do well. We should never voluntarily perform any act which might prejudice our judgment, or render us suspected as a judicial tribunal. More especially, when the President of the United States is arraigned at the bar of public opinion, for offences which might subject him to an impeachment, we should remain, not only chaste, but unsuspected. Better, infinitely better, would it be for us not to manifest our feeling, even in a case in which we were morally certain the House of Representatives would not prefer before us articles of impeachment, than to reach the object of our disapprobation by a usurpation of their rights. It is true that, when the Senate passed the resolution condemning the President, a majority in the House were of a different opinion. But the next elections might have changed that majority into a minority. The House might then have voted articles of impeachment against the President. Under such circumstances, I pray you to consider in what a condition the Senate would have been placed. They had already prejudged the case. They had already convicted the President, and denounced him to the world as a violator of the constitution. In criminal prosecutions, even against the greatest malefactor, if a juror has prejudged the cause, he cannot enter the jury-box. The Senate had rendered itself wholly incompetent, in this case, to perform its highest judicial functions. The trial of the President, had articles of impeachment been preferred against him, would have been but a solemn mockery of justice.

The constitution of the United States has carefully provided against such an enormous evil, by declaring that "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment," and "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." Until the accused is brought before us by the House, it is a manifest violation of our solemn duty to condemn him by a resolution.

If a court of criminal jurisdiction, without any indictment having been found by a grand jury, without having given the defendant notice to appear, without having afforded him an opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses against him, and making his defence, should resolve that he was guilty of a high crime, and place this conviction upon their records, all mankind would exclaim against the injustice and unconstitutionality of the act. Wherein consists the difference between this case and the condemnation of the President? In nothing, except that such a conviction by the Senate, on account of its exalted character, would fall with tenfold force upon its object. I have often been astonished, notwithstanding the extended and well-deserved popularity of General Jackson, that the moral influence of this condemnation by the Senate had not crushed him. With what tremendous effect might this assumed power of the Senate be used to blast the reputation of any man who might fall under its displeasure. The precedent is extremely dangerous, and the American people have wisely determined to blot it out forever.

It is painful to reflect what might have been the condition of the country, if, at the inauspicious moment of the passage of the resolution against the President, its interests and its honor had rendered it necessary to engage in a foreign war. The fearful consequences of such a condition, at such a moment, must strike every mind. Would the Senate then have confided to the President the necessary power to defend the country? Where could the sinews of war have been found? In what condition was this body at that moment to act upon an important treaty negotiated by the President, or upon any of his nominations? But I forbear to enlarge upon this topic.

I have now arrived at the last point in this discussion. Do the Senate possess the power, under the constitution, of expunging the resolution of March, 1834, from their journals, in the manner proposed by the Senator from Missouri? [Mr. BENTON.] I cheerfully admit that we must show that this is not contrary to the constitution; for we can never redress one violation of that instrument by committing another. Before I proceed to this branch of the subject, I shall put myself right by a brief historical reminiscence. I entered the Senate in December, 1834, fresh from the ranks of the people, without the slightest feeling of hostility against any Senator on this floor. I then thought that the resolution of the Senator from Missouri was too severe in proposing to expunge. Although I was anxious to record, in strong terms, my entire disapprobation of the resolution of March, 1834, yet I was willing to accomplish this object without doing more violence to the feelings of my associates on this floor than was absolutely necessary to justify the President. Actuated by these friendly motives, I exerted all my little influence with the Senator from Missouri, to induce him to abandon the word expunge, and substitute some others in its place. I knew that this word was exceedingly obnoxious to the Senators who had voted for the former resolution. Other friends of his also exerted their influence; and at length his kindly feeling prevailed, and he consented to abandon that word, although it was peculiarly dear to him. I speak from my own knowledge. "All which I saw, and part of which I was."

The resolution of the Senator from Missouri came before the Senate on the 3d of March, 1835. Under it the resolution of March, 1834, was "ordered to be expunged from the journal," for reasons appearing on its face, which I need not enumerate. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITE] moved to amend the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, by striking out the order to expunge, with the reasons for it, and inserting in their stead the words "rescinded, reversed, repealed, and declared to be null and void." Some difference of opinion then arose among the friends of the administration as to the words which should be substituted in place of the order to expunge. For the purpose of leaving this question perfectly open, you, sir, (Mr. KING, of Alabama, was in the chair,) then moved to amend the original motion of Mr. BENTON, by striking out the words "ordered to be expunged from the journal of the Senate." This motion prevailed, on the yeas and noes, by a vote 39 to 7; and amongst the yeas the name of the Senator from Missouri is recorded. The resolution was thus left a blank, in its most essential feature, ready to be filled up as the Senate might direct. The era of good feeling in regard to this subject had commenced. It was nipped in the bud, however, by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WENSTEN.] Whilst the resolution was still in blank, he rose in his place, and proclaimed the triumph of the constitution by the vote to strike out the word expunge, and then moved to lay the resolution on the table, declaring that he would neither withdraw his motion for friend nor foe. This motion precluded all amendment and all debate. It prevailed by a party vote; and thus we were left with our resolution a blank. Such was the manner in which the Senators in opposition received our advances of courtesy and kindness, in the moment of their strength and our weakness. Had the Senator from Massachusetts suffered us to proceed but for five minutes, we should have filled up the blank in the resolution. It would then have assumed a distinct form, and they would never afterwards have heard of the word expunge. We should have been content with the words "rescinded, reversed, repealed, and declared to be null and void." But the conduct of the Senator from Massachusetts on that occasion, and that of the party with which he acted, roused the indignation of every friend of the administration on this floor. We then determined that the word expunge should never again be surrendered.

The Senator from Kentucky has introduced a precedent from the proceedings of the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of proving that we have no right to adopt this resolution. To this I can have no possible objection. But I can tell the Senator, if I were convinced that I had voted wrong when comparatively a boy, more than twenty years ago, the fear of being termed inconsistent would not now deter me from voting right upon the same question. I do not, however, repent of my vote upon that occasion. I would now vote in the same manner, under similar circumstances. I should not vote to expunge, under any circumstances, any proceeding from the journals, by obliterating the record. If I do not prove, before I take my seat, that the case in the Legislature of Pennsylvania was essentially different from that now before the Senate, I shall agree to be proclaimed inconsistent and time-serving.

It was my settled conviction, at the commencement of the last session of Congress, that the Senate had no power to obliterate their journal. This was shaken, but not removed, by the argument of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. PORTER,] who confessedly made the ablest speech on the other side of the question. The constitution declares that "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy." What was the position which that Senator then attempted to maintain? In order to prove that we had no power to obliterate or destroy our journals, he thought it necessary to contend that the word "keep," as used in the constitution, means both to record and to preserve. This appeared to me to be a mere begging of the question.

I shall attempt no definition of the word "keep." At least since the days of Plato, we know that definitions have been dangerous. Yet I think that the meaning of this word, as applied to the subject-matter, is so plain, that he who runs may read. If I direct my agent to keep a journal of his proceedings, and publish the same, my palpable meaning is, that he shall write these proceedings down from day to day, and publish what he has written, for general information. After he has obeyed my commands, after he has kept his journal and published it to the world, he has executed the essential part of the trust confided to him. What may become of this original manuscript journal afterwards, is a matter of total indifference. So in regard to the manuscript journals of either House of Congress: after more than a thousand copies have been printed and published, and distributed over the Union, it is matter of not the least importance what disposition may be made of them. They have answered their purpose, and, in any practical view, become useless. If they were burnt, or otherwise destroyed, it would not be an event of the slightest public consequence. Such indifference has prevailed upon this subject, that these journals have been considered, in the House of Representatives, as so much waste paper, and, during a period of thirty-four years after the organization of the Government they were actually destroyed. (Vide the Appendix.) From this circumstance, no public or private inconvenience has been or ever can be sustained; because our printed journals are received in evidence in all courts of justice, in the same manner as if the originals were produced.

The Senator from Louisiana has discovered that to "keep" means both "to record" and "to preserve." But can you give this, or any other word in the English language, two distinct and independent meanings at the same time, as applied to the same subject? I think not. From the imperfection of human language, from the impossibility of having appropriate words to express every idea, the same word, as applied to different subjects, has a variety of significations. As applied to any one subject, it cannot, at the same time, convey two distinct meanings. In the constitution it must mean either "to write down," or "to preserve." It cannot have both significations. Let Senators, then, take their choice. If it signifies "to write down," as it unquestionably does, what becomes of the constitutional injunction to preserve? The truth is, that the constitution has not provided what shall be done with the manuscript journal, after it has served the purposes for which it was called into existence. When it has been published to the people of the United States, for whose use it was ordered to be kept, after it has thus been perpetuated, and they have been furnished with the means of judging of the public conduct of their public servants, it ceases to be an object of the least importance. Whether it be thrown into the garret of the Capitol, with other useless lumber, or be destroyed, is a matter of no public interest. It has probably never once been referred to in the history of our Government. If it should ever be determined to be a violation of the constitution to obliterate or destroy this manuscript journal, it must be upon different principles from those which have been urged in this debate. My own impression is, that, as the framers of the constitution have directed us to keep a journal, a constructive duty may be implied from this command, which would forbid us to obliterate or destroy it. Under this impression, I should vote, as I did twenty years ago, in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, against any proposition actually to expunge any part of the journal. But, waiving this unprofitable discussion, let us proceed to the real point in controversy.

Expunging Resolution.

Is any such proceeding as that of actually expunging the journal proposed by the resolution of the Senator from Missouri? I answer, no such thing. If the constitution had, in express terms, directed us to record and to preserve a journal of our proceedings, there is nothing in the resolution now before us, which would be inconsistent with such a provision.

Is the drawing of a black line around the resolution of the Senate of March, 1834, to obliterate or to deface it? On the contrary, is it not to render it more conspicuous—to place it in bold relief—to give it a prominence in the public view beyond any other proceeding of this body in past, and, I trust, in all future time? If the argument of Senators were, not that we have no power to obliterate, but that the Senate possessed no power to render one portion of the journal more conspicuous than another, it would have had much greater force. Why, sir, by means of this very proceeding, that portion of our journal upon which it operates will be rescued from a slumber which would otherwise have been eternal, and facsimiles of the original resolution, without a word or a letter defaced, will be circulated over the whole Union.

But, sir, this resolution also directs that across the face of the condemnatory resolution there shall be written by the Secretary, "Expunged by order of the Senate, this — day of —, in the year of our Lord 1837."

Will this obliterate any part of the original resolution? If it does, the duty of the Secretary will be performed in a very bungling manner. No such thing is intended. It would be easy to remove every scruple from every mind upon this subject, by amending the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, so as to direct the Secretary to perform his duty in such a manner as not to obliterate any part of the condemnatory resolution. Such a direction, however, appears to me to be wholly unnecessary. The nature of the whole proceeding is very plain. We now adopt a resolution expressing our strong reprobation of the original resolution; and for this purpose we use the word "expunged," as the strongest term which we can apply. We then direct our Secretary to draw black lines around it, and place such a reference to our proceedings of this day upon its face, that in all time to come, whoever may inspect this portion of our journal, will be pointed at once to the record of its condemnation. What lawyer has not observed upon the margin of the judgment docket, if the original judgment has been removed to a superior court, and there reversed, a minute of such reversal? In our editions of the statutes, have we not all noted the repeal of any of them which may have taken place at a subsequent period? Who ever heard, in the one case or in the other, that this was obliterating or destroying the record or the book? So, in this case, we make a mere reference to our future proceeding upon the face of the resolution, instead of the margin. Suppose we should only repeal the obnoxious resolution, and direct such a reference to be made upon its face: would any Senator contend that this would be an obliteration of the journal?

But it has been contended that the word expunge is not the appropriate word; and we have wrested it from its true signification, in applying it to the present case. Even if this allegation were correct, the answer would be at hand. You might then convict us of bad taste, but not of a violation of the constitution. On the face of the resolution we have stated distinctly what we mean. We have directed the Secretary in what manner he shall understand it, and we have excluded the idea that it is our intention to obliterate or to destroy the journal.

But I shall contend that the word expunge is the appropriate word, and that there is not another in the English language so precisely adapted to convey our meaning. I shall show from the highest literary and parliamentary authorities, that this word has acquired a signification entirely distinct from that of actual obliteration. Let me proceed immediately to this task. After citing my authorities, I shall proceed with the argument. First, then, for those of a literary character. I read from Crabbe's Synonymes, page 140; and every Senator will admit that this is a work of established reputation. In speaking of the use of the word "expunge," the author says: "When the contents of a book are in part rejected, they are aptly described as being expunged; in this manner the free-thinking sects expunge every thing from the Bible which does not suit their purpose, or they expunge from their creed what does not humor their passions." The idea that an actual obliteration was intended in these cases would be manifestly absurd. In the same page there is a quotation from Mr Burke, to illustrate the meaning of this word. "I believe," says he, "that any person who was of age to take a part in public concerns forty years ago (if the intermediate space were expunged from his memory) could hardly credit his senses when he should hear that an army of two hundred thousand men was kept up in this island." I shall now cite Mr. Jefferson as a literary authority. He has often been referred to on this floor as a standard in politics. For this high authority, I am indebted to my friend from Louisiana, [Mr. NICHOLAS.] In the original draught of the declaration of independence he uses the word "expunge" in following manner: "Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to expunge their former systems of government." Although the word "alter" was afterwards substituted for expunge, I presume upon the ground that this was too strong a term, yet the change does not detract from the literary authority of the precedent.—Jefferson's Correspondence, &c. 1st vol. page 17.

I presume that I have shown that the word "expunge" has acquired a distinct metaphorical meaning in our literature, which excludes the idea of actual obliteration. If I should proceed one step further, and prove that, in legislative proceedings, it has acquired the very same signification, I shall then have fully established my position. For this purpose I cite, first, "the Secret Proceedings and Debates of the Federal Convention." In page 118 we find the following entries: "On motion to expunge the clause of the qualification as to age, it was carried—ten States against one." Again: "On the clause respecting the ineligibility to any other office, it was moved that the words 'by any particular State' be expunged—four States for, five against, and two divided." So, page 119: "The last blank was filled up with one year, and carried—eight ayes, two noes, one divided."

"Mr. Pinckney moved to expunge the clause—agreed to, nem. con." Again: "Mr. Butler moved to expunge the clause of the stipends—lost; seven against, three for, one divided." Again, in page 157: "Mr. Pinckney moved that that part of the clause which disqualifies a person from holding an office in the State be expunged, because the first and best characters in a State may thereby be deprived of a seat in the national council."

"Question put to strike out the words moved for, and carried—eight ayes, three noes."

It will thus be perceived that in the proceedings of the very convention which formed the constitution up

SENATE.]

Expunging Resolution.

der which we are now governed, the word "expunge" was often used in its figurative sense. It will certainly not be asserted, or even intimated, by any Senator here, that when these motions to expunge prevailed, the words of the original draught of the constitution were actually obliterated or defaced. The meaning is palpable. These provisions were merely rejected; not actually blotted out.

But I shall now produce a precedent precisely in point. It presents itself in the proceedings of the Senate of Massachusetts, and refers to the famous resolution of that body adopted on the 15th day of June, 1813, in relation to the capture of the British vessel Peacock; denouncing the late war, and declaring that it was not becoming in a moral and religious people to express any approbation of military or naval exploits which were not immediately connected with the defence of our seacoast. Some ten years afterwards, a succeeding Senate of Massachusetts adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the aforesaid resolve of the fifteenth day of June, A. D. 1813, and the preamble thereof, be, and the same are hereby, expunged from the journals of the Senate."

It is self-evident that, in this case, not the least intention existed of defacing the old manuscript journal. The word "expunge" was used in its figurative signification, just as it is in the case before us, to express the strongest reprobation of the former proceeding. That proceeding was to be expunged solely by force of the subsequent resolution, and not by any actual obliteration. There never was any actual obliteration of the journal.

Judging, then, from the highest English authorities, from the works of celebrated authors and statesmen, and from the proceedings of legislative bodies, is it not evident that the word "expunge" has acquired a distinct meaning, altogether inconsistent with any actual obliteration?

All that we have heard about defacing and destroying the journal are mere phantoms, which have been conjured up to terrify the timid. We intend no such thing. We only mean, most strongly, to express our conviction that the condemnatory resolution ought never to have found a place on the journal. If more authorities were wanted, I might refer to the Legislature of Virginia. The present expunging resolution is in exact conformity with their instructions to their Senators. As a matter of taste, I cannot say that I much admire their plan, though I entertain no doubt that it is perfectly constitutional. That State is highly literary; and I think I have established that their Legislature, when they used the word "expunge," without intending thereby to effect an actual obliteration of the journal, justly appreciated the meaning of the language which they employed.

The word "expunge" is, in my opinion, the only one which we could have used, clearly and forcibly to accomplish our purpose. Even if it had not been sanctioned by practice as a parliamentary word, we ought ourselves to have first established the precedent. It suits the case precisely. If you rescind, reverse, or repeal, a resolution, you thereby admit that it once had some constitutional or legal authority. If you declare it to have been null and void from the beginning, this is but the expression of your own opinion that such was the fact. This word "expunge" acts upon the resolution itself. It at once goes to its origin, and destroys its legal existence, as if it had never been. It does not merely kill, but it annihilates.

Parliamentary practice has changed the meaning of several other words from their primitive signification, in a similar manner with that of the word "expunge." The original signification of the word "rescind" is "to cut off." Usage has made it mean, in reference to a law or resolution, to abrogate or repeal it. We every day hear motions "to strike out." What is the literal meaning of this expression? The question may be best answered by asking another. If I were to request you to strike out a line from your letter, and you were willing to comply with my request, what would be your conduct? You would run your pen through it immediately. You would literally strike it out. Yet, what use do we make of this phrase every day in our legislative proceedings? If I make a motion to strike out a section from a bill, and it prevails, the Secretary encloses the printed copy of it in black lines, and makes a note on the margin that it has been stricken out. The original he never touches. Why, then, should not the word "expunge," without obliterating the proceeding to which it is directed, signify to destroy, as if it never had existed?

After all that has been said, I think I need scarcely again recur to the Pennsylvania precedent. It is evident, from the whole of that proceeding, that an actual expunging of the journal was intended, if it had not already been executed. I have no recollection whatever of the circumstances, but I am under a perfect conviction, from the face of the journal, that such was the nature of the case. I should vote now as I did then, after a period of more than twenty years. Both my vote, and the motion which I subsequently made upon that occasion, evidently proceeded upon this principle. The question arose in this manner, as it appears from the journal: On the 10th of February, 1816, "The Speaker informed the House that a constitutional question being involved in a decision by him yesterday, on a motion to expunge certain proceedings from the journal, he was desirous of having the opinion of the House on that decision," viz: "that a majority can expunge from the journal proceedings in which the yeas and nays have not been called." Now, as no trace whatever appears upon the journal of the preceding day of the motion to which the Speaker refers, it is highly probable, nay, it is almost certain, that the proceedings had been actually expunged before he asked the advice of the House.

No man feels with more sensibility the necessity which compels him to perform an unkind act towards his brother Senators than myself; but we have now arrived at that point when imperious duty demands that we should either adopt this expunging resolution or abandon it forever. Already much precious time has been employed in its discussion. The moment has arrived when we must act. Senators in the opposition console themselves with the belief that posterity will do them justice, should it be denied to them by the present generation. They place their own names in the one scale, and ours in the other, and flatter themselves with the hope that, before that tribunal at least, their weight will preponderate. For my own part, I am willing to abide the issue. I am willing to be judged for the vote which I shall give to-day, not only by the present, but by future generations, should my obscure name ever be mentioned in after-times. After the passions and prejudices of the present moment shall have subsided, and the impartial historian shall record the proceeding of this day, he will say that the distinguished men who passed the resolution condemning the President were urged on to the act by a desire to occupy the high places in the Government; that an ambition, noble in itself, but not wisely regulated, had obscured their judgment, and impelled them to the adoption of a measure unjust, illegal, and unconstitutional; that, in order to vindicate both the constitution and the President, we were justified in passing this expunging resolution, and thus stamping the former proceeding with our strongest disapprobation.

I rejoice in the belief that this promises to be one of the last highly exciting questions of the present day. During the period of General Jackson's civil administration, what has he not done for the American people? During this period, he has had more difficult and dangerous questions to settle, both at home and abroad—questions which aroused more intensely the passions of men—than any of his predecessors. They are now all happily ended, except the one which we shall this day bring to a close—

"And all the clouds that lowered upon our house
In the deep bosom of the ocean buried."

The country now enjoys abundant prosperity at home, whilst it is respected and admired by foreign nations. Although the waves may yet be in some agitation from the effect of the storms through which we have passed, yet I think I can perceive the rainbow of peace extending itself across the firmament of heaven.

Should the next administration pursue the same course of policy with the present; should it dispense equal justice to all portions and all interests of the Union, without sacrificing any; should it be conducted with prudence and with firmness, and I doubt not but that this will be the case, we shall hereafter enjoy comparative peace and quiet in our day. This will be the precious fruit of the energy, the toils, and the wisdom of the pilot who has conducted us in safety through the storms of his tempestuous administration.

I am now prepared for the question. I shall vote for this resolution, but not cheerfully. I regret the necessity which exists for passing it; but I believe that imperative duty demands its adoption. If I know my own heart, I can truly say that I am not actuated by any desire to obtain a miserable, petty, personal triumph, either for myself, or for the President of the United States, over my associates upon this floor.

I am now ready to record my vote, and thus, in the opprobrious language of Senators in the opposition, to become one of the executioners of the condemnatory resolution.

OFFICE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S.,

April 6, 1836.

I entered this office a youth, under John Beckley, who was the first Clerk of the House of Representatives under the present constitution of the United States, and who died in the year 1807.

During the recess of Congress, he put me at what was termed "recording the journal" of the preceding session, which was to write it off from the printed copy into a large bound volume. I inquired of him why it was that it was copied, when there were so many printed copies? He answered, that the printed copies would probably, in time, disappear from use, &c., the large manuscript volume would not.

The "rough journal," as it was then termed, and is still termed, being the original rough draught read in the House on the morning after the day of which it narrates the proceedings, was not, and had not from the beginning, been preserved. I inquired the reason, and was answered, that the printed copy was the official copy, as it was printed under the official order of the House; and as errors, which were sometimes discovered in the rough journal, were corrected in the proofs of the printed copy, the printed copy was the most correct; and that, therefore, there was no use in lumbering the office with the "rough journal," after it had been printed.

Two of Mr. Beckley's immediate successors in office, Mr. Magruder and Mr. Dougherty, viewed the matter as Mr. Beckley viewed it. I know the fact from having called their attention to the subject. I often reflected upon the subject, and it appeared to me to be proper that the "rough journal" should be preserved, although I could not see any purpose whatever to be answered by doing so. I often conversed with the clerks of the office upon the subject; but, as we were only subordinates, the practice was not changed till the 1st session of the 18th Congress, (1823-'24,) when I determined, without consulting my superior, that the "rough journal" should no longer be thrown away, but be preserved and bound in volumes; and it has been regularly preserved and bound since.

With great respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,
S. BURCH.

Colonel WALTER S. FRANKLIN,
Clerk House of Representatives U. S.

When Mr. BUCHANAN had taken his seat,

Mr. BAYARD rose and said that, notwithstanding he had not before had an opportunity of expressing his opinion on the subject now under discussion, yet he should have been unwilling at this late hour to have trespassed on the time and attention of the Senate, had he not felt it to be a duty which he owed to himself and to his immediate constituents to contend and protest against a measure which he believed to be a violation of the constitution. I say, sir, constituents, for, in my theory of this Government, we are all the representatives of the people, though chosen after a different manner. Every infraction of the constitution, however unimportant it may appear in its immediate consequences, tends to diminish the general confidence in the stability of our Government, and the general attachment to it; and as the people of the State I have the honor in part to represent are devotedly attached to that instrument, and feel that their political existence is incorporated with it, that in it they live, and move, and have their being as a political community, I say, sir, it is a duty which I owe to them to contend to the uttermost of my ability against whatever thus incidentally affects them. It is a duty, too, which I owe to myself, as I have a personal interest in whatever affects the character and honor of this body, of which I am a humble member.

I have no intention, Mr. President, to inquire into the motives which may lead gentlemen to the adoption of this resolution. The motives of every man are his individual property; and as his action here, in relation to this matter, is under the sanction of an oath, they involve a responsibility only to his conscience and his God. I cannot say, sir, that the act which is now required to be done is a sacrifice to the Moloch of party spirit. I cannot say that it is a homage to an idol resembling that which the Chinese pays to his household god when he burns before it a little piece of gilt paper as the humble offering of his piety and adoration. Nor can I say, sir, that it is intended to smooth the mane and calm the roar of the lion. All these views belong to the class of motives with which I have nothing to do. But, sir, I have something to say and something to do with the doctrines advanced and the acts done here, which become part of the common stock. If it seems from the nature of the act done, and from the insufficiency of the reasons given for it, to be an act of homage at the footstool of executive power, I have, then, a personal interest in the matter, which not only justifies my doing so, but makes it a matter of duty to express my opinions as well as to record my vote. And, sir, it becomes the more necessary and proper to express those opinions, since if this principle of expunction be adopted, I have no security that the record of that vote may not be destroyed, if hereafter it should become expedient to give to the resolution the appearance of unanimous approbation.

What is it, sir, we are called upon to do? A man may do wrong unwittingly, and we must take care to have a clear and precise idea of the act to be done. In words, sir, we are called upon to expunge from the journal a certain resolution, but in fact and in truth to falsify a record. The same mind which might contemplate the one proposition with indifference, would regard the other with horror. To a mind reckless of consequences, which has no future, which looks only to the present, and views every act as an insulated event, having no relation to what has preceded, and no influence on what is to follow, to expunge from a journal may seem a very harmless act. But, sir, even such a mind might be brought to revolt with disgust from the same measure, when it imported the suppression of the truth, or the assertion of a falsehood. The approaches of crime are stealthy and mysterious; the assassin wears his mask; vice pays to virtue the homage of assuming her form; the knave puts on the cloak of religion; the demagogue becomes the friend of the people. It becomes, then, my purpose, to show that to expunge from the journal is to falsify a record.

Let me now draw the attention of the Senate to the terms of the resolution. It professes to set forth the act to be done, and the reasons for doing it. And first, sir, as to the act itself. It is described in these terms:

"Resolved, That the said resolve be expunged from the journal, and for that purpose that the Secretary of the Senate, at such time as the Senate may appoint, shall bring the manuscript journal of the session of 1833-'4 into the Senate, and in the presence of the Senate draw black lines round the said resolve, and write across the face thereof, in strong letters, the following words: Expunged by order of the Senate, this _____ day of _____, in the year of our Lord 1836."

Nothing can be more explicit in its terms. The act to be done is to expunge. The first member of the sentence conveys the whole idea; and if the resolution had stopped there, with the simple assertion that an expunction should take place, there cannot be a doubt that the Secretary would have been authorized to blot out or erase from the journal the objectionable passage. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] has gone into a critical examination of the meaning of the term expunge, and has given us various instances of its use in a metaphorical sense, and concludes that, because the word may be used metaphorically, it is in this instance a harmless metaphor. In all its uses, whether literal or metaphorical, it imports destruction; and the beauty and force of the metaphor in every instance depends on the precise meaning of its literal acceptance. The term expunge means literally to wipe out, which imports destruction; or, in other words, it imports that something which has an existence shall cease to exist. Whether the term is at any time used literally or metaphorically, will depend on the subject-matter to which it is applied. Thus, in some of the instances given by the Senator from Pennsylvania, as in the one "to expunge our sins," no doubt the word is used metaphorically; but does not the whole force and value of the expression depend on its literal meaning, and import that those sins shall cease to have a moral existence as reasons for the Divine vengeance? And when used as applicable to a section of a bill, which is another instance given by the Senator, does it not mean that such section shall cease to have existence?

The Senator asks whether, if a resolution passed that a section of a bill should be expunged, the Secretary would proceed to obliterate it? I answer, that from the method of our proceedings it is not necessary for him to erase every word, because the purpose is effectually answered by drawing his black lines across it, or simply writing upon its face the word "expunged," for in effect it becomes so, by ceasing to have any legal existence; and if such bill were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, the section thus expunged would be omitted in the engrossment, as if it had never existed. But the authority conferred upon him by such a resolution is literally to erase every word of the section. Such, also, is the case when the word is used in relation to a part of the journal, and becomes his duty to blot out or obliterate from its face the passage ordered to be expunged. But it is said that the present resolution does not contemplate an actual expunction or obliteration of the passage, but merely a typical one. And Senators seek to reconcile themselves to this measure by such a play upon words. A typical expunction! To get rid of the sophistry at once, let me ask whether a journal is not the evidence of a fact, as, for instance, the passage of a particular resolution, and whether to expunge from the journal that resolution is not to destroy the evidence of the fact that such a resolution had been adopted? If, then, you have the right to expunge, and do actually declare that a passage shall be expunged, does it not for all legal purposes suppress the evidence of the fact, no matter what the manner of expunction may be, whether by erasing, by blotting out, or by writing the word "expunged" over its face? Could the Secretary certify, after the adoption of the expunging resolution, that such a passage existed on the journal? If he were called upon to publish a new edition of the journal, would he have a right to insert the passage expunged? It is in vain that the assertion is made that the printed volumes would be evidence of the fact. The printed volumes are only prima facie evidence, and admitted for convenience, but could never stand against a sworn copy of the journal. There is, then, for all the purposes for which a journal is kept, namely, as evidence of a particular transaction, no difference between an actual and a typical expunction. That in the present instance no grave and immediate consequence affecting individual rights is to follow, does not alter the case. The principle asserted in the resolution is, that the right to expunge exists, the mode of doing it is of no consequence; and I will show presently that the exercise of such a power is not only unconstitutional, but may be attended with the most important and direct influence on the personal rights of individuals. The natural import and the necessary legal effect of the phrase "expunge from the journal," is to destroy the evidence of the fact expunged, whether it be used literally or metaphorically.

Having thus ascertained the meaning of the word "expunge" and the effect of any mode of expunction, the question arises whether the Senate possesses any such power over its journal. Has it the right to destroy the evidence of a particular transaction, for the journal is not only the highest evidence, but the only evidence of the fact? A journal is a daily record, as contradistinguished from a temporary memorandum. But it is contended that, though a record, it is not a permanent one, being of value only until it is published; after which, it becomes mere waste paper. Is this proposition true? For if it be, then, so far as this particular case is concerned, there is an end of the question. The language of the constitution is, "that each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same." Resort has been had to the meaning of the word "keep," as importing preservation, to show that the constitution contemplated a permanent, and not a temporary record. But I admit that the word "keep" does not necessarily imply permanent preservation; it may mean preservation for a temporary purpose. The word "keep," like every other word in the language, must depend for its meaning on the manner in which it is used, on the subject-matter to which it is applied. Words are but signs of ideas, and it is one of the imperfections of language, that it often expresses too much or too little, while felicity in its use consists in the choice of those terms which convey either the simple or complex idea with precision. A word, too, may stand for a whole sentence, for a class of ideas, as in the familiar use of this very one. Thus, to keep a horse may not merely mean that he is fed, and curried, and stabled, but that he is rode; as, where the conversation being about the personal habit of any one in relation to exercise, it should be remarked of him he keeps a horse, the term imports both preservation and use. So in the phrase "keep a cow," the use for which she is kept is implied, as if a housekeeper were asked, "Do you buy your milk?" and should reply, "No, I keep a cow," it imports not only that she is fed and taken care of, but that she is milked, and her milk consumed by the family. So, "keep a carriage" does not merely mean that a carriage is locked up in the house, but that it is used. "Keep house" imports the burden of household duties; as "keep tavern" imports the duty of receiving and attending to guests. There cannot be a doubt that the phrase "keep a journal" means to make and preserve one. But still the question arises as to the length of that preservation; and it is contended that the subsequent injunction to publish indicates at once the purpose and length of preservation. Is this true? The words are "keep and publish," not "keep in order to publish." But waiving all verbal criticism, let me remark that a constitution is merely a collection of principles; and in order to ascertain the force and meaning of any term, it is necessary to attend to the object of the provision, and the principle connected with it. What, then, sir, are the purposes for which a journal is to be kept? I do not pretend to give them all, but some of them, as drawn from the constitution itself; and it will then be seen whether such purposes are of a temporary or permanent character, and, by consequence, whether the journal is intended to be a permanent or temporary record. In the first place, it is intended to record the day on which a bill has been presented to the President for his approbation, and the day on which Congress adjourned; for on these two facts may depend the validity of a law. Thus, in the seventh section of the first article of the constitution, it is provided:

Expunging Resolution.

"Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the House in which it originated, &c. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall become a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case, it shall not be a law."

Here is one permanent purpose, as enduring as the law itself.

In the second place, it is intended to record the fact of membership in this body, the Senate being the judge, and settling the question of membership in cases of contested election, by the express provision of the fifth section of the first article of the constitution. And this was done in the case of the venerable and distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ROBBINS.] Has not he, and has not his State, a permanent interest in that decision, and in the evidence by which it is established? And is not the journal the highest and the only evidence of that fact? Suppose, sir, it should become expedient at any time to expunge such a decision, what would become of the rights of the Senator from Rhode Island, if a competitor were to present himself here for his seat, with fresh credentials from his State?

In the third place, it is intended to record the presence of a quorum at the opening of each session of Congress, as well as to ascertain the fact that Congress did assemble on the constitutional day for its meeting. The journal always opens with a statement of the names of those who assembled, when it is once ascertained that a quorum is present; it is afterwards taken for granted that they perform their duty, and are always present, unless the contrary is made to appear. But if it so happened that no quorum was present, or that Congress had assembled before it had a legal right to do so, the laws passed under such circumstances would be merely void. This, certainly, is a matter of permanent importance.

In the fourth place, it is intended to record the action of this body on the conduct of its members, as in the instance of the punishment of any of them for disorderly behaviour. Suppose the case of the expulsion of a member: will not the right of the State from which he comes to send a successor depend on the fact of expulsion? And could you, by expunging the resolution of expulsion, restore him to his seat? And yet, if you destroy the evidence of the expulsion, is there any thing to invalidate his rights as established by his credentials when he first took his seat? Suppose he was elected for six years, and you expel him at the expiration of the second, and then expunge the resolution of expulsion, how would it be possible to contest his right to a seat for the remaining four years?

In the fifth place, it is intended to ascertain the fact of your organization as a court of impeachment, and the judgment passed on the offender. That judgment may extend to a removal from office, and a disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, which in its nature is perpetual, and is excepted out of the pardoning power which is given to the President in all other cases.

In the sixth and last place which I mean to advert to, it is intended to record the votes of members on matters of moment, that they may be held to their responsibility for pernicious measures. And hence it is expressly provided, in the fifth section of the first article, "that the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one fifth of those present, be entered on the journal." Has not every individual a personal and permanent interest in the record, for good or for evil? This last purpose has reference to the great principle on which republican government is founded—the responsibility of the representative to his constituents. From a consideration, then, of the purposes for which a journal is to be kept, it is apparent that it is intended to be a permanent and not a temporary record. None of those purposes would be effectually answered by the mere publication of the journal. They are matters of fact, of which the journal, I mean the manuscript journal, is the highest evidence, and the only evidence where recourse is had to it, for any legal purpose. To expunge this record is to destroy the evidence of a fact; to falsify history, and verify the remark of the satirical Frenchman, that history is nothing but conventional fables. Let me add, in relation to this matter, that the suppressio veri differs nothing in point of morality from the allegatio falsi, and that it would be as hard to maintain that you have a right to suppress the evidence of a fact which had occurred in your proceedings, as to maintain that you have the right to assert a fact upon your journal which never had any existence. But it has been contended by some, that, because, we have the custody of the journal, we have the right to do with it what we please. And does custody import the right of destruction? Will it be contended that the Secretary of State, who has the custody of your laws and treaties, and even of the constitution itself, has, from that circumstance, the right to blot out sections from your laws, articles from your treaties, and paragraphs from your constitution; that he has the right to mutilate and destroy the records of the nation? In considering his right of expunction, the question is not whether the substance of the resolution proposed to be expunged is true, but whether such a resolution was adopted; that is the point of history. The existence on the journal of the resolution is no evidence of the truth of its allegation, but simply of its adoption; and the future historian, looking to the whole transactions of the time, would decide upon the truth or error of its allegation, without giving to it any greater weight than is due to the mere expression of an opinion. Every Senator who voted for the original resolution has a personal interest in the record.

Expunging Resolution.

If it is true that to pass such a resolution was illegal and unconstitutional, and a flagrant wrong done to the President of the United States, then his friends should not desire to have it expunged, but, on the contrary, to preserve it as a monument of reproach to those who participated in the measure. In this view of the subject, it should be preserved as a matter of satisfaction on the part of his friends, and of disgrace and shame on the part of his adversaries. And, on the other hand, if the right existed to pass the resolution, and its allegation was true in point of fact, those who sustained it by their vote have an interest in the evidence of their opinion, while those who thought otherwise have the benefit and satisfaction of being able to establish their dissent. In neither view of the case have the friends of the President any fair reason to desire that the evidence of the proceeding should be destroyed. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] may glory in the vote he gave on the occasion; the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] may do the same; neither has the right to deprive the other of the evidence of his course in relation to it. Those who voted for the resolution alone hazard any thing in preserving that evidence. If they were wrong, then it is for their shame; if they were right, it is the mere expression of an opinion from which others might rightfully and sincerely differ. If the allegations of the friends of the President are true, that the adoption of that resolution was a breach of the constitution, and a most flagrant wrong to him, would it not be more natural that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] should come here to ask us to expunge it, that he might conceal his participation in the matter? Is it not extraordinary that the Senator from Missouri, who takes great credit to himself for resisting the measure, should seek not only to conceal his own glory in opposing it, but the shame of his adversaries in supporting it? What is the purpose to be answered by expunging the resolution? The fact that such a resolution was adopted cannot now be concealed from the eye of history. The journal is only evidence of that fact, and not of the truth of the allegation contained in it. What valuable end, then, is to be accomplished by the expunction? I fear, sir, that the future historian, looking over the whole ground of the controversy, will say, from the nature of the act, that it was a sacrifice, a peace-offering at the altar of executive power. In this view, we have all an interest in the record of the proceedings of this day, for good or for evil report.

But sir, I come now to consider the reasons which are offered for the adoption of this expunging resolution. They are set forth in the preamble, and I presume they are the best that can be offered. They have been well weighed and considered, and no doubt the ability of the Senator from Missouri has been taxed to the uttermost to present the case in the strongest possible point of view. His reasons are eight in number, and the first of them is in these words:

"And whereas the said resolve was irregularly, illegally, and unconstitutionally adopted by the Senate, in violation of the rights of defence which belong to every citizen, and in subversion of the fundamental principles of law and justice: because President Jackson was thereby adjudged and pronounced to be guilty of an impeachable offence, and a stigma placed upon him as a violator of his oath of office and of the laws and constitution, which he was sworn to preserve, protect, and defend, without going through the forms of an impeachment, and without allowing to him the benefits of a trial or the means of defence."

Is this true in point of fact? The proceeding of which this reason professes to be descriptive was this: On the 28th day of March, 1834, the Senate, in its usual course of business, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

Is this first reason, then, a true description of the subject to which it refers? If the Senate had organized itself into a court of impeachment, called in the Chief Justice to preside, as required by the constitution, and then proceeded to try the President without hearing him, and to pronounce judgment upon him of removal from office, more could not have been said; no stronger language would be required to describe so wanton a violation of constitutional law. Is there no difference between the cases? Can a stronger case of the perversion and abuse of language be put than this, which would represent a simple resolution of a deliberative assembly, expressing merely an opinion, which has no legal effect whatever on the rights of the individual, as the judgment of a court which acts directly and immediately upon those rights? The proceeding referred to has neither the form nor substance of a judgment. Nor is the slightest guilt imputed in the opinion as expressed by the resolution. It states a fact, "that the President has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution;" but is silent as to the motives and intention with which that fact was accompanied, the corrupt and wilful character of which alone could give to the proceeding the attribute of guilt. But suppose, for a moment, that the Senate had, losing sight of the principles of law and justice, formed itself into a court of impeachment, and proceeded, without a hearing, to pass judgment on the individual: would that be a reason for expunging the record, for suppressing the evidence of so monstrous a proceeding? On the contrary, sir, it should stand as a monument of disgrace and dishonor to the men who participated in it. Its legal effect would be nothing; its moral influence would recoil on their own heads, and they should be held to that responsibility to public opinion, to secure which it was provided that the yeas and nays should be entered on the journal. In this view of the subject, the hollowness and fallacy of the reason assigned is manifested by the fact that those who seek to suppress the evidence are not those who advocated, but those who opposed the resolution. But, sir, it is the fate of a false position to embody the principles of its own destruction. If this reason be a true description of the resolution of 28th March, 1834, and sufficient for its expunction, is it not perceived that this very expunging resolution and its preamble is open to the same objection, as pronouncing judgment on those Senators who supported the former, as guilty of an impeachable offence, and violators of their oaths of office, without the benefit of a trial? It should, then, in its turn, be expunged; and if I were called upon to draw up a preamble upon the strength of this precedent, I should use the same language, as being as fair and legitimate a description of the present resolution and its preamble as this reason is descriptive of the resolution of March 28, 1834. It is absolutely suicidal.

The second reason is as follows:

"And whereas the said resolve, in all its shapes and forms, was unfounded and erroneous in point of fact, and, therefore, unjust and unrighteous, as well as irregular and unconstitutional; because the said President Jackson, neither in the act of dismissing Mr. Duane, nor in the appointment of Mr. Taney, as specified in the first form of the resolve; nor in taking upon himself the removing of the deposits, as specified in the second form of the same resolve; nor in any act which was then or can now be specified under the vague and ambiguous terms of the general denunciation contained in the third and last form of the resolve, did do or commit any act in violation or in derogation of the laws and constitution, or dangerous to the liberties of the people."

Expunging Resolution.

The substance of this reason is, that the resolution was erroneous in point of fact. Is that a reason for expunging it? It might form a very good reason for a counter-resolution. The subject is one on which a difference of opinion might fairly exist, and that difference was expressed at the time, both in debate and on the journal; but surely that difference of opinion is no reason for destroying the evidence that such an opinion was expressed.

The third reason is, that

"The said resolve, as adopted, is uncertain and ambiguous containing nothing but a loose and floating charge for derogating from the laws and constitution, and assuming ungranted power and authority in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, without specifying," &c.

This reason conflicts with both the others, implying that, if the resolve were detailed and specific, it ought not to be expunged. If all these are reasons for the same act, they should not be antagonist to each other, but should harmoniously tend to the same conclusion. But want of detail can be no reason for suppressing the evidence that such a resolution was adopted.

The fourth reason is merely an amplification of the third.

The fifth reason is as follows:

"And whereas the Senate being the constitutional tribunal for the trial of the President, when charged by the House of Representatives with offences against the laws and constitution, the adoption of the said resolve before any impeachment preferred by the House was a breach of the privileges of the House; a violation of the constitution; a subversion of justice; a prejudication of a question which might legally come before the Senate, and a disqualification of that body to perform its constitutional duty with fairness and impartiality, if the President should thereafter be regularly impeached by the House of Representatives for the same offence."

The same answer may be given to this reason as is given to the first, that it is not a fair and true description of the case. It treats the resolution of 1834 as if it were a judgment of the Senate in its judicial capacity as a court of impeachment, when, in truth, it is nothing more than the expression of an opinion in its character of a deliberative assembly. It is no breach of the privileges of the House of Representatives, since it neither anticipates nor precludes an impeachment. It is no prejudication of any question which might come before the Senate as a court of impeachment, since such question must be one of guilt; and nothing of the kind is imputed in the resolution. But again: if all this were true, it would be no reason for expunging, or, in other words, destroying the evidence of the fact that such a resolution was adopted.

But, sir, we come now to the sixth reason, which is perhaps the true motive, though not a justification for this extraordinary proceeding, and a gleam of light is thrown upon the subject, which gives it color and complexion. The substance of this reason is, that the President's protest was rejected, and not permitted to be entered upon the journal, while memorials and petitions against him were duly and honorably received. Here is another instance of that conflict with other reasons, which was remarked upon in adverting to the third. It implies that, if the protest had been received, then the resolve should not be expunged. But, with that confusion of ideas which seems to characterize the whole preamble, it places the protest of the President on the same footing with petitions from the people. The President demanded that his protest should be spread upon the journal, which he had no right to do. But, supposing for a moment that he had, is the refusal a reason for expunging the resolution to which the protest has reference. The people have an undoubted right to express their opinions and wishes, in the form of petitions and memorials; but the President, as such, has no right to notice the proceedings of any other branch of the Government in the form of a protest. It is no part of the functions or privileges of executive power to review and rebuke the proceedings of the legislative or judicial branches of the Government. The aspect which the whole subject assumes, in contemplating this reason, is that of retaliation. It looks like offering an indignity to this body, by way of compensating the slight of executive power.

The seventh and eighth reasons may be classed together, and resolve themselves into the general allegation that the said resolve was inopportune, of evil example, and dangerous precedent; all of which, being a mere matter of opinion, about which a fair difference might arise, could furnish no reason for expunging the resolve, however it might be urged as a reason for passing a counter-resolution. We have thus, sir, gone through them all, and do not find one which justifies the conclusion that the resolution should be expunged. And if they do not singly support that conclusion, they cannot do it collectively. A thousand bad reasons have no more force than one. We may say, then, of this preamble, what was said of Gratiano's reasoning: "Gratiano speaks an infinite deal of nothing; more than any man in all Venice; his reasons are as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff; you shall seek all day ere you find them, and when you have them they are not worth the search."

But it is said the Senate had no right to pass such a resolution; that it cannot be justified as the fair exercise of any one of its powers. Still, it may be answered, it is a fact that such a resolution was adopted, and the objection involves a mere difference of opinion, which cannot be a reason for destroying the evidence of the fact. But as to the right itself, I think there can be no doubt of its existence, when the subject is fully understood. The Senate, under the constitution, has various powers—legislative, judicial, and executive. The error lies in attempting to discover and explain the right to pass such a resolution in the exercise of any of these powers.

The object of all these powers is the modification of some social or political right. But the Senate is a deliberative body, and, as such, must have opinions, and express them. It is the inherent right and property of every deliberative assembly to have and express opinions, which only can be done by resolution. A resolution of thanks cannot be traced to any one of these powers; neither can a resolution of condolence; and yet no one ever doubted the right to pass either the one or the other. If it were necessary to resort to the constitution for any express or implied authority, it might be found in the seventh section of the fourth article, which, in its last paragraph, supposes that there are other resolutions than legislative acts, or such as require the concurrence of both Houses. But the very institution of a deliberative assembly, in the nature of things, supposes and involves the existence of opinions and the right of expressing them. The powers of such an assembly, or, in other words, the control which it may exercise over the social or political rights of others, is a very different matter, and depends on the provisions of the constitution which gives it existence. But is it not somewhat remarkable that those who make the objection do not perceive that this very expunging resolution which they advocate presupposes the right? If the Senate has no right to pass any resolution but such as can be traced to one of those powers, what right has it to pass this expunging resolution? Into such absurdities, sir, will men fall when they seek to sustain, by reasoning, a false position. The right, then, to pass such a resolution I take to be unquestionable, and the exercise of it may be, at times, highly expedient, as a check or caution to the wantonness or heedlessness of executive power, and as a measure short of impeachment. But, sir, what is impeachment? A farce, a nullity! It is, like the case of the electoral colleges, an abortion. There is little danger to be apprehended but from a popular President; and the very fact of his being such, under the party organization of this country, supposes the fact that he is sustained and supported by a majority of the body in whom the impeaching power resides. I might here, sir, conclude what I wished to say in relation to the matter now depending before the Senate, having, as I think, established two propositions, which cover the whole ground: first, that the Senate, as a deliberative assembly, had the right to pass the resolution of March 28, 1834; and, secondly, that, whether true or not in point of fact, we have no right to expunge it, because the journal is, by the constitution, a permanent record. I will further incidentally remark that, if the right of expunction exists, and is to be established by this precedent, then a subsequent Senate may expunge this expunging resolution; and so, in all time to come, these successive expunctions may serve to indicate the triumph or defeat of the respective political parties of the country. But an attempt has been made to sustain this measure by a resort to precedents. Sir, precedents are of no authority when opposed to a clear, ascertained, settled principle. They are resorted to in doubtful cases, and often to avoid the force of principle. It is easier, at all times, to follow precedents than to reason. But, sir, above all things precedents drawn from a period of revolution, such as that referred to by the Senator from Virginia, [MR. RIVES], are of no weight in a time of profound tranquillity, when security and leisure give opportunity for reflection. It may be very expedient, in a moment of unsettled government and of violence, to suppress the evidence of a particular proceeding; but one could scarcely rely upon such authority for a warrant to corrupt a constitutional record in moments of security and regular government. And yet such is the character of the Senator's domestic precedent. As to his English precedents, they are of no value on a question like this, which does not depend on general parliamentary practice, but on the express provisions of a written constitution, which has directed the keeping of a journal, and contemplates that journal as a permanent record.

I am warned by the lateness of the hour that it is time to take leave of the subject; but, sir, before I take my seat, I cannot forbear to offer a few remarks on some of the opinions and sentiments expressed by the Senator from Virginia [MR. RIVES] and others. We have been told by that Senator that the Senate is an aristocratical feature of the Government; that it is the citadel of that aristocratic spirit which seeks to ride on the necks of the people. What purpose, sir, is this sentiment to answer? Is it to break down the Senate? To bring it into contempt and odium with the people? But, first, sir, let us inquire into the fact. Aristocracy in America! Where are its elements, where its means and appliances? Here, sir, where the wheel of fortune is perpetually revolving; where the poor man of to-day becomes the rich man of tomorrow; and no one can tell, whatever his present actual property, that his grandson may not be compelled to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow; where political rights are equal, and the avenues to wealth and honor open to every man, where the laws and customs of the country guard no man's inheritance in a settled course of descent, but break up and distribute in various rivulets that wealth which may have been dammed up in the course of temporary accumulation; I say, sir, here, and under such circumstances, to talk of aristocracy is an insult to the common sense of the community. I see, sir, a practical refutation of this sentiment in the persons of the distinguished men by whom I am surrounded. To what patronage were they indebted for the honorable distinction which they have attained? To what do they owe their elevation and the high consideration in which they are held by the whole country, but to the unaided efforts of their own abilities? Why, sir, you find in the person of your Chief Magistrate another striking proof of its error. A poor boy, for so I believe the story runs, cuffed during the revolutionary war by a British officer for not performing some menial office, wins his way to the highest honors of the republic, and comes to preside over the destinies of a great people; "bids the Romans mark him, and write his speeches in their books." Sir, the term is a mere catchword, or, to use the metaphor of the Senator from South Carolina, "a mere tinkling bell, to bring together a rabble of ideas which overwhelm all reasoning."

One of the strongest objections I have had to the course of the present administration has been, its constant effort to array the different portions of society against each other, and its habit of appealing for support to the worst passions and prejudices of our nature. When I heard the distinguished Senator from Virginia [MR. RIVES] a few days since, in the debate on the Treasury circular, declare that he did not belong to that class of politicians who divided society horizontally, but rather perpendicularly, into classes who mutually sustained and supported each other, I thought I perceived the dawn of a better state of things, and I felt grateful to him, sir, for the sentiment; but alas! sir, I felt that it was but a temporary impulse of sound feeling, that must subside before the policy of the party.

To test the soundness of this opinion, let us for a moment consider the nature of this Government. It is emphatically a Government, as contradistinguished from a confederacy, limited in its powers, though supreme within its sphere; the legislative powers being vested in a Congress, composed of the Senate and House of Representatives. The people, being the source of all power, elect, either immediately or mediately, their representatives; immediately in the instance of the House of Representatives, mediately in the instance of the Senate. We are all, sir, the representatives of the people, though chosen after a different manner. I claim, sir, to be not the immediate but the general representative of the State of Virginia, as I hold that Senator to be the general representative of Delaware; and I, for one, thank Virginia for having sent so able and distinguished a representative of our common interests. The more permanent character of the representation in this body is a check imposed by the people themselves on their own action. The whole system is one of checks and balances. The two Houses of Congress are mutual checks on each other. The Senate may fairly be presumed to be the more grave and sedate body, from the general fact of possessing less of youth and its attributes; although, sir, to be sure, there are some veterans in the other House, as well as some youthful aspirants in this. The ancient Germans, sir, who carried among the nations whom they conquered their notions of civil polity, were in the habit of arguing every question twice, once at their carousals, probably drunk, and once sober, that there might be in their councils a due degree of vivacity and deliberation. The same idea may be supposed to be carried out in our institutions, though the requisite attributes may not be insured by the same means. In claiming, sir, for this body the attribute of deliberation, I do not mean to say that we are by contradistinction the sober body.

The constitution which has established this system of government was the peaceable and deliberate work of the people. It was not, sir, the result of accident, or of a struggle for political power between different orders of society. To find fault, then, with the Senate is to impeach the wisdom and intelligence of the people themselves. It is they who, in adopting the federal constitution, have said that the Senate shall be organized as we find it, have prescribed the mode of its election, and given to it the character of greater permanency. But sir, I ask again, what is the meaning of this sentiment? Are we to be prepared for reducing the Government to a unit, as we have been told that the cabinet should be one? Is it intended to blot out the component parts of this system, and reduce the Government to the simple relation of the President and the people? In the message of 1832 the Supreme Court was assailed, and its authority, as the interpreter of the constitution, denied; and now, sir, we are told by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] that the President has corrected and repealed the decision of that court in relation to the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States; and that, in his opinion, all that remains to be done is to issue an audita querella to ascertain the fact, have it entered on the record, and the judgment reversed. Here is at once a new attribute of power, and a most extraordinary mode of proceeding. On the other hand, we are told by the Senator from Virginia that the Senate is the citadel of that aristocratic spirit which seeks to ride on the necks of the people. If the Senator merely means that this language is descriptive of himself and his friends, be it so. I cannot quarrel with what he may deem just and proper as to them, though I should have been backward myself in so characterizing them; but, sir, I utterly deny its justice and propriety as applicable to myself, or those with whom I have the honor and the happiness to act. In relation to this Government, I and my immediate constituents, and I believe a great majority of the American people, are conservatives. We go for the Government as it is. We wish to preserve the system of Federal and State Governments as it was established by the wisdom of our ancestors. "We ask no change, and, least of all, such changes as they would bring us." In this system we live, and move, and have our being; and as we were the first to adopt the constitution, we shall be the last to abandon it. We have heard much about the policy of the Executive, and have even been advised to look to that source for the initiative of certain measures. To my mind, all this is of a piece with that exaggerated and false conception of executive power and consequence which has characterized the present Chief Magistrate and his advisers. The executive power which represents the common force of society is, in every just theory, and in the nature of things, inferior to the legislative power, which is the representative of the common intelligence and the common will, and that, too, precisely in the degree in which brute force is inferior to reason. It is the business of the President to execute the laws, not to make them. The policy of the Executive! Who charged the President with the care of the general welfare? What business has he with any policy distinct from the policy of the law? The prosperity of a great and civilized people depends on the laws, and not on the will of the Executive. Sir, I regret to hear such opinions expressed. I trust in God they will not prevail in this country; for, to my mind, they are in direct hostility with that tone of manly and independent feeling which should characterize a nation of freemen.

In opening the subject of this expunging resolution, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has seen fit to entertain us with a magnificent eulogy on the merits of the President. This, no doubt, was a very fit introduction to the measure which is proposed, and may perhaps serve to indicate its ultimate aim and purpose. He has been described at one time as teaching the saucy Britons a lesson of humility from behind the cotton bags of New Orleans, and at another rebuking with the thunder of American cannon the savages of the Pacific ocean, "be-striding the narrow world like a Colossus." Not content with this plenitude of military fame, he has been endued with all civic virtues and superhuman sagacity. While listening to this strain of adulation, every sober-minded individual must have involuntarily exclaimed, with Cassius, "Now, in the names of all the gods at once, upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed, that he is grown so great?" Sir, I am not disposed to deny his real merits, or to withhold my gratitude for his real services. He has, sir, rendered good service to his country, and well has that country repaid him for it. But that service was in a military, not in a civil capacity.

Much has, as usual, been said about the people, and the people's friends, and an impression is attempted to be given that those who support this administration are alone the friends of the people. Who are they that thus arrogantly talk about the people, as if they belonged to some superior order? The people's friends, indeed! The people, sir, stand in need of no friends; they are the sovereigns; it is they who dispense their smiles and their favors; and it would be much more becoming and seemly to speak of the people as being one's friend than of one's self as being the friend of the people. There is, to be sure, one point of view in which the supporters of this administration, I mean those in office, may be considered the friends of the people. It is the same in which the licentiate, in Gil Blas, is termed and considered himself the friend of the poor, and who proved his friendship by consuming their revenues.

The aid of public opinion has been invoked in relation to this measure, and we are told by the Senator from Missouri that the people have rendered their verdict, and he demands judgment and execution. When and how, sir, was the issue made up? The resolution of March, 1834, was adopted after the last presidential election; but this notion of a verdict is gathered from the fact of the continued ascendancy of the party and the resolves of some State Legislatures. Can any thing be more preposterous than the assumption that a majority of the people, liking the man, in yielding to him their support, are to be understood as approving of every thing that he says and does, and disapproving of every thing that is said or done against him? As well might it be contended, on the same ground, that because General Jackson smokes a pipe, the verdict of the people has established that it is right and proper to use tobacco, and that the legitimate mode of doing so is by smoking it in an earthen pipe.

But all this, sir, is apart from the main question. We are called upon to expunge a resolution from our journal, to suppress the evidence of a fact, to falsify a record! If the right to do so were a matter of doubt merely, it would be the part of a prudent and conscientious man to pause. Let not, I pray, sir, the excitement of party spirit hurry this body to an act which is a clear infraction of the constitution; be satisfied with a counter-resolution, expressing in as strong terms as you please your approbation of the President's conduct, and your repugnance to the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834, but do not let us inflict another wound upon the great charter of our Union. Rely upon it, sir, that if the frenzy of party spirit, or any other motive, shall lead you to do this deed, you will find yourselves in the condition of a homicide, who, having exhausted his malice in a deed of violence, recoils with horror and remorse from the victim of his passion.

When Mr. BAXARD had concluded, Mr. HENDRICKS rose and said that, at this late hour of the day, it would be out of place to attempt an argument or a speech to the Senate; and such was not his purpose, in the few words he had at present to say. It had been his intention, some time ago, to have troubled the Senate with his views somewhat at large on the subject; but he would content himself now with saying a very few words; and this was perhaps necessary, owing to the peculiar position he occupied in relation to the proposition before the Senate. It would be recollected that he had voted against the resolution of 1834, so much complained of, the resolution which it was now proposed to expunge from the journals of the Senate. He did so for many of the reasons contained in the preamble to the resolution now on our tables. In some of the reasons, however, contained in that preamble, he did not concur, and of course could not vote for it. For some of the reasons contained in it he could most cheerfully vote. No member of the Senate more than himself (said Mr. H.) regretted the passage of that resolution. No one could have been more opposed to it. He viewed it as an apple of discord set in motion; a firebrand thrown into the community, calculated to do more harm than any other measure proposed at that eventful session; and he now believed that it had done more harm in exciting party spirit to its present dangerous height than any other measure which could have been proposed. The danger apprehended to the constitution by this act of expunging (said Mr. H.) is a natural consequence of the measure of 1834; as much so as that one act of violence should succeed another. A party in power to-day, and who shall use that power indiscreetly, will be sure to meet with retaliation, as soon as the opposite party shall triumph. Hence violent measures of this kind are as sure to succeed each other, in the mutations of party power, as effect is to follow cause.

Much, however, as he was opposed to the resolution of 1834, he could not vote to expunge it from the journals. That was a question, in his opinion, having nothing to do with the merits or demerits of the original proposition. The question before the Senate was one of power to expunge the journal, no matter what journal it might be. He thought no such power existed in the Senate, nor any where else; and his oath to support the constitution of the United States was imperative, and prohibited him from giving any such vote, whatever may have been his opinion of the resolution proposed to be expunged. It was, in his view of the constitution, as much a duty to keep and preserve the journals of unconstitutional proceedings, if such there be, as of any other. Our constituents have as much right to know our bad acts as our good ones; because it is for these they will call us to account; and it would be strange doctrine, that we could shield ourselves from responsibility by expunging the journals. The argument, then, of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the resolution of 1834 was unconstitutional, and therefore ought to be expunged, did not in the least relieve his mind. He understood, too, that this was the basis of the votes of other members of the Senate in favor of expunging. Much as he disapproved of the resolution of 1834, he believed that it was constitutional, and that it was such a proposition as the Senate might entertain and adopt. He saw nothing unconstitutional about it. It might, or it might not, be considered an abstract proposition. It had, indeed, remained as a mere declaratory expression of the Senate, but it might have been the basis of legislation. Whether it be true or false is a matter of opinion. Those who voted for it unquestionably believed its affirmations to be true. They believed that the President had, in relation to the revenue, exercised authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both. He, who voted against it, believed that the authority and power exercised by the President was not in derogation of the constitution and laws; and, however much he dissented on the ground of expediency from that which had been done, he never doubted the constitutional and legal power of the President to do what he did.

It had been said (continued Mr. H.) that the resolution of 1834 contains impeachable matter against the President, and that, on this account, it is not entitled to a place on the journals. He did not think, however, that it contained any impeachable matter. It charged no evil or corrupt intention, which was the essential ingredient of impeachable matter. He referred to the case of Peck's trial before the Senate, and stated that the absence of proof of corrupt intention was the basis of his acquittal by the Senate. This had been the reason of his own vote of acquittal; and this, he had good reason to believe, was the basis of votes of acquittal generally.

In voting against expunging, he did not vote to affirm the truth of the resolution of 1834. He had already stated the reverse. He believed that the President had the power, whatever he might think of its exercise, under the circumstances of that case. But his opinion that the resolution proposed to be expunged was and is untrue, had nothing to do with his duty in the present case, and could not, in any degree, influence his vote. The Senate had no power to expunge the journals. He could, without the least difficulty, vote upon the journals of the present session a resolution to rescind that of 1834, or to affirm a contrary proposition. This, while it would clearly assert the opinion of the Senate in relation to the proceedings of 1834, would not obliterate the journals of that day, and would have all the effect of the mode proposed.

Mr. H. here referred to the constitution, which says that "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their opinion require secrecy," and said that the obligations of his oath to support the constitution of the United States made, in his conscience and judgment, his duty on the present occasion clear and imperative. The constitution required the journal to be kept. He could not vote to destroy, or expunge, or obliterate it. But it is contended (said Mr. H.) that the black lines proposed to be drawn around the journal of 1834 will not expunge it in reality; that they will take nothing away from it. It will not, however, be contended that writing the words required to be written across the face of it will not deface, and, to a certain extent, obliterate it. But suppose these black lines and this writing upon the journal of 1834 takes nothing away from that journal, it will surely not be denied that a material addition will be made to it. The constitution requires the journal to be published, but how was this to be published? Could it be published as the journal of 1834? No. That had been published three years ago. There were in that publication no black lines; no writing across the face of the record. If you publish it as the journal of 1834, you falsify the former publication. You cannot publish it as the journal of 1837, because it is the journal of 1834. There, and there only, are the black lines and labellous writing to be found. No page of the journal of 1837 contains any thing like it. In what shape, or form, or manner, then, will you obey the injunction of the constitution, in publishing the journal of these proceedings? The truth is, (said Mr. H.,) the more we look at this thing, the more difficulty we must see in it; the more certainly will it appear to be a proceeding not contemplated by the constitution, but incompatible with it. It makes a case which, in the simple publication of the journals, the constitution will not warrant or defend.

Mr. STRANGE said: I am not unconscious of the disadvantages under which I labor, in addressing the Senate at this late period; but it has been properly remarked, in the course of this debate, that we are engaged in no ephemeral transaction; that this night's work is not to pass away with the occasion; it is not to be consigned at once "to the tomb of the Capulets," with things unworthy of remembrance. All connected with the matter under consideration are doomed to immortality, for good or for evil; and as it is my destiny and my purpose to appropriate a humble leaf from this fadeless wreath, to rescue from oblivion a name which would otherwise be forgotten when the individual who bears it shall cease to breathe, I wish to say a few words in explanation of my course, not with the vain hope of their being as immortal as the act they accompany, but merely for the temporary satisfaction of my personal acquaintances. I am aware that this subject has been treated with singular ability on both sides of this hall, and may, perhaps, be thought exhausted; but as, in some respects, my views differ considerably from any I have heretofore heard advanced, I take the liberty of offering them. It is the more proper I should do so, as, in a motion I shall take occasion to make before I sit down, I might otherwise subject myself to the misapprehension both of friends and foes, (without meaning, however, to use the latter term in its most offensive sense.)

The Senator from South Carolina, who discoursed so eloquently upon this subject the other day, was pleased to say, facetiously, that those who vote for this expunging resolution will be placed on "a bad eminence," damned to a fame like that of Eratostratus, who destroyed by fire one of the seven wonders of the world, the Ephesian temple of Diana; and doubtless the same wild fancy which led him to this conclusion has pictured for himself and his associates a classic reputation like that of the celebrated Roman conspirators, who slew a Cæsar in the Capitol. Happily, however, the latter parallel fails in most important particulars; for the ancients actually wrought the physical death of a usurper, while the moderns have only attempted the moral death of a patriot.

I regret that those who framed the preamble affixed to this resolution have thought proper to make it so long, not on account of its having furnished a subject of wit to the Senator from Kentucky, but because it has already thrown difficulties in the way of some, and is still likely to throw difficulties in the way of myself, and others friendly to the resolution itself. That delicate machine, the human mind, formed by an invisible hand, is exceedingly subtle in its operations, and like the watches which occupied the attention of that great monarch, Charles V. of Germany, after his retirement from the cares of empire, no two will operate precisely alike. Many minds may come to a similar conclusion; but in the processes by which they arrive at it will probably all vary in a greater or less degree. This is found to be the case in the most simple and familiar matters, and still more so in those of complication and rare occurrence. I wish some reference could have been had, in framing this preamble, to the advice of a celebrated statesman, to a judge then recently appointed to one of the British provinces. "Decide," said he, "according to your judgment of what is right, but give no reasons for your decision. Thousands may approve the one, who will not concur with you in the other." Regardless of this prudent counsel, many reasons are offered in this preamble for the ultimate conclusion that it is right to expunge from the journal of the Senate the obnoxious resolution of March, 1834; and among them it is stated that the said resolution was unconstitutional. In this reason I cannot concur, because I do not unite in the opinion that it is founded in fact. I cannot, therefore, conscientiously put it forth in this formal manner, as constituting a portion of the basis of an important action in which I am desirous to unite. An act, according to my understanding, is unconstitutional, which is prohibited, in express terms, by the constitution, or which is done in substantial omission of something commanded by it. Now, I do not find in the constitution any prohibition upon the Senate from uttering an opinion, collectively or individually, upon any subject whatsoever. I agree that the constitution only expressly authorizes them to perform certain legislative, executive and judicial functions, and prescribes the mode, to a certain extent, in which they shall perform them, and that a performance of these acts in any substantial disregard of this prescription would be unconstitutional, while all acts done, not mentioned or distinctly referred to in the constitution, are done without its warrant. But, then, the constitution has not taken away, so far as the matter under consideration is concerned, that right which, in a state of nature, all men derived from the God who made them, to utter their thoughts, as individuals or collectively, however assembled, upon things in general. Restrictions upon this privilege are certainly to be found in the Divine law itself, and in the many maxims of propriety which society has, from time to time, and in various ways, laid down for the government of its members. But I deny that the constitution of the United States has laid down any restriction applicable to the present case, and would in vain ask for its production. I know that, in disputing the soundness of this reason set forth in the preamble, I encounter the opinions of many wise men, for whom I have the profoundest respect. But, while this furnishes me with a strong and only reason for doubting the soundness of my own view, it will not justify me in asserting that as a truth of which I am not convinced; and still less that to which my own faculties altogether refuse their assent. When a man undertakes to assert any thing deliberately, he must do so upon his own conviction, and not upon the mere opinions of others. Those who insist upon the unconstitutionality of the resolution of 1834, treat it as an actual impeachment of the President, without having waited for the accusation constitutionally preferred by the House of Representatives. If I could admit or perceive the fact that the resolution of 1834 was an impeachment of the President, in the technical sense of that word, I should have no difficulty in uniting in the conclusion that it was a palpable violation of the constitution. But impeachment, as used in the constitution, is a technical term, and all that enters into the technical idea embraced in the term must exist to make it applicable. A number of unauthorized persons may pronounce a man guilty of an offence, but no one for that reason would say that he had been tried. If a judge goes into court, and, without the finding of an indictment, or any other formal accusation against a person, directs an entry to be made upon the record that he is guilty of a certain offence, it could not be said that he had been tried. The substantial part of an impeachment or trial is the punishment consequent upon being found guilty; and no matter by what name a proceeding may be called, it does not meet the idea embraced in these expressions, either in laws or constitutions, if conviction upon it does not involve punishment as a regular consequence. In the proceeding referred to in the Senate there was condemnation, but it was not a condemnation which drew after it punishment, or in pursuance of which punishment could have been inflicted. In matters of this sort names are things; and whenever we suffer ourselves to be drawn away from their accepted significations, we cast ourselves upon a wide ocean of uncertainty, and our minds, like a vessel, however richly freighted, without compass or polar star, can never calculate on ultimately reaching any place of security. To say that the Senate impeached the President in the resolution of 1834 is, in my judgment, a pure assumption; and if the resolution was not an impeachment, no one contends, I believe, that it was a literal violation of the constitution. But it is insisted that, if not a literal violation of the constitution, the resolution of 1834 was a violation of its spirit. I belong, Mr. President, to a class of politicians, and I am proud to say so, who deny that the constitution has any spirit. Like Shylock's bond, we hold that whatever is not found in it cannot be claimed under it; its grants and its prohibitions are such, as that he who reads may perceive them, and no artful constructionist is at liberty to stretch it to his purposes, or to hammer it out, like gold leaf, until it covers the universe. Believing, then, that the Senate was exercising no constitutional function in their vote of censure upon the President; and that in all other matters the constitution leaves to them, unimpaired, all their natural rights of expressing their opinions, in whatever way assembled, and upon any subject, I cannot concur in the reason assigned for expunging the resolution of 1834, that it was an unconstitutional act. But in thus differing with my friends, and making this concession to the opposition, I think I am very far from weakening the cause of the former, and am presenting the latter with a Trojan horse; in admitting that their act was not unconstitutional, I sweep away at a breath the whole superstructure behind which the opposers of expunction have, as they seem to conceive, securely ensconced themselves. But of this by and by.

Although the resolution of 1834 be not unconstitutional, nor in violation of the spirit of the constitution, it may yet invade a spirit and violate an authority even superior to the constitution, and abundant reasons may remain for its expunction; and it is my purpose to show that it ought to be expunged for its impropriety, its dangerous tendency, its injustice, and its falsehood. And here allow me to apologize for the strong language I must occasionally use, during the progress of these remarks, although feeling, as I do, great deference for those whose acts I am condemning, and conscious that I am myself as prone to infirmity as any man. But I must speak plainly, and therefore I say, in the first place, that the resolution of 1834 was, in my judgment, the most flagrant violation of propriety ever perpetrated by a high, honorable, and dignified body. To recur to an illustration already used, suppose a judge arrives at a certain place, where he is to hold a court of criminal jurisdiction, and, among other things, he learns that a particular individual is charged with some capital offence; he hears the ex parte statements of rumor, and makes up his opinion that the person is guilty. Not satisfied with this, when he enters the court-house, he calls upon the clerk solemnly to declare upon the record that such a person is, in the opinion of the presiding judge, certainly guilty of such a specific offence. It is true the grand jury have found no bill, the alleged offender has not even been apprehended, no voice has been heard in his defence, and no punishment could follow the prejudication. Yet would it not be an act of the grossest and most flagrant violation of judicial propriety? Would not public execration overwhelm the wretch who had perpetrated it, and hurl him from the station he had degraded?

In the case of the single judge, every one is struck at once with the glaring impropriety of his conduct. And is that impropriety at all diminished because perpetrated by numbers? Are there not, in fact, features in the principal case even more oppressive than in the one by which I have attempted to illustrate it? In the case of the judge, he tries the culprit by a rigid, well-defined law, and can make nothing a subject of punishment which the law has not expressly declared so; and, in the application of facts to the law, is dependent on a jury for the finding of those facts, and can assume nothing which the jury do not expressly find. Mental bias, therefore, or prejudication on his part, it would seem, could not be attended with any great degree of mischief. And yet the common sense, and, I may add, the common principles of mankind, revolt at the slightest indication of such bias or prejudication. But the Senate of the United States are judges both of law and fact; nay, to a great extent, they make the law by which the person charged is to be tried. What volume contains a recital of the acts for which the President of the United States, or any other public officer, is subject to impeachment? There is no such volume. Any misdemeanor in office will warrant impeachment and conviction; and what is such misdemeanor is left to the mere discretion of the Senate, and they promulge the law at the very moment that they pronounce the guilt of its infraction? It is only necessary for the House of Representatives to charge the offence, and the Senate have then the uncontrolled right to decide the two questions, whether the facts exist; and if so, whether they are the subjects of punishment. Surely, a tribunal so constituted ought, of all others, to keep its faculties uninfluenced by rashly expressed opinions. But the worst feature of impropriety yet remains to be considered. It is a general principle, that no man can be a judge in a cause where he has an interest; but some tribunals are so constituted that this wholesome principle cannot always be applied. In such a case, it would seem that a judge so situated would, above all others, feel most powerfully restrained from allowing himself any indulgence in previous expressions of opinions which might prejudice the person charged, or from prematurely evincing the strength of his own bias. And yet the Senate of the United States, the constitutional tribunal for the trial of the President for unconstitutional acts, prejudices him in a matter in which individual Senators have a personal interest. I do not mean to say that their personal interest was enlisted by golden bribes, received in the shape of fees, or otherwise, from the United States Bank; although such things have been said, I, for one, do not believe them. I do not think that such was the interest they felt in the question. No; a nobler passion blinded them to the impropriety of the act they were committing; a passion which has been called the vice of great minds; a passion planted in the human breast for the wisest purposes; but one of the most dangerous and desolating where it gains unhallowed mastery. A great political strife had been waging for years, and talent and wealth, and every other engine of human power, had been employed in its progress. No machine had been so powerful as the United States Bank in conducing to the spread of opinions upon whose success the party to which these Senators belonged believed its own triumph, and the welfare of the nation, to depend. To these opinions Senators had subscribed in the most decided and public manner, and upon them had staked their hopes of renown and worldly distinction. They were opposed by the administration, and a stern, unyielding front presented by it to their advance. For this the President had been strongly denounced, and Senators themselves had not been backward in breathing upon the waves of opposition, and stirring them into rage; and, finally, in the tumult of this excitement, forgetful of the high, honorable and delicate propriety which, as men and individuals, has ever characterized them, and their elevated standing as the constitutional triers of the President, they commanded his guilt to be recorded before any legal accuser had come forward, and indignantly refused to hear his defence. Am I not warranted, under these circumstances, in pronouncing the act one of gross and flagrant impropriety?

But I have said it is an act dangerous in its tendency as a precedent, and for that reason ought to be expunged. The constitution has pointed out the mode in which the different branches of the Government are mutually to check and balance each other, and no where is this informal mode of expressing disapprobation adverted to as one of them. Crimination invariably leads to recrimination. The beginning of strife has been aptly compared in the scriptures to the letting out of waters; the natural result is, that every thing valuable within its reach is carried away in its desolating sweep. "One word," in homely adage, "brings on another," and whether the strife of tongues begins between two old wives at the fish market, or the President and Senate, anger quickly subdues all the nobler faculties of the mind, and unnatural and cruel warfare is the probable result. A practical illustration of this idea is furnished in the civil wars of England, already alluded to by the Senator from Connecticut. A strife in which all the ties of family and kindred were dissolved, and the nearest and the dearest brought to quench a savage thirst in each other's blood, originated in an undignified war of words between the King and the Parliament. If the principle be established that it is proper for one branch of the Government, assembled as such, (but in a manner so informal as to leave it a matter of contest whether it is an official act or not,) to condemn the acts of another, the most fearful consequences must be apprehended. If the Senate may informally condemn the President, so it may the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives the Senate. Scenes must then originate which, if carried out far into practice, would degrade the nation in the eyes of strangers, and add much to the uncertainty of the tenure by which domestic quiet is retained. The principle is therefore dangerous in the extreme, and ought to be most promptly discountenanced.

I urge, as a third reason for expunging the resolution of 1834, that it is unjust. It is true the then President of the United States still retains his office, and no removal can take place in consequence of the condemnation therein expressed; yet its obvious and designed tendency must have been to degrade the Chief Magistrate in the eyes of the country. Want of principle, or want of capacity, is the alternative left to him in the estimation of all who believe this accusation to be true. They must either pronounce him a sacrilegious violator of the constitution of his country, or a very incompetent judge of its provisions. "Surely," it would be said by all whose knowledge of affairs did not induce them to look beyond the mere surface of this transaction, "the Senate would not have thus harshly condemned the President for some slight oversight, for some small misapprehension of duty, into which any man might have fallen. No! no! it is some grave matter, in which the constitution has been so grossly violated that none but a rash, headstrong, unprincipled man, who heeded not, or an ignoramus, too dull to perceive, could have been the actor." This is the natural conclusion; and what a dilemma for one to be reduced to in this land, where popular opinion is to a public man the breath of his nostrils! That the Senate, availing itself of its usually just title to public confidence, should denounce a man, uncited and unheard, as a violator of the constitution of his country, whom the popular voice had pronounced most worthy among the millions of American citizens to fill the most dignified and responsible trust, is to my apprehension the grossest insult to the public sense of justice I have ever witnessed. Very few, but the very individual against whom it was directed, who would not have sunk beneath it.

But this objection to the resolution of 1834 depends altogether for support upon another, which I come now to consider, embracing, in fact, the pith of this controversy; and that is, as I have said, its falsehood. And here, again, I must apologize for the harshness of the term used, from the necessity I am under to speak plainly, not meaning for a moment to apply it to the individual veracity of those who voted for that resolution. There may be falsehood in a legal conclusion, however sincere the man who arrives at it; and whenever one comes to the conclusion that certain acts are unconstitutional, all who differ with him must believe his conclusion false, whatever terms they may adopt to express their dissent. About the acts done by the President, in reference to which this resolution was adopted, there is no controversy; but that those acts were unconstitutional is, in my judgment, most falsely asserted by the resolution; the position is so false, so gross a perversion of the constitution, that it ought never to have been taken; such a dangerous misrepresentation of that sacred instrument, that it ought, as far as possible, to be annihilated, and treated as though it had never been. It is so palpably erroneous, that I cannot persuade myself that any man of common sense or common honesty, whose mind was perfectly free from previous bias, could for a moment countenance it. But when, as I believe, under the impulse of excited feelings, and in the blindness of party strife, it has received the sanction of the Senate, I am unwilling it should remain, to shed its deceptive light upon future ages, and mislead others to their ruin. At the time this resolution was adopted I had not the honor of a seat in this body; but I was a lover of my country, and felt a deep solicitude for every thing connected with its interests. I then believed, and do still believe, its Senate a body surpassed by none on earth in dignity, and my eye was turned anxiously upon its movements. Rumor had given out that this resolution was to be brought forward; I was not ignorant of the obscuring effects of passion upon the clearest intellect; and yet I did think the constitutionality of the President's action so obvious that it was impossible to blink it. I confess, when I first heard the removal of the deposits announced, I was startled by the boldness of the measure, but I did not for a moment doubt the constitutionality of the act. I was apprehensive that the President had so far outrun public opinion, it would never overtake him; and his administration, deprived of that essential support, would no longer be useful to the country. This was the extent of my alarm. Contrary to my expectation, however, the Senate has pronounced the act unconstitutional, and it is not sufficient for us to make a mere negation, without reasoning the matter a little. I am well aware, sir, that the idea of the unity of the Executive has not been opposed only, but has been actually turned into ridicule. But the day has gone by when ridicule was the acknowledged test of truth; it has been found to level its shafts with equal success against subjects the lightest and the gravest—against the phantoms of falsehood, and the most solemn realities. Of the unity of the executive branch of the Government of the United States we need look no farther for evidence than the constitution itself, which declares "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." He is in fact the only executive officer created by the constitution, all others owing their existence to the legislative power of Congress.

In 1800, but a few years after this constitution was formed, and its original plan and design was fresh in the memory of all, the unity of the Executive is distinctly recognised, in a paper drawn up with great care and deliberation, for the express purpose of staying the waves of federal power. I mean Mr. Madison's celebrated report, in which it is stated, "According to the particular organization of the constitution, its legislative powers are vested in the Congress; its executive powers in the President, and its judicial powers in a supreme and inferior tribunals. The union of any two of these powers," it proceeds, "and still more, of all three, in any one of these departments, must consequently subvert the constitutional organization of them." The other officers provided by law are mere agents, through whom he is to fulfil the great trust confided to him by the constitution; and whenever the duties prescribed for them from time to time are not, according to his judgment, so performed as best to promote the public good, it is not only his right but his duty to change them. His right of removal being thus unquestionable, no charge of unconstitutionality can rest upon him for the mere exercise of a discretion confided to him by the constitution. But it is not denied by the President or his friends, that the removal of the deposits was, in fact, his own act; and for whatever of unconstitutionality or illegality may be in it he is responsible. It is true the charter of the United States Bank declares that bank to be the place of deposit for the public moneys, and that they shall only be removed from thence at the will of the Secretary of the Treasury. Whenever, therefore, that will is expressed, the condition is performed, and the right of the bank to retain the moneys under their charter, viewing it as a contract, expires, and the law of the land regulating the disposal of the public treasure is fulfilled. It is not denied that Mr. Duane, the then Secretary of the Treasury, did not choose so to exercise his will, and refused to order the removal of the deposits; but he was himself removed, and another, quite as wise and as honest, appointed in his stead, who, without hesitation, dissolved the spell by which the bank retained the public moneys, and ordered them to be removed. It is contended that this condition was imposed upon the bank in the retention of the public deposits, altogether in reference to their security, and it was a violation of the compact to remove them for any other reason than insecurity. But are those the terms of the condition? Is any reference made in that condition to the motives upon which the Secretary should exercise the power intrusted to him of putting an end to the depository character of the bank? No such reference, no such intimation, is to be found. Had the bank applied to him for his reasons, he might and ought to have treated the application as an impertinent demand. But reasons he was bound to give to Congress, and he did give them. These reasons could not have been asked for in reference to the rights of the bank, for, so far as she is concerned, a naked trust has been exercised, and there is an end of the matter; but simply to enable Congress, as the guardian of the public treasure, to exercise that supervision over what had been done, its management during the recess, which it ought of right to do. A disingenuous clamor has been raised for the purpose of throwing the true questions in this investigation into obscurity, that the act of removal produced a union of the purse and the sword; but did Congress believe that such would be the consequence, when it expressly authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to make the removal whenever, in his judgment, it should be expedient? And the matter has been treated as if the President had with his own hand made the removal of the deposits. If such were the fact, where was the necessity of removing one Secretary, and putting in another? If the President's purpose was, by actual and lawless force, to seize the money in the Treasury, he might as well have passed by one Secretary as another. But the truth is, as is well known to every intelligent and candid man, the money in the Treasury was just as inaccessible to the personal contact of the President after the removal as it was before; all the fiscal machinery provided by law for preserving the personal honesty of all having any thing to do with the public money operated in the same way, and precisely the same process was necessary to place a single dollar in the actual grasp of any person whatsoever. But it has been urged, in reference to the public as well as the bank, that the only ground upon which removal was proper was the security of the public money. To this I reply, as before, nothing of the kind is mentioned in the condition of the clause which forms the only restriction in connexion with this subject upon the general executive power and duty to act in all things for the promotion of the great purposes of the Federal Government. If, then, the President perceived that for any reason the public good required that the public money should no longer remain in the vaults of the United States Bank, it was not only his privilege but his duty to direct the proper officer to remove it. Should he turn out to be mistaken in his notions of expediency, however reprehensible for want of ability in the discharge of his high functions, there could be no pretence for the charge of unconstitutionality. And here, perhaps, I have said all that is necessary for the maintenance of my position, that the resolution of 1834 was false in asserting the act of the President to be unconstitutional. But I assume for the President still higher ground, and insist that his act was not only legal and constitutional, but that it was in the highest degree expedient; that it was a stroke of generalship which causes the laurels of New Orleans to look pale and withered. We have already had occasion to glance slightly at the history of the times connected with the transaction under consideration. At the close of the war of 1812—'15, the nation was deeply involved in debt, and the national coffers were empty; ingenuity and patriotism were taxed to contrive expedients for meeting the difficult exigency; our recent foes abroad, and malecontents at home, were mocking at our distress, and the political party whose firmness and genius, aided by the valor of our army and navy, had brought to a glorious termination a most unequal war, saw bankruptcy and disgrace ready to overwhelm them. Under these circumstances, as the plank in the shipwreck, the expedient of a United States Bank was seized upon, and some, as I am informed, who doubted its constitutionality, and some even who believed it unconstitutional, were driven by the apparent necessity of the case to give the measure their support. The bank was chartered, performed its functions, and the term of its existence was drawing to a close. Application was made for a renewal of its charter, and having made many friends with "the mammon of unrighteousness," a willing ear was lent to its application. Some believed the question of unconstitutionality put to rest by precedent and adjudication, and no longer open as an available cause of opposition. For various reasons, however, its prayer for a continuance of its existence was granted by the Senate and House of Representatives. But the concurrence of another branch of the Government was necessary to the completion of its hopes, and its application there was answered by a veto which waked up, as by a trumpet-call sound, republican doctrines long since supposed to have sunk into a slumber from whence they would never awake. With a force and clearness which astounded the legions of federalism, and infused new vigor into the republican ranks, the unconstitutionality and inexpediency of rechartering the United States Bank was demonstrated. From that hour, every political engine was set to work to prostrate the only man who could withstand the might of this mammoth institution, and all who entertained like opinions. Presses were subsidized—in various ways the talent of the nation were enlisted in its behalf—and by violent and sudden expansions and contractions, now the hopes and now the fears of the populace were appealed to. Here was a new feature of inexpediency for the recharter of the United States Bank, presented to the startled consideration of every lover of his country. In our land, where the popular voice controls and directs every thing, nothing is so important as that that voice should itself be directed by the hearts of the pure and the free. The power and the willingness of this institution to corrupt was alarmingly demonstrated; and it was seen that, under whatever pretences, it would, if rechartered, get possession of the public mind, and wield it to its own purposes, either for good or for evil. From the commanding elevation held by the President, he surveyed the field of combat—he beheld the nature of the strife going on—he perceived that it was a vital one to his beloved country—he found that the monster's power of mischief lay in the depositories, and he determined to remove them. Like a skilful surgeon, he saw that the bank, like a vast cancer, was striking its fibres in every direction, until it would finally become so incorporated with the system, that it could only be removed at the expense of the patient's life. Anticipating this horrible event, he determined with a bold hand to cut it off, while the bystanders looked on in amazement. Yes, sir, it was a master-stroke, and the bank and its partisans felt that it was mortal to her, that her vitals were wounded beyond recovery. Among the many caricatures to which a spirit I am by no means disposed to commend has given rise in modern times, one illustrative of this idea struck me as being the best. The bank is represented as a huge old woman, extended upon a bed, in the throes of an emetic operation; beside the bed are various vessels, labelled with the names of the several deposite banks, into which are falling the ejected contents of her stomach, consisting of various gold and silver coins. At her head, in a kindly effort to sustain it, is seated the president of that institution, to whom in her agony she exclaims, "Oh! dear Nick, I am very sick." He promptly replies, "It is all the effect of that last prescription of Dr. Jackson." Yes, sir, that last prescription was fatal to the bank, or at least as nearly so as anything has yet been; and for that cause mainly has he who framed it been so strongly denounced in the resolution of 1834. But it was a measure adopted in strict accordance with all the forms of law and constitution, and not in derogation of either. A measure for which, through all time, the patriot who reviews his country's history, will revere the memory of him who saved by it the perishing constitution; while, with the men of the present generation, he can hardly determine which most challenges his admiration, the wisdom that planned or the firmness that executed it. Having thus, as I think, shown that this resolution was grossly improper, dangerous in its tendency, unjust in its operation, and untrue in its assertion, I come next to consider the motives upon which we are called upon to expunge it. The fancy of gentlemen has represented us as ignobly bending at the footstool of power, and licking the dust beneath the monarch's tread. As smoothing the rough mane of the lion, and endeavoring to quiet his frightful roar. Even the car of Juggernaut has been made to roll through this hall, and our garments have been sprinkled with the blood, and our ears stunned with the cries of the victims crushing beneath its wheels. But these are mere pictures of the fancy, and fancy may paint what she pleases; she does not confine her sketches to the copies of even things that might be, and still less to things that are. Sober reason must perceive that we have nothing to expect from the throne, as it has been called, or from him who fills it; that if the mane of the lion is rough, or his roar is angry, it is not against us that his fury is directed. That reasons enough are found for the expunction of the resolution of 1834, in the opinions we have expressed concerning it. But some of us have a strong and urgent reason to perform this act, in a desire to obey those whom we serve. The voice of the people has commanded it to be done, and that is a voice which public men in our country dare not disregard. Even those who least regard it in practice dare not openly proclaim their contempt. They may speak of it slightly in the private circle, and in their hearts despise it, and endeavor to explain away its unpleasant requirements; but when forced to encounter its unequivocal declarations, they must tremble and obey; they dare not disregard it. That voice has spoken in general terms throughout the nation; but it has spoken to some of us as it were by name, and through the appropriate medium, and commanded us to act. It has not spoken to me personally, but it has spoken to my predecessor; and, standing in the position I now occupy, I hear the sound still ringing in my years. It is a command which but seconds my own wishes. I came here anticipating the most cheerful compliance; and I yet hope to yield it, if my own friends do not throw obstacles in the way of my obedience. Yet I will not deny that there is some personal reference to the present Chief Magistrate himself in the act we desire to perform. The period is at hand when he who rescued your daughters from the ruffian pollution of a foreign soldiery, and your soil from the foot of the invader, will be deaf to the strains of gratitude, pressed by the earth he once defended. That he whose voice was loudest in the battles of his country shall be hushed into silence; that he who now holds the sceptre of command will have passed away not only from office, but from life itself, and have joined the spirits of men that have been. Is not the fame of her sons dear to a nation? Has she no pleasure in the glory of her best and her bravest? Has she no interest in preventing the mantle of infamy from wrapping the remains of him who should sleep in the robe of honor? In this view of the subject, I had fondly hoped that the gentlemen of the opposition would have united with us in this act of retribution. That in contemplation of this interesting crisis, the party crust which has heretofore encircled their hearts would have given way, and a flood of tenderness spontaneously gushed forth. That with one generous impulse they would have been the first to rush forward, and pluck off the disgraceful stigma their own hands had affixed, in an hour of passionate excitement. But in this we have been disappointed, and are left alone, in behalf of our country, to make this tardy retribution, to wipe out this new argument for the ingratitude of republicans.

But we are not even so fortunate as to be simply left alone in the performance of our melancholy task; difficulties are thrown in the way of its execution. You cannot, it is said, expunge any thing from the journals of the Senate. You may rescind, repeal, but you cannot expunge. The constitution requires that you shall keep a journal. A journal of what? I ask. Surely the constitution does not require us to keep a journal of things respecting which it has given us no authority to act. It has commanded us to keep a journal of our legislative, executive, and judicial proceedings, and to publish such parts of it as may not, in our judgment, require secrecy. But it has not commanded us, in matters of mere voluntary action, unauthorized by the constitution, to make a record. A few days ago, on the melancholy annunciation of the decease of one of its members, this body resolved to adopt an appropriate badge of sorrow. Does any body contend that such a resolve must necessarily have been committed to the journal, or, being there, that there is no power to take it off. The consequences to which such a position would lead are of themselves sufficient to show its unsoundness. Let us suppose, what I admit is very improbable, that this body, in some very inauspicious moment, were to consist exclusively of atheists, and should record, as a resolution, upon its journal, "There is no God;" when sense and reason resumed their empire here, can it be pretended that the blasphemous resolution could not by vote be expunged? but that it must remain forever, disgraceful to man, and offensive to the Being whose existence was denied? Suppose it should turn out that the lamented gentleman, in commemoration of whose virtues you resolved to mourn, (a thing that I suppose merely for illustration, knowing that it is altogether impossible in that instance,) should, by some posthumous discovery, prove to have been altogether unworthy of your regrets, but, on the contrary, the perpetrator, while alive, of every act disgraceful to his species; must your vote of approbation still remain? Have you no power to efface it? And in the case under consideration, suppose the whole Senate, to a man, as well convinced as I am of the patriotism, wisdom, and benevolence, of the present Chief Magistrate, and the resolution of 1834 had added to the general charge of unconstitutionality, epithets of opprobrium, implying that he was a thief and a perjured knave; would it not be a very insufficient atonement to say to him, we are fully convinced that the charges we have made against you are unjust, and calculated to have a very prejudicial effect upon your character, but what we have written we have written, and we cannot blot it out? The truth is, these are all voluntary expressions of opinion, not commanded or authorized by the constitution; and as they were placed there by the unenforced and unauthorized will of a majority of the body, the will of the majority of this body may remove them; and thus does the concession made at the beginning of my remarks, if founded in truth, destroy all connexion between the constitution and the resolution of 1834. It was an act done without the authority of the constitution, and consequently is entitled to no protection from it.

But gentlemen say that we ought to be contented with repealing or rescinding the obnoxious resolution, and not insist upon the word "expunge." In reply, we say that no other will answer our purpose. If an injurious law is passed, every useful purpose is answered by repealing it. If the Senate, in its executive character, gives bad counsel, a simple correction of its error in general will repair the injury; if in its judicial character it should give an improvident judgment, the most effectual remedy is its reversal. But if it assumes the expression of abstract opinions upon matters in which it is exercising no official action, and those opinions injuriously affect individuals, or are likely to propagate a false state of public sentiment, the only effectual remedy is expunction. Recision or repeal implies little more than mere doubt of the propriety of what has been before done, but expunction implies that it was clearly wrong, and ought never to have been executed. This is precisely what we want on the present occasion; the very strongest expression of our sense of the impropriety of what has been done, and a putting it as far as possible out of existence; nay, as much as may be, placing it as though it had never been. Even if the resolution of 1834 was more immediately than it is under the constitutional protection claimed for it, I should insist that the word "expunge," even unexplained by that portion of the proposed resolution which declares how the expunction is to be effected, was the appropriate expression for our purpose. It has acquired in parliamentary usage a figurative signification, and conveys to the mind a specific idea which no other word will, and is not taken in its original literal meaning.

Indeed, almost every word we use in common parlance has lost its original literal signification, and is understood in a sense altogether figurative. The expression "blot out," being very nearly synonymous with "expunge," is used in the sacred scriptures themselves, in a passage where no man in his senses would, for a moment, think of taking it literally. Speaking to the Israelites, the Almighty is represented as saying, "I will blot out as a thick cloud your transgressions." Now, no one supposes that a literal blotting out or annihilation of the sins of the people was here intended, but only that they would be so completely excluded from the notice of that merciful Being, as to become as though they had never been. The same figurative use of the word "expunge" is intended by the resolution proposed, and we are not left to guess at this intention, for it goes on to explain how the expunction is to be performed, and so describes it as to show that it will still leave the original resolution unmutated and legible. But I do not surrender the ground heretofore taken by others, that no act, however solemn, would be protected by the constitution from actual expunction, if sufficient reason should arise for subjecting it to that process, under any peculiar force of the words "keep" and "publish." I am not ignorant of the wit expended in attempts to ridicule attaching to the word "keep" any other significations than such as suited the purposes of those who, having passed the resolution, are desirous to preserve it. I know full well that the most ridiculous results may be produced by applying a word varying in its significations, according to the subject-matter, to one subject-matter instead of another; and, perhaps, there is no word in the English language whose significations are so numerous, and vary so considerably, according to the subjects to which it is applied, as the word "keep." A reference, then, to the subject-matter will lead us at once, I conceive, to the true signification of the word "keep," as fixed in that clause of the constitution. It is evidently used in reference to a subject-matter in its nature similar to a diary made by an individual, to books in which merchants make entries of transactions in trade, to memoranda made at an auction of the articles sold, their prices, and purchasers. How, then, is the word "keep" understood, as applied to these subjects. If it is said a gentleman keeps a diary, nothing more is intended than that he makes memoranda of what transpires, to be disposed of according to pleasure, without any reference to the term of their preservation. If a clerk is employed to keep books, his task is to make the entries, and he has kept the books, although he may be dismissed as soon as the entries are made. If one is employed to keep the account of sales at an auction, he has done all implied in the term, if he makes the necessary memoranda. And the officer who makes the entries in the journal of the Senate keeps that journal, although he may never see it, except when engaged in making the entries. But if preservation be conceded as the signification of "keeping," as used in the constitution, we answer, the journals will still be kept in the thousands of printed volumes every where extant, although this particular volume should be committed to the flames, or destroyed in the ingenious manner suggested by the Senator from Alabama. And, at any rate, that preservation, coupled as it is with publication, must be taken as limited to the purpose of publication, which having been fulfilled, the object for which preservation is enjoined has been reached, and the force of the command expended. Believing, then, as I do, that the act of the Senate, in adopting the resolution of 1834, was not unconstitutional, I see no difficulty in the way of its expunction, and only ask that the following amendments to the preamble may be adopted, to enable me heartily to vote for both it and the resolution which follows it.

Mr. STRANGE then moved to amend the preamble to the resolution, by striking out of the last paragraph of the first page the words "irregularly, illegally, and unconstitutionally," and inserting in lieu thereof, "was not warranted by the constitution, and was irregular and illegally." In the second page, strike out the word "unconstitutional," and insert the words "unauthorized by the constitution." And in the third page, strike out "violation of the constitution," and insert "not warranted by the constitution."

Mr. BENTON observed that he saw some difference between the words proposed to be inserted and those already in the preamble; however, he was not, he said, at all tenacious on the subject; and he expressed his willingness to accept the amendments.

Mr. EWING then rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: Since the first presentation of this resolution, it has always been my purpose to say something upon it, before it should be brought to a final decision; but I was aware, from indications not to be mistaken, both at the time it was first presented, and at each subsequent session when it was brought forward, that the mover did not design to bring it then to the issue. Indeed, I well knew that it was deemed necessary, as a pending measure, to agitate and excite the country. Every movement with reference to it showed that such was its purpose; and hence, after several months' discussion last year, when there was a clear administration majority in the Senate, and when the long session gave ample time for deliberation and decision, it was permitted to expire on the table, though a vote upon it was challenged by its opponents. But now, now at this moment, its power being expended—every thing being effected by it which can be expected or hoped for it—now it must come, and at once, to a final vote. And gentlemen upon this side of the House, who have been called upon to discuss it—who, because they would not, heretofore, when they saw that it was but a farce, discuss it—are denied a single day—nay, they are not allowed one hour, of which it is in the power of a fixed and determined majority to deprive them. No courtesy to individuals, which has been usual with this body, or, rather, a part of its very constitution and nature, can procure the slightest relaxation of the iron rule which seems to be laid down for us; the small favor of a day to deliberate or a night to rest is denied; if we ask for an adjournment, even at this late hour, when all occupation should be suspended, and all labor cease, we hear the cry of "No, no," and "the yeas and nays, the yeas and nays," coming from a quarter which, however it may be respected, is never disobeyed. Gentlemen have their reasons, doubtless. I leave them to weigh the importance of those reasons, and to estimate the propriety of their course. And, subject to all the disadvantages under which I labor—the extreme lateness of the hour, great bodily fatigue, and a want of time to arrange my thoughts and cast them into form, and give them coherence, I proceed, rather than sit by in silence—I proceed to the discussion of this deeply exciting question.

I will not enter again fully into a consideration of the reasons that sustain the resolution of the Senate of the 28th day of March, 1834, which it is now proposed to expunge from the journals of the Senate. At the time when those resolutions were under discussion, I gave reasons, so far as my action was concerned, fully, and in detail. I have re-examined those reasons since, when any excitement to which the occasion may be supposed to have given rise had subsided, and I find nothing to retract, nothing to alter; time has made no change in my convictions, unless it be to strengthen and confirm them. It would, therefore, be unnecessary for me to touch again that branch of the subject, were it not that the arguments upon the other side have, year after year, been reiterated and re-enforced; the subject which had been thus considered, discussed, decided, and laid aside, is thus revived from time to time, and the arguments upon the one side, with a perseverance worthy of a better cause, are again and again shown up before the public, while those which sustained that resolution, having once been triumphant, are since permitted to sleep. I feel the impolicy of our course in this, for hence impressions have taken root, and opinions have grown up in society, which constant vigilance and constant effort, and constantly uniting at all times, and pressing the contest, would have kept down; but it was a natural course; it arose from the repugnance which we all feel to turn to a subject on which the mind has exerted its powers, and retrace the path which we have already trodden, after it is divested of the charm of novelty and the freshness of original thought. But let gentlemen be assured, once for all, and let the country be assured, that we abandon no ground which we have assumed and heretofore sustained. Yet, though I will not go fully into the subject now, I will attempt a brief analysis of the arguments which, on a former occasion, I presented at large to the Senate.

It is perhaps necessary, in the first place, to say something of the character of the resolution of 1834, and to define as nearly as possible what we understood it to import. Gentlemen say that, in its terms, it conveyed censure of the act of the President, and pains are taken to show that its words imported censure. Now, sir, this argument was wholly unnecessary; this declaration useless; a simple inquiry would have settled the fact; for, so far as I was concerned in this matter, and in this I believe I differed but little from those with whom I acted, I intended no praise—no laudation of the President or his executive act; that was not my object in voting for the resolution. I thought the President, in that act, had broken the laws and violated the constitution of our country; and I intended to say so: I meant to speak the language of an American Senator, and a free American citizen; and the same language which I uttered then I now reiterate, and would on a like occasion again embody it in the form of a resolution. It has also been said that this resolution attributes evil motives to the President, in the performance of this act; and that the act charged, as against the constitution, joined with the motive imputed, forms the subject of impeachment. This is wholly unfounded in fact. The resolution attributes no motive whatever. It speaks in the decorous, and, at the same time, dignified language in which one of the legislative branches of our Government may properly speak of the Executive, or of the co-ordinate branch. We believed that the legislative rights and powers of the Senate had been encroached upon by the President; and that we, who exercised those powers for the time being, as trustees of the people, were called upon to defend, or at least to assert them. This body could speak in that matter only by resolution; and by that means, and in that way, we did assert its rights under the constitution, and we declared that those rights had been violated; but we charged no motive. Gentlemen insist that there is impeachable matter charged in the face of this resolution; and, when we deny it, because no motive is charged, they turn, and say we have abandoned our ground; that we soften down and palliate, to avoid the effect of our own act. This, also, is putting a false face upon the whole matter. I, for one, personally, never said and never believed that the President was actuated in this matter by those high motives of public interest which ought to govern the Executive of a great nation. I never thought so; I never said so; and I have not wavered in my opinion; but that opinion, which was my own, was never incorporated into the resolution, neither in language nor in substance. Then, let the resolution stand for itself, and speak its own language; and let the opinions of each of those who supported it be their own, be they strong or weak, firm or wavering; but let those private and individual opinions be kept distinct from the resolution, and let us be met in the argument fairly, not misrepresented.

I presume it will be admitted that it is in the power o

Congress and the President, conjointly, by a law, to place the public treasure in such a situation that it will not be in the direct and immediate possession and control of the President. Perhaps I ask too much, by way of concession, considering the temper and character of the present times; but the time has been, and, I trust, will be again, when it would strike any American statesman as a self-evident proposition. The constitution declares that no money shall be drawn from the public Treasury except upon appropriations made by law; and if the Executive be a unit, as has been sometimes contended; and if the keeping of the treasure be necessarily an executive office; and if the drawing of money from the Treasury be also an executive office, the keeping of the treasure and the drawing from the Treasury be both done by the same hand, then have the framers of our constitution failed, miserably failed, in their attempt to adjust its checks and balances—in their attempt to place the sword and the purse of the nation in separate and distinct hands. To say that money shall not be drawn from the Treasury except by appropriations made by law, and yet place the whole treasure of the nation in the hands of the Executive, who is (according to the political creed of gentlemen) the disbursing officer, also would be an excess of weakness almost approaching to idiocy.

If, then, it were in the power of Congress to place the public treasure out of the immediate control of the President, it was done in the law chartering the late Bank of the United States. The public moneys were placed in deposit in that bank by law; the bank, therefore, became the Treasury; for that is the Treasury where the public treasure is deposited and kept. The constitution declares that money shall not be drawn from this Treasury except by appropriations made pursuant to law, and the law provides that the deposits (or, in other words, the treasure) shall remain in that bank, unless removed by the Secretary of the Treasury, (not by the President,) and for reasons which he (the Secretary) shall make known to Congress. So stand, or rather so stood, the constitution and the law—as the safeguards of the public treasure. Could the President touch, could he possess himself of that treasure, without an infraction of the law and a violation of the constitution? Could he, by a straight-forward, direct act, in his own name, and by his own power, unaided by any instrument which he might fashion for himself, or which the constitution had placed in his hands for other purposes? If he could not, is the act the less illegal or unconstitutional when done by indirection? All admit that a direct order from the President would not have touched public funds, and that the immediate keepers of those funds would not have been bound to obey, or even have been justified in obeying, such order. But the law placed in the hands of the President an instrument with which it could be done, and with which it was done; and I shall now show that it was done by putting a lawful instrument to an unlawful use.

The constitution places the collection of the revenues of the United States in Congress; and the spirit of that provision, coupled with the other provision which requires a law of Congress to draw money from the Treasury, clearly fixes the custody of those revenues, when collected, in the same hands; and the several laws passed shortly after the adoption of the constitution, separating our Government into Departments, and appointing their heads, recognise and keep up this principle. In those acts the Department of State is called an "executive Department." So with the Department of War; and both communicate directly with the President, and not with Congress; while the Treasury Department is not styled executive, and is made to communicate directly with Congress. Thus is explained the intent of the framers of the constitution, and the understanding which a contemporaneous Congress had of its provisions.

But gentlemen here seize upon general terms used in that instrument, and would make them overturn its most particular and express provisions. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. STRANGE] says that, by the express language of the constitution, "all executive power is vested in the President." The Senator has interpolated a word, and an important one. The constitution does not say "all;" its letter does not, its spirit does not. The language of the constitution is, "the executive power," &c.; but gentlemen, assuming that all executive power is granted, then exercise their ingenuity to find how many of the powers of our Government may be called executive; and all that can be included within that sweeping and undefinable term they attribute to the President. But the constitution does not say "all;" and if it did, the term, as it is elsewhere limited, would not justify their conclusions. Another clause in the constitution does grant "all the legislative powers" to Congress; and yet the same instrument, in another of its articles, confers a large and important portion of those powers upon the President. The judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court of the United States, and such inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time appoint; and yet the same instrument vests in the Senate of the United States an important portion of those judicial powers—the trial of impeachments. It vests in the President "the executive power," and in another article gives to the Senate of the United States a most important share in that executive power. Gentlemen who contend that all power executive in its nature must follow this general grant, and who go for the exact separation, by distinct lines, of the three great powers—legislative, executive, and judicial—and their investment in three separate, uncontrolled, irresponsible, branches, seem to me, with all deference, to understand little of the nature of government. If those powers were exactly separated, so that each stood entirely unchecked and alone, the executive power, being the stronger—indeed, the only power capable of action—having drawn to itself, and, according to gentlemen, being entitled to, the custody of the treasure of the nation, would be independent of all others, and above them all, and all must be absorbed and swallowed up in its vortex.

I have said that the executive act which the resolution of March, 1834, condemns, was, in the language of that resolution, in derogation of both the constitution and law. This I shall attempt to establish.

It was against law. The act of Congress incorporating the Bank of the United States was a law containing in itself a contract as soon as accepted by the bank, and it was a contract for a good and valuable consideration; this contract was violated in its spirit and intent, (and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STRANGE] will not, I presume, deny that this contract had a spirit as well as letter, if the constitution have none.) It was violated in its spirit, and so violated that, as between individuals in a parallel case, an action of law could have been sustained, and damages recovered. This contract was, that the public money should be deposited in the bank, and should be continued there in deposit, until removed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for reasons which he was required to lay before Congress. For this, among other things, the bank agreed to transmit the public funds, wheresoever wanted, free of charge; and it paid, in cash, a large bonus to the Government. Under this contract, it seems to me perfectly obvious, and even self-evident, that the public deposits could not be removed, unless there were some just financial cause for removal. It could not be done to try experiments, nor to test its effect upon the public mind, but for some fiscal reason, of which the Secretary of the Treasury had official cognizance, and which he, as the fiscal agent, could make known to Congress. The removal, too, must, in order to conform to this law, be an act of the Secretary of the Treasury himself—his own official act—his own reason approving, and his own will moving him to its execution. It must have been, likewise, a Secretary, the regular officer of the Government appointed to perform the general duties of that office, and to whose duties this was but incidental and additional; not an officer appointed for the sole and only purpose of doing this act, and pledged or committed to the act before his appointment. If this were not the case, the reference to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the requirement of his reasons, were but a mockery, a criminal evasion of right and justice, which would stamp fraud upon any private contract. I have thus shown what ought to have been done according to a fair and just construction of this law and contract; I will now show what was in fact done.

Just after the adjournment of Congress, and but a few weeks after an inquiry in the House of Representatives, and a decision that the public deposits were safe in the Bank of the United States, the President set on foot negotiations with the State banks, with a view to the removal of the deposits; this without the consent or concurrence of the then Secretary of the Treasury to the removal, but with his known and avowed opinion against the propriety as well as the legality of the act. I speak now of Secretary McLane, who was consulted by the President, and required to do the deed. He would not lend himself to be the instrument for any such purpose; he refused, and was removed from that office, to a higher, it is true, but removed so that he went out of the way, and could not prevent the measure. He was of opinion that the deposits could not legally be removed without a reason, and that the reasons alleged as existing were unfounded or insufficient. Now, I contend that, according to any fair construction of the law, the bank had a right to the judgment of Mr. McLane, then Secretary of the Treasury, on that subject, and was entitled to all the benefit of his judgment and his volition; and it was a breach, or, worse, a dishonest evasion of that contract, to put that Secretary out of the way, his opinion having been taken, and because his opinion was taken, and put another in his place in order to try the experiment upon and by that other, especially as the then Secretary was not even accused of the slightest impropriety in his judgment or in his acts. His promotion to a superior office shows that he had not lost the confidence of the Executive. Mr. McLane was removed, and Mr. Duane appointed specially to perform the act. He was approached on the subject, immediately after his appointment, in a manner which touched his spirit and wounded his pride, and by an individual from whose communion he shrunk with disgust. He was pressed by the President himself, but at last refused, because the reasons for the act were insufficient, and he was removed; and so far as executive disappointment and party slander could do it, he was disgraced. The President then called in a third Secretary, who had pronounced an opinion before his appointment; and by the President, through him, the act was done. Now, I say that, if in a parallel case between individuals this course had been pursued by one party towards the other, any court or jury would decide, any honest community would declare, that the contract was violated—shamefully violated.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] in his zeal to vindicate the acts of the President, and testify his gratitude to him, has done injustice to some of his own constituents—to men, in all the relations of life, social and official, as correct and honorable as himself. The gentleman said that the directors of the Bank of the United States, for political effect, for the purpose of operating upon the elections, and compelling a recharter, of the bank, first threw out a large amount of bank paper, and created a delusive prosperity; then suddenly contracted their issues, in order to distress the community, and make them cry out for a recharter. This, sir, is not true in the connexion and the manner in which it is stated; it is not true in fact, to say nothing about motive. The bank did not contract its issues until it had received notice—unofficial, it is true, but not until it had received notice—that the deposits would be withdrawn, and that the executive power and influence would be directed against the institution, to discredit and destroy it. The documents laid upon our table during that agitating session conclusively show this fact. The public prints of the day, on the side of the administration, show it. The speeches of Senators in this body at that time show it. By all these the bank was declared to be insolvent, and unworthy of credit. The public deposits were said to be unsafe in its vaults, in consequence of that insolvency; and the agent appointed by the President to settle the preliminaries of a contract with some of the State banks declares that he will bring the Bank of the United States, as a reptile, to the feet of the Executive. Then, with all this executive power and executive influence directed against it, with this large amount of public deposits to be suddenly and capriciously withdrawn, while at the same time the party press resounded through the Union the approaching prostration and destruction of the bank; while the institution was assailed on all sides, and unadvised of the point at which the next attack was to be made; I ask you, sir, and I ask every candid man, whether the men who managed the affairs of that institution, whose public and whose private characters also were in a high degree involved in making good its defence, I ask whether they can be censured, with any show or color of justice, for using all the lawful means which were placed in their hands to sustain and support the credit of the institution.

Sir, not only their duty to themselves, but their duty to the public at large, required it. If that bank had fallen beneath the weight of the executive arm, it would have dragged down with it most of the banks in the Union, and it would have caused much individual distress, bankruptcy, and ruin. Hence every principle of self-preservation, every motive of patriotism and of duty, united to impel those men to use every means so to guard and fortify and defend their institution as that it would stand the shock. And they did guard it and defend it so that it withstood a power before which the Bank of England would have fallen, even in its most palmy days. Perhaps they fortified their fortress more strongly than actual necessity required; perhaps they overrated the strength of the enemy, and were not fully conscious of their own; perhaps they remained in their intrenchments after the siege was raised, or the power of the assailants had become exhausted; but if they erred, it was on the side not of danger but of duty, and their success has conferred a lasting benefit on the country. This much I have thought proper to say in behalf of those gentlemen with whom I have some acquaintance, but no connexion of any kind; and I say it as an act of common justice towards them, who have been attacked, and whose acts have been misrepresented on this floor.

The Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE,] in the abundance of his charity, declares that he does not accuse Senators of taking bribes of the Bank of the United States. He acquits them of the foul charge, as he really believes they were not bribed. The Senate are much indebted to the honorable member for his decree of acquittal, especially as they never constituted him their judge. But what right has he, or what right has any man who is not himself shameless, in the presence of this body or elsewhere, to entertain the infamous proposition for a moment, to speak of it in terms of either denial or belief; to refer to it at all, except to consign the base slanderers who invented and who uttered it, to the depth of infamy which their atrocious falsehoods have merited? But there are bounds to the liberality of the Senator from North Carolina. He thinks, if I have comprehended him, that gentlemen here who were counsel for the Bank of the United States may have been warped in their feelings and judgment from that cause, to form opinions which no unbiased and intelligent man could form, and to do acts which no honest man having an intellect much above idiocy could do. The Senator has not told us where, or how, or among whom, he has formed his opinion of the bar, especially of those who are admitted to be among its best and most honorable and most enlightened members.

[Mr. STRANGE explained: did not say that gentlemen who were counsel for the bank were biased from that cause, but that they were warped by political excitement.]

I am happy (said Mr. E.) to receive the explanation of the Senator from North Carolina, and yet I am at a loss to comprehend how he used the fact of the employment of some gentlemen as legal counsel for the bank, and the statement of that fact following, with a "but," the general acquittal of direct and naked bribery. But however these engagements may have been supposed by him or others to operate on the minds of gentlemen with whom they were made, they certainly never affected mine, as I never was in any case the counsel of that institution. Still I know not but the same influence may be brought equally home to me, for I in several cases profited by the litigation of the bank, by engagements on the opposite side, which engagements I should never have had, if there had been no bank to bring suits against those who employed me to defend them. So that, on the whole, I believe I must even share with my friends here, whom I have sometimes met in the hall below, where justice is still administered, and where truth and reason and law are not yet outraged or spurned. I must even content myself to share with them in the imputation of that bias which counsellors at law are supposed to feel in behalf of those through whose means they obtain a cause in a court of justice.

But I do not admit that the Senator's charge, as explained, approaches nearer to the truth than that which I had mistaken for it, and which he has just corrected. I, for one, was not moved in this matter by political interest or political excitement. It was a subject for cool deliberation and sober judgment, and I brought the powers of my mind calmly and patiently to act upon it; and when full conviction followed investigation, and my opinion was fixed, I acted in obedience to the dictates of that judgment, not under excitement—unless, indeed, a strong feeling of attachment to those abstractions called law and right, which at some times, and in some minds, warms, and kindles, and glows to enthusiasm, is to be called by that name.

I have said, and have attempted to show, that the act of the President, in the removal of the deposits, was illegal. The Senator from North Carolina cannot conceive it possible that any man can hold such an opinion; but he tells us that he was himself startled at the boldness of the act: he feared the people would not sustain it. And permit me, with all deference, to say to that gentleman, that if the people had not sustained it, he would then have been startled at its illegality. I thought it illegal; so thought twenty-eight out of forty-eight Senators in this body; so thought McLane, Secretary of the Treasury: so thought Duane, who was made Secretary for the mere purpose of doing the act. And when they thought so, their political feelings and their personal predilections were all on the side of those doing the act which their judgments condemned. This same act, sir, which startled the Senator from North Carolina in his private retreat, startled also the nation; and the sensation did not subside until they and he had become used and reconciled to new and extravagant acts of executive power. There are other gentlemen now on this floor who condemned this act in the strongest terms, until they knew that the popular voice would sustain it. The Senator from Virginia near me, [Mr. RIVES,] at the close of the last session, in a speech which, I am sorry to say, has never found its way into the public papers, declared that in this act he thought the Executive had gone to the very verge of the constitution, but that he had not overstepped it. I differed from the Senator from Virginia in this only: I thought he had not only gone to the verge of the constitutional boundary, but that he had broken over it. That gentleman and myself were separated in opinion by a mere mathematical line—length, without breadth or thickness—for he thought, and so said on the occasion I have referred to, that the custody of the public treasure belonged, by the constitution, to the representatives of the States and of the people; and that almost any sacrifice ought to be made, in order to restore it to their hands. But the Senator from North Carolina—whose opinion, since he has recovered from the first surprise that the executive act occasioned, is, on this subject especially, entitled to a very great weight—thinks that no man, possessing both honesty and sense, could vote for the resolution which passed the Senate.

[Mr. STRANGE. I did not say so. I said they could not, unless under strong previous bias.]

Mr. EWING. The explanation amounts to but little. A bias which destroyed the honesty or obscured the sense is now introduced and attributed, to lighten the odium of the charge which his unqualified language, as I understood it, cast upon the former majority of this body. And now, the Senator from Virginia, who believed the President had gone to the very verge of the constitution, and had then possessed himself of the treasure which, by that constitution, belonged to the representatives of the people, and the Senator from North Carolina, who was, in private, "startled" by the boldness of the act, until he found that the people sustained it, are ready to vote censure and obloquy upon those Senators who ventured to express an opinion, before they knew whether that opinion would be sustained by the popular voice or not. For one, I respect not their opinions, so elicited and so expressed; and I scorn their censure and their reproach. When men use language harsh or vindictive, or utter degrading charges against others at least as honorable as themselves, they seize a two-edged sword, which often wounds the hand that wields it. I am willing to stand in the ranks in which I then stood, and now stand, and receive their onset, no matter how fierce and how furious. I am willing to risk the character of the majority which passed that resolution, for integrity and intelligence, and independence of thought and of action, against this majority, which is now the instrument of its repudiation. And if, in connexion with the pregnant incidents of the times, the names of those who have taken part in the moving scenes should descend, and pass in review before posterity, I feel that I have well chosen the rank in which my humble name shall stand to receive the judgment of that august tribunal.

I find that I am desultory and diffuse in my course of discussion, but time was not allowed me to prepare to be connected and brief. I have shown that the removal of the deposits was in violation of a contract, and against law. I shall now endeavor to make good the position that it was in violation of the constitution. For this a few words will suffice; for it flows as a consequence from the illegality of the act of removal, and the conceded point that the Legislature, and not the Executive, is the constitutional keeper and guardian of the public treasure. The President, if he had seized that treasure by an act of open and direct violence, and become himself the keeper, in defiance of legislative authority, would, by the concurrent opinion of all here, have violated that constitution which made the Legislature its keeper. But if, through the exercise of a power which the law (not the constitution) placed in his hands for other purposes, he did by lawful means effect this unconstitutional object, does it vary the case, or make the violation of the constitution less certain? The President had by law a right to remove the Secretary of the Treasury, though he had no right to seize the public treasure; but, through the exercise of that power of removal, exerted for that distinct and avowed purpose, and that purpose only, he did seize upon the public treasure, and dispose of it according to his will. He used a lawful weapon to do an illegal and unconstitutional act. This is not difficult to be comprehended. A man has a legal right to use his own walking-stick; yet it is easy to conceive how he may use it illegally. The Senator from Virginia admits that the President almost violated the constitution. "He marched to its verge." I say he overstepped it.

These are my reasons for thinking and for voting that the executive act of the President in the case referred to was not in accordance with the constitution and law, but in violation of both; and I care not how lightly the Senator from North Carolina may speak of either the sense or honesty which dictated that opinion and that vote. Language such as his on this occasion falls harmless to the ground, or recoils on him who utters it.

Having proved the statement in the resolution true, the next inquiry is as to our right to spread it on the record. Gentlemen on the side of the administration heap upon the act, in this aspect of it, the terms "shameful," "disgraceful," "flagrant impropriety"—all the epithets of detestation and abhorrence which those diligent gentlemen have been able to collect and amass from our whole vocabulary. But let this pass; it amounts to little. Reproach and violence from those who profess to pass judgment leaves an intelligent public (to whom is the final appeal) impressed with the conviction that the discretion of the judge was lost in his own passion. They probably will not stop to inquire what has become of his propriety. On the one hand, towards the former majority of the Senate we have vituperation and reproach fit to be cast only on a tenant of Newgate, by a felon like himself; and towards the President tirade upon tirade of fulsome flattery, which would make even a coquette turn sick. Let all this go to the country; a discerning public will see what I see—motives not to be named or avowed, lying deep in the breasts of those who say and do these things—deep, but not hidden, and prompting them, or rather goading them on to the act. As the deed is to be done, I am glad it comes in the form and is pressed in the spirit and temper which here discloses itself; for, being so done, it will be repudiated as authority, either as to opinion or fact, by every honest and candid mind.

Why was it improper or indelicate to pass this resolution, if the facts and opinions set forth in it be true and correct? Gentlemen say we may not express our opinion of the act, because we may possibly be the triers of the actor. The President might, by possibility, be impeached, and we, as a Senate, would be called upon to try him; therefore, it was indelicate and improper to give an opinion beforehand which might influence our decision hereafter. Now, my answer to this is, that the question of delicacy and propriety here put is merely of a personal nature, and addresses itself to each individual member rather than to the whole body; for the Senate, as a body, was not committed to any thing by that resolution. Suppose, then, at the time these resolutions passed, with the full knowledge that all of us had of the power of the Executive and the state of parties in the other House; suppose any one here, being asked privately his opinion on the subject, had declined, as a matter of delicacy, to give it, lest he should be committed in case of an impeachment preferred against the President, which would you have considered it, a serious scruple, or rather an idle jest? The truth is, there is nothing in the point, nor am I able to convince myself that any man ("except under strong political bias") can believe there is any thing in it. As for myself, I knew there was to be no impeachment, and no trial; and my own opinion of propriety and right was then, as it is now, the guide of my own actions. The President had done an act violatory of the constitution, and especially affecting the powers and rights of this body as one of the legislative branches of the Government. What was to be done? Reassert the constitution and the rights of the Senate by law? The executive veto was ready to give a quietus to every law which you might have attempted to pass. He had possessed himself of the public treasure, and you could pass no law to wrest it from his hands. What was to be done? Be calm, say gentlemen; be quiet; make no disturbance; it is quite startling; but say nothing; the country can stand it; and perhaps, if you are silent and patient under this, the President may commit no more acts of violence; but, if you irritate, he may do still worse things. They therefore would have recommended silence and submission.

The Senate, as a legislative body, has the right to assert its own powers by virtue of that first of nature's laws, self-preservation. A body composed of numerous members can speak only by some prescribed form, such as an order or resolution; and as, in this case, their constitutional powers were assailed, it was their duty, their solemn duty, to reassert them, that the invasion might not stand without objection or contradiction, and thus become a binding precedent in future times.

The resolution of the Senate is also objected to as one couched in terms of censure against the President; it is said to be reproachful in its language and its import. Believing that I have established the position that the resolution is true in point of fact and opinion, and that it was due to the rights of this body, which we were delegated by the States, for the time being, to guard and protect, that we should, in a resolution couched in some language, assert those rights; I now ask any candid man, whether a partisan of the President or not, if he can devise any language, conveying the substance and sense of that resolution, which shall be more decorous and more courteous than that? Can you, sir, convey the idea in milder, more dignified, and more appropriate language? It is true it contains no compliment, no adulation. This the Senator from Pennsylvania has discovered, and therefore condemns it. That gentleman, in reference to the President, uses the word "immaculate," which I never before heard applied to but one created being, and that in worship. This resolution contains no such term, as applied to the President; and I think I would not now, if it were again before the Senate, move to insert the word, even if that would gain for it the vote of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

In England, from which we derive our free institutions, and to which we still refer for precedent of parliamentary independence, (God knows how long those examples may be endured,) in England it is not deemed the duty of Parliament to address the King, or to answer his address, in terms only of acquiescence and praise. The British Parliament represents a free people, and they have not forgotten to speak the language of freemen; and did any one ever hear of an attempt in that body to cast reproach upon itself or any of its members, because they ventured in such address to move or to express disapprobation of the acts of their monarch, or to assert their own rights or the rights of the people? It certainly has not been deemed a cause for expunging their journals that they contain something disagreeable to majesty. There was a time, it is true, as late as the reign of Charles the First, when the King sent into the House of Commons his warrant to arrest and imprison members for words uttered on the floor of Parliament; but that time has gone by. Great Britain, moving in the direction towards freedom and the perfecting of free institutions, has long since passed that point, and we, tending as rapidly towards despotic power, have not yet quite reached it. When we look at British precedents and refer to British history, we ought not to forget that they and we have started at different points, and are moving in different directions. They, beginning with an irregular and almost despotic monarchy, with undefined powers, checked only by the strength of the feudal aristocracy, have marched onward slowly but steadily, step by step, towards the perfection of a free and representative Government; and perhaps they are still moving onward. We, commencing with a pure constitutional representative Government, with justly balanced powers, have rushed onward with a velocity almost inconceivable towards despotism, if it be decorous to call that despotism which concentrates all the powers of the Government in a single man, and makes his will the law. If, in our different course, we should meet our great archetype, and find, at some one moment of our history, our Government to be what hers is or was, we are not to suppose that our career is thenceforward to be the same. If we meet, we pass with the swiftness of moving engines, so that we can scarcely catch a glance of that which we have met, and from which we are passing.

Mr. President, every thing intrinsic and extrinsic, all that can catch the popular ear or enlist one vulgar passion, no matter how low and base, is resorted to by gentlemen who ought to be, and who are, honorable, to sustain them in the commission of this act. The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] could you credit it, sir, says that this Senate, which is one of the constitutional departments of our Government, and without which the form as well as the essence of our Government could not exist; that this Senate, of which he himself is a member, and which a common but very homely proverb might teach him he could not dishonor without self-degradation; this Senate, he says, is essentially an aristocratic body, riding upon the backs of the people. Do we hear that here, and from such a source, or was I deceived? Who are they that compose the aristocracy of this body? Men elected by the States to discharge, for a time, an important trust; and who, when that trust is discharged, and the period of their service ended, return again to the common mass from which they were taken. Aristocracy! Where is the danger, where is the possibility, of an aristocratic order rising up in this Union? Look about you every where; men who hold the highest stations, and wield the greatest influence, and even wealth, spring from the common ranks of the people. Their power and their influence they cannot transmit; and, as to their wealth, when the hand that gathered and the hand which holds it shall moulder in the dust, it is scattered to the four winds of heaven; it goes to build up and enrich the son of the hard-handed yeoman; and the children's children of him who counted his gold by millions become, not beggars, but common laborers in our streets. Where, then, is the danger of aristocracy in America? There is one source from which it may flow in upon us, and one only. When our public offices become transmissible by the will of the incumbent to his successor; when the men who hold station can direct the line through which the succession to that station shall descend, whether by birth to the son, or by appointment to the favorite, we have, in substance, a monarchy, and we have an aristocracy, in the classic language of the Senator, "riding on the backs of the people;" nay, we have worse, a shameful, corrupt, and corrupting oligarchy.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] says that the Senate is merely called upon to rejudge its own justice; in other words, to determine whether the opinion it expressed was correct or not. But is this true? Is that the act to which the majority of the Senate is now proceeding? If so, it were but an expression of opinion adverse to opinions heretofore expressed by a former majority, and entirely consistent with gentlemanly intercourse and feeling. But no such thing. No; it is placed, and it is pressed, as a vote of censure and opprobrium upon the former majority. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, it seems, once intended it should assume a form consistent with the courtesy and propriety of legislative bodies. He promised the striking out of the obnoxious word "expunge," and so the resolution was to have passed; and what strong motive, or strong offence, could have induced the Senator to abandon his conciliatory course, and again poison the resolution with insult and reproach? What, think you, could have so driven him from his propriety? Why, truly a Senator from Massachusetts, some two years since, moved to lay the expunging resolution, when so amended, on the table; that was the insult; a motion to lay a resolution on the table is the mighty insult which swells the hearts of gentlemen almost to bursting with patriotic indignation, and which justifies all this harsh and ruthless violence. Hence the word "expunge" in the body of the resolution. Hence a recital charged with as harsh and injurious imputation as gentlemen can use towards each other, if not more harsh and more injurious. The Senator from Pennsylvania says he wished to be saved the necessity of compelling the Senate to vote this stigma upon themselves. Who, I ask, gave him, and those with whom he acts, power, and who gave them impunity, to fix stigmas, or compel stigmas, upon men, in all things honorable, their equals at least? Who cares for their stigma or their censure? I, for one, cast them to the winds. I despise, I trample upon them. Sir, since it has been determined that a resolution in any form inconsistent with the resolution of March, 1834, should pass; and since there is at last a majority in the Senate ready to obey the mandate, I am glad once again that it contains substance, and has assumed a form, which will forever destroy it as authority for the future; and when it comes to an issue such as this, veracity, and honor, and character brought into collision, I fear not the issue of the contest, and I care not with what weapons it is waged. All at last results in an appeal to the country and to future times. And if this resolution had been couched in language of decent sobriety; if it had been in its terms calm, dispassionate, and strong, it would, by virtue of the names which support it, have carried with it much weight and authority; but now there is no danger of this; the resolution itself, and the speeches with which it is ushered in, show the spirit by which it is moved. Sir Edward Coke, at a time when he was himself a sycophant, called Sir Walter Raleigh "a spider of hell," because Raleigh was unhappily out of favor with his sovereign; yet, no one at this day esteems Coke the more or Raleigh the less for this outpouring of malignity. Edmund Saunders, in the report of one of his cases at law, says that Twysden (Justice) gave judgment in furore; and he adds, in his quiet manner, "note, reader, this judgment was clearly wrong;" and such has been the universal opinion of the profession since; and such will be the opinion, a priori, of mankind, as to every judicial decision, and every act of a deliberative body, which is the result of passion rather than reason and judgment.

The majority of the Senate, who are moving on, or, perhaps, more properly speaking, moved on, to the destruction of the journals, ought to consider well the act which they are about to perform. The constitution, which we and they are sworn to support, requires that the Senate shall "keep" a journal of their proceedings; much useless learning was expended upon this word at the last session. We know its meaning without consulting our dictionaries; its popular sense is its true sense. The framers of the constitution did not search books for the definition of the word, but understood it and used it in its plain and obvious sense; and they would have been astonished if it had been told them that that word could ever become the subject of cavil. That it has so, and that it is now the doctrine of the majority that the destruction of the record is no infraction of the constitution, which requires that it shall be kept, is a touchstone by which the value of their judgment against the former majority of the Senate may be tested. It is a matter that every man of plain common sense can understand and decide as well as the most learned and most wise; and they can, from this specimen, determine how much weight is due to the opinions of men who hold that to erase, to blot out, to expunge, is not inconsistent with the command "to keep," to which command we all have sworn obedience. I will not touch the miserable sophistry by which gentlemen attempt to evade the meaning and wrest the sense of this provision of the constitution: it does not merit a reply.

The constitution of Pennsylvania is substantially copied, in this particular, from the constitution of the United States; like that, it contains a provision that both Houses shall keep a journal. The Senator from Pennsylvania, many years ago, while a member of one branch of that Legislature, moved a resolution declaring that it was a violation of the constitution to expunge anything from the journal once entered there. He is of the same opinion still; and he proposes to be consistent, and yet vote for expunging what is entered on the journals of this body, under a precisely similar constitutional provision. Could any man who had not heard him conjecture how this could be done? The word expunge has, he says, a literal, and it has also a metaphorical meaning; and the records of the Senate are to be expunged metaphorically. What a farce, if its atrocity would permit us to look upon it as a subject of ridicule! But who could avoid smiling, even in the midst of bitterness, to see the array of authorities which the erudite Senator adduced to show that the word "expunge" is used metaphorically in cases where it cannot have a literal application? He has shown us examples in which good writers speak of expunging forms of government, systems of religion, and the vices of men—all clearly metaphorical, and known at once to be so, because they are not susceptible of the literal and physical application of the term. You cannot draw a black line over, nor can you draw black lines round, a "form of government," for you cannot touch it or handle it, though you may mar its symmetry and destroy its strength; nor can you take physical, tangible hold of systems of religion or of human vices; hence the terms you apply to them are necessarily metaphorical, whether you expunge, uproot, or demolish them. But if you expunge a writing which is on paper, or uproot a tree or shrub, or demolish a building, the words then have their literal meaning, capable only of literal, physical application; and he who pretends to use it under those circumstances metaphorically, wrests the word from its true use, and gives it a false application. Expunge metaphorically! The disquisition of the learned gentleman reminds me of the death of two doughty heroes in a fatal battle, commemorated in the "Rape of the Lock"—

"One died in metaphor, and one in song."

But the Senator from Pennsylvania has spread cheering prospects before us; a bright vista, opening amid the surrounding gloom, to delight our vision. This, he says, is the last exciting subject that is to agitate our councils; we are to have a halcyon season; all is to be, henceforth, quiet, and kindness, and peace. But he has not told us how these things are to be brought to pass; whether this is the last act of violence that is to be perpetrated by the majority against the constitution of their country and the rights of this body; or whether he supposes that, by this, the spirit of liberty is to be crushed, and we are to be awed to silence and submission. I will suppose the first, as it better accords with the kindness which he still entertains for those whose rights and feelings he has most outraged; and if so, his language may be rendered into brief, plain English, thus: Gentlemen, be quiet and be calm; meet us with no arguments, and cast on us no reproaches; the President must be gratified, because he is immaculate; and you must be stigmatized, because you have offended him. We may be somewhat harsh and unscrupulous, but excuse us, for we are very much excited; but this is the last time we will do an act of lawless violence against you; all shall be, henceforth, justice and peace.

I should be gratified to know that the Senator from Pennsylvania has that power over the political elements which he seems to claim in giving us this strong assurance of their future quiet. Would that we could rely upon his promise or his prediction; but no, he is deceived. Those who have abandoned the standard of the constitution and the law cannot, when they choose, rear it again, and rally the hosts around it, and calm their fears, and reanimate their confidence. They cannot lay their hands upon the institutions of their country, and pull down and destroy, until they themselves shall be satisfied, and then bid the work of mischief cease. When the ocean is lashed into a rage, no matter who are the spirits of the storm, they cannot say to it, "thus far shalt thou go, and no farther; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." No, he is deceived; there are other powers in motion below and around him which he wists not of, and whose might he can neither direct nor resist. I have stood upon the borders of this mighty ocean, and noted the precursors of the coming storm. I have heard the moan of the waves in the caverns of the deep, and seen the upheaving of the billows, which will rise, and rage, and toss, as foam from their crest, him and those who are now his trust and his strength.

Mr. President, I envy not the triumph of him who has pressed forward these resolutions, against the opinions, and the feelings, and the consciences, of those whom he has found means to compel to their support—resolutions which he has urged on with passions—fierce, vindictive furious. Still less do I envy the condition of those who are compelled to go onward, against all those feelings and motives which should direct the actions of the legislator and the man. Why do I see around me so many pale features and downcast eyes, unless it be that repentance and remorse go hand in hand with the perpetration of the deed? I had rather stand with the minority; yes, I would rather a thousand times stand alone, powerless but conscience free, than to wield the strength of an empire, on the hard conditions on which it is placed in their hands.

But this scene is passing, and will soon have passed, not to be recalled—the deed is to be done, and you and we must submit our acts to an enlightened public, whose judgment will be a foretaste of the judgment of posterity. To these I bow with submission and hope, but not with unwavering confidence of the future. The fame of those who have joined in this struggle for the constitution depends upon the final success of constitutional government. If that prevail and endure, if the clouds that overshadow its prospects pass away, and it be restored to what it once was, in all its freshness and beauty, every thing that we could desire for ourselves and our country is attained. But if we still move on in the downward course; if the cataract only be passed, and we are to glide on in the smooth but rapid current into the gulf to which we have been tending, and are never to return, these struggles will be referred to hereafter as scenes in which the country was disturbed by violent and factious spirits, and the names of those who stood for the constitution amid these stormy scenes will be mentioned only with censure and reproach. So it has been in times past. When the last spark of Roman liberty was extinguished, and a monarch's court and council occupied the forum and the Senate chamber, when no voice but that of Augustus was heard, and no power but his was known, the venal flatterers of his court vied with each other in heaping praise on him, and censure and reproach on those firm spirits who stood for their country to the last, and were at last buried in its ruins. Cæsar, by his power and clemency, had subjugated a world; all but the dark and unbending soul of Cato. In an event such as this, (which Heaven avert,) let the little band to which it is my pride to belong share in the reproach as they share in the spirit of the last of the Romans—that spirit which scorns to bow before any earthly power, save that of their country and its laws.

When Mr. EWING had concluded,

The question was taken on the amendments of Mr. STRANGE, and they were agreed to.

The debate having closed, and the question being about to be taken, Mr. WEBSTER rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: Upon the truth and justice of the original resolution of the Senate, and upon the authority of the Senate to pass that resolution, I had an opportunity to express my opinions at a subsequent period, when the President's protest was before us. Those opinions remain altogether unchanged.

And now, had the constitution secured the privilege of entering a PROTEST on the journal, I should not say one word on this occasion; although, if what is now proposed shall be accomplished, I know not what would have been the value of such a provision, however formally or carefully it might have been inserted in the body of that instrument.

But, as there is no such constitutional privilege, I can only effect my purpose by thus addressing the Senate; and I rise, therefore, to make that PROTEST in this manner, in the face of the Senate, and in the face of the country, which I cannot present in any other form.

I speak in my own behalf, and in behalf my colleague; we both speak as Senators from the State of Massachusetts, and, as such, we solemnly PROTEST against this whole proceeding.

We deny that Senators from other States have any power or authority to expunge any vote or votes which we have given here, and which we have recorded, agreeably to the express provision of the constitution.

We have a high personal interest, and the State whose representatives we are, has also a high interest in the entire preservation of every part and parcel of the record of our conduct, as members of the Senate.

This record the constitution solemnly declares shall be kept; but the resolution before the Senate declares that this record shall be expunged.

Whether subterfuge and evasion, and, as it appears to us, the degrading mockery of drawing black lines upon the journal, shall or shall not leave our names and our votes legible, when this violation of the record shall have been completed, still the terms "to expunge" and the terms "to keep," when applied to a record, import ideas exactly contradictory; as much so as the terms "to preserve" and the terms "to destroy."

A record which is expunged, is not a record which is kept, any more than a record which is destroyed can be a record which is preserved. The part expunged is no longer part of the record; it has no longer a legal existence. It cannot be certified as a part of the proceeding of the Senate for any purpose of proof or evidence.

The object of the provision in the constitution, as we think, most obviously is, that the proceedings of the Senate shall be preserved, in writing, not for the present only, not until published only, because a copy of the printed journal is not regular legal evidence; but preserved indefinitely; preserved, as other records are preserved, till destroyed by time or accident.

Every one must see that matters of the highest importance depend on the permanent preservation of the journals of the two Houses. What but the journals show that bills have been regularly passed into laws, through the several stages; what but the journal shows who are members, or who is President, or Speaker, or Secretary, or Clerk, of the body? What but the journal contains the proof, necessary for the justification of those who act under our authority, and who, without the power of producing such proof, must stand as trespassers? What but the journals show who is appointed, and who rejected, by us, on the President's nomination; or who is acquitted, or who convicted, in trials on impeachment? In short, is there, at any time, any other regular and legal proof of any act done by the Senate than the journal itself?

The idea, therefore, that the Senate is bound to preserve its journal only until it is published, and then may alter, mutilate, or destroy it at pleasure, appears to us one of the most extraordinary sentiments ever advanced.

We are deeply grateful to those friends who have shown, with so much clearness, that all the precedents relied on to justify or to excuse this proceeding, are either not to the purpose, or, from the times and circumstances at and under which they happened, are no way entitled to respect in a free Government, existing under a written constitution. But, for ourselves, we stand on the plain words of that constitution itself. A thousand precedents elsewhere made, whether ancient or modern, can neither rescind, nor control, nor explain away, these words.

The words are, that "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings." No gloss, no ingenuity, no specious interpretation, and much less can any fair or just reasoning reconcile the process of expunging with the plain meaning of these words, to the satisfaction of the common sense and honest understanding of mankind.

If the Senate may now expunge one part of the journal of a former session, it may, with equal authority, expunge another part, or the whole. It may expunge the entire record of any one session, or of all sessions.

It seems to us inconceivable how any men can regard such a power, and its exercise at pleasure, as consistent with the injunction of the constitution. It can make no difference what is the completeness or incompleteness of the act of expunging, or by what means done, whether by erasure, obliteration, or defacement; if by defacement, as here proposed, whether one word or many words are written on the face of the record; whether little ink or much ink is shed on the paper; or whether some part, or the whole, of the original written journal may yet by possibility be traced. If the act done be an act to expunge, to blot out, obliterate, to erase the record, then the record is expunged, blotted out, obliterated, and erased. And mutilation and alteration violate the record as much as obliteration or erasure. A record, subsequently altered, is not the original record. It no longer gives a just account of the proceedings of the Senate. It is no longer true. It is, in short, no journal of the real and actual proceedings of the Senate, such as the constitution says each House shall keep.

Expunging Resolution.

The constitution, therefore, is, in our deliberate judgment, violated by this proceeding in the most plain and open manner.

The constitution, moreover, provides that the yeas and nays, on any question, shall, at the request of one fifth of the members present, be entered on the journal. This provision, most manifestly, gives a personal right to those members who may demand it, to the entry and preservation of their votes on the record of the proceedings of the body, not for one day or one year only, but for all time. There the yeas and nays are to stand, forever, as permanent and lasting proof of the manner in which members have voted on great and important questions before them.

But it is now insisted that the votes of members, taken by yeas and nays, and thus entered on the journal, as matter of right, may still be expunged; so that that, which it requires more than four fifths of the Senators to prevent from being put on the journal, may, nevertheless, be struck off, and erased, the next moment, or at any period afterwards, by the will of a mere majority; or, if this be not admitted, then the absurdity is adopted of maintaining, that this provision of the constitution is fulfilled by merely preserving the yeas and nays on the journal, after having expunged and obliterated the very resolution, or the very question, on which they were given, and to which alone they refer; leaving the yeas and nays thus a mere list of names, connected with no subject, no question, no vote. We put it to the impartial judgment of mankind, if this proceeding be not, in this respect also, directly and palpably inconsistent with the constitution.

We protest, in the most solemn manner, that other Senators have no authority to deprive us of our personal rights, secured to us by the constitution, either by expunging, or obliterating, or mutilating, or defacing, the record of our votes, duly entered by yeas and nays; or by expunging and obliterating the resolutions or questions on which those votes were given and recorded.

We have seen, with deep and sincere pain, the Legislatures of respectable States instructing the Senators of those States to vote for and support this violation of the journal of the Senate; and this pain is infinitely increased by our full belief, and entire conviction, that most, if not all these proceedings of States had their origin in promptings from Washington; that they have been urgently requested and insisted on as being necessary to the accomplishment of the intended purpose; and that it is nothing else but the influence and power of the executive branch of this Government which has brought the Legislatures of so many of the free States of this Union to quit the sphere of their ordinary duties, for the purpose of co-operating to accomplish a measure, in our judgment, so unconstitutional, so derogatory to the character of the Senate, and marked with so broad an impression of compliance with power.

But this resolution is to pass. We expect it. That cause, which has been powerful enough to influence so many State Legislatures, will show itself powerful enough, especially with such aids, to secure the passage of the resolution here.

We make up our minds to behold the spectacle which is to ensue.

We collect ourselves to look on, in silence, while a scene is exhibited which, if we did not regard it as ruthless violation of a sacred instrument, would appear to us to be little elevated above the character of a contemptible farce.

This scene we shall behold, and hundreds of American citizens, as many as may crowd into these lobbies and galleries, will behold it also: with what feelings I do not undertake to say.

But we PROTEST, we most solemnly PROTEST, against the substance and against the manner of this proceeding, against its object, against its form, and against its effect. We tell you that you have no right to mar or mutilate the record of our votes given here, and recorded according to the constitution; we tell you that you may as well erase the yeas and nays on any other question or resolution, or on all questions and resolutions, as on this; we tell you that you have just as much right to falsify the record, by so altering it as to make us appear to have voted, on any question, as we did not vote, as you have to erase a record, and make that page a blank, in which our votes, as they were actually given and recorded, now stand. The one proceeding, as it appears to us, is as much a falsification of the record as the other.

Having made this PROTEST, our duty is performed. We rescue our own names, character, and honor, from all participation in this matter; and whatever the wayward character of the times, the headlong and plunging spirit of party devotion, or the fear or the love of power, may have been able to bring about elsewhere, we desire to thank God that they have not, as yet, overcome the love of liberty, fidelity to true republican principles, and a sacred regard for the constitution, in that State whose soil was drenched, to a mire, by the first and best blood of the Revolution. Massachusetts, as yet, has not been conquered; and while we have the honor to hold seats here as her Senators, we shall never consent to a sacrifice either of her rights, or our own; we shall never fail to oppose what we regard as a plain and open violation of the constitution of the country; and we should have thought ourselves wholly unworthy of her if we had not, with all the solemnity and earnestness in our power, PROTESTED against the adoption of the resolution now before the Senate.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution, as amended,

Mr. BENTON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

He then moved that the blanks in the resolution be filled by inserting the 16th day of January. It was agreed to; and, having been done,

The question was taken, by yeas and nays, on the adoption of the resolution in the following form:

Whereas, on the 26th day of December, in the year 1833, the following resolve was moved by the Senate:

“Resolved, That by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury, because he would not, contrary to his own sense of duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President’s opinion, and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people;”

Which proposed resolve was altered and changed by the mover thereof, on the 28th day of March, in the year 1834, so as to read as follows:

“Resolved, That, in taking upon himself the responsibility of removing the deposit of the public money from the Bank of the United States, the President of the United States has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people;"

Which resolve, so changed and modified by the mover thereof, on the same day and year last mentioned, was further altered, so as to read in these words:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both;"

In which last-mentioned form the said resolve, on the same day and year last mentioned, was adopted by the Senate, and became the act and judgment of that body, and, as such, now remains upon the journal thereof:

And whereas the said resolve was not warranted by the constitution, and was irregularly and illegally adopted by the Senate, in violation of the rights of defence which belong to every citizen, and in subversion of the fundamental principles of law and justice; because President Jackson was thereby adjudged and pronounced to be guilty of an impeachable offence, and a stigma placed upon him, as a violator of his oath of office, and of the laws and constitution which he was sworn to preserve, protect, and defend, without going through the forms of an impeachment, and without allowing to him the benefits of a trial, or the means of defence:

And whereas the said resolve, in all its various shapes and forms, was unfounded and erroneous in point of fact, and therefore unjust and unrighteous, as well as irregular and unauthorized by the constitution; because the said President Jackson, neither in the act of dismissing Mr. Duane, nor in the appointment of Mr. Taney, as specified in the first form of the resolve; nor in taking upon himself the responsibility of removing the deposits, as specified in the second form of the same resolve; nor in any act which was then or can now be specified under the vague and ambiguous terms of the general denunciation contained in the third and last form of the resolve, did do or commit any act in violation or in derogation of the laws and constitution, or dangerous to the liberties of the people:

And whereas the said resolve, as adopted, was uncertain and ambiguous, containing nothing but a loose and floating charge for derogating from the laws and constitution, and assuming ungranted power and authority in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue; without specifying what part of the executive proceedings, or what part of the public revenue, was intended to be referred to; or what parts of the laws and constitution were supposed to have been infringed; or in what part of the Union, or at what period of his administration, these late proceedings were supposed to have taken place; thereby putting each Senator at liberty to vote in favor of the resolve upon a separate and secret reason of his own, and leaving the ground of the Senate's judgment to be guessed at by the public, and to be differently and diversely interpreted by individual Senators, according to the private and particular understanding of each: contrary to all the ends of justice, and to all the forms of legal or judicial proceeding; to the great prejudice of the accused, who could not know against what to defend himself; and to the loss of senatorial responsibility, by shielding Senators from public accountability for making up a judgment upon grounds which the public cannot know, and which, if known, might prove to be insufficient in law, or unfounded in fact:

And whereas the specification contained in the first and second forms of the resolve having been objected to in debate, and shown to be insufficient to sustain the charges they were adduced to support, and it being well believed that no majority could be obtained to vote for the said specifications, and the same having been actually withdrawn by the mover, in the face of the whole Senate, in consequence of such objection and belief, and before any vote taken thereupon; the said specifications could not afterwards be admitted by any rule of parliamentary practice, or by any principle of legal implication, secret intendment, or mental reservation, to remain and continue a part of the written and public resolve from which they were thus withdrawn; and, if they could be so admitted, they would not be sufficient to sustain the charges therein contained:

And whereas the Senate being the constitutional tribunal for the trial of the President, when charged by the House of Representatives with offences against the laws and the constitution, the adoption of the said resolve, before any impeachment preferred by the House, was a breach of the privileges of the House; not warranted by the constitution; a subversion of justice; a prejudication of a question which might legally come before the Senate; and a disqualification of that body to perform its constitutional duty with fairness and impartiality, if the President should thereafter be regularly impeached by the House of Representatives for the same offence:

And whereas the temperate, respectful, and argumentative defence and protest of the President against the aforesaid proceeding of the Senate was rejected and repulsed by that body, and was voted to be a breach of its privileges, and was not permitted to be entered on its journal or printed among its documents; while all memorials, petitions, resolves, and remonstrances, against the President, however violent or unfounded, and calculated to inflame the people against him, were duly and honorably received, encomiastically commented upon in speeches, read at the table, ordered to be printed with the long list of names attached, referred to the Finance Committee for consideration, filed away among the public archives, and now constitute a part of the public documents of the Senate, to be handed down to the latest posterity:

And whereas the said resolve was introduced, debated, and adopted, at a time and under circumstances which had the effect of co-operating with the Bank of the United States in the parricidal attempt which that institution was then making to produce a panic and pressure in the country; to destroy the confidence of the people in President Jackson; to paralyze his administration; to govern the elections; to bankrupt the State banks; ruin their currency; fill the whole Union with terror and distress; and thereby to extort from the sufferings and the alarms of the people the restoration of the deposits and the renewal of its charter:

And whereas the said resolve is of evil example and dangerous precedent, and should never have been received, debated, or adopted by the Senate, or admitted to entry upon its journal: Wherefore,

On agreeing to this resolution, the vote was as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Moore, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—19.

Expunging Resolution.

[SENATE.]

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BENTON, observing that nothing now remained but for the Secretary to carry into effect the order of the Senate, moved that that be forthwith done.

The Secretary thereupon produced the record of the Senate, and, opening it at the page which contained the resolution to be expunged, did, in the presence of such of the members of the Senate as remained, (many having retired,) proceed to draw black lines entirely round the resolution, and to endorse across the lines the words "Expunged by order of the Senate, this 16th day of January, 1837."

No sooner had this been done, than hisses, loud and repeated, were heard from various parts of the gallery. The CHAIR, (Mr. KING, of Alabama.) Clear the galleries.

Mr. BENTON. I hope the galleries will not be cleared, as many innocent persons will be excluded, who have been guilty of no violation of order. Let the ruffians who have made the disturbance alone be apprehended. I hope the Sergeant-at-arms will be directed to enter the gallery, and seize the ruffians, ascertaining who they are in the best way he can. Let him apprehend them, and bring them to the bar of the Senate. Let him seize the bank ruffians. I hope that they will not now be suffered to insult the Senate, as they did when it was under the power of the Bank of the United States, when ruffians, with arms upon them, insulted us with impunity. Let them be taken and brought to the bar of the Senate. Here is one just above me, that may easily be identified--the bank ruffians!

The order to clear the galleries was revoked, and the Sergeant-at-arms directed to proceed into the galleries and apprehend the persons who had created the disorder. In a very few minutes the Sergeant-at-arms returned, and reported to the Chair that he had apprehended an individual, and had him in custody.

Mr. BENTON moved that he be brought to the bar of the Senate.

Mr. MORRIS opposed the motion, and demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered and taken, stood: Yeas 17, nays 8. So the motion was carried.

It was suggested by Mr. MOORE that there was not a quorum present, and the Chair at first so decided. But, on being reminded that one of the Senators from Louisiana had resigned, 25 was a majority of the 49 remaining, he declared that a quorum was present.

Mr. MOORE now moved an adjournment; but the motion was lost.

The Sergeant-at-arms now produced and presented an individual at the bar of the Senate.

[He was a tall, well-dressed man, wrapped in a black overcoat.]

Mr. BENTON said that, as the individual had been taken from among the respectable audience in the gallery, and had been presented in this public manner, with all eyes fixed upon him, he had perhaps been sufficiently punished in his feelings. Mr. B. was not disposed to push the proceedings any further, and therefore moved that he be discharged from custody.

Mr. MORRIS considered the whole proceeding as very extraordinary. If the individual had been worthy of arrest, he ought to have an opportunity of defence. A citizen had been brought to the bar of the Senate, and not informed for what reason, nor of what offence he stood charged; and now it was moved that, without a hearing, he be discharged from custody. Call you this (said Mr. M.) the justice of the Senate of the United States? Is it in this manner that citizens are to be treated? It appears to me a most extraordinary proceeding.

Mr. SEVIER moved an adjournment; but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. ROBINSON, near whose seat the person apprehended then stood, proposed that the individual have an opportunity to purge himself by oath from the contempt.

The Senate were not to presume him guilty; and if he was willing to swear that he intended no contempt, he ought to have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. MORRIS demanded the yeas and nays on the motion for his discharge; and they were ordered accordingly.

Mr. BENTON observed that if the individual was ready to go to the Clerk's table, and there, by oath, to purge himself of the contempt, he had no objection. Let him do so.

Mr. ROBINSON now stated, on behalf of the person apprehended, that he was willing and ready to answer interrogatories.

Mr. BENTON thereupon withdrew his motion for his discharge.

The CHAIR reminded him that he could not do this, inasmuch as the yeas and nays upon it had been ordered.

Mr. MORRIS was strongly opposed to having the individual suddenly, without warning, and without opportunity to consult counsel, brought forward to take his oath, and undergo interrogatories. It would be better to give him until to-morrow, that he might have some leisure for reflection. He had been brought up here before the Senate of the United States, and before the people of the United States, and to require him thus suddenly to be put upon oath in his defence was wrong.

He concluded by moving an adjournment.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. STRANGE thought that if the individual was willing now to be sworn, and to undergo interrogatories, he was certainly the best judge of his own rights. He best knew what he could undergo, and there was no need that Senators should become his advocates.

Mr. BENTON said that if the man wished to purge himself on oath, now, here, in presence of the Senate, it was very well. Let him do so. But if he wanted to go away and consult a lawyer, if he must ask a lawyer to-morrow before he could tell whether he meant to insult the Senate to-night, he was opposed to it. If he was ready to swear, let him do it, but no consulting with lawyers.

The CHAIR stated to Mr. MORRIS that the individual in custody was not brought up without a charge, as that Senator seemed to intimate. He was charged with disorderly conduct in the presence of the Senate, and the law gave the Senate, as it gave a court of justice, power to protect itself in all such cases, by a summary proceeding, and on the evidence of its own senses.

Mr. ROBINSON again said that the individual in custody wished for an opportunity of purging himself from the contempt.

Some confusion prevailed. But the motion for his discharge being pressed, the question was put, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—23.

NAY—Mr. Wall—1.

The individual was accordingly discharged from custody.

The individual referred to thereupon advanced, and, addressing the Chair, said:

"Mr. President, am I not to be permitted to speak in my own defence?"

The CHAIR, to the Sergeant-at-arms: "Take him out!"

The Senate then adjourned.

Abolition in the District of Columbia.

ABOLITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. KENT, having presented a memorial from the grand jury of Washington county, protesting against the interference of citizens from distant States in respect to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, moved that it be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. MORRIS rose and said that he had hundreds of petitions to present for the abolition of slavery; and, therefore, he would ask for the yeas and nays on the question of printing the memorial which had just been presented. Not ordered.

Mr. HUBBARD suggested to the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. KENT,] whether it would not be as well to print an extra number of copies of this important document, for the purpose of distribution, as it might be productive of good.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he would make that motion. It was a most important paper, and there was one part of it at which he most heartily rejoiced. It took the true position—that abolition petitions should not be received. There was a dangerous and mischievous spirit at work in various parts of the country, connected with this question. It was only at the last session that he had contended for what the memorialists suggest to Congress. He had urged that very point, and he found himself in a very considerable minority. He hoped that such would not be the case now he was supporting this motion. He would second the motion of the Senator from Ohio, trusting that he would renew it, and be indulged with the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUBBARD remarked that he had suggested to the Senator the printing of an extra number, not on account of his own feelings particularly, but because he believed the proceedings of individuals in different parts of the country on this subject were predicated upon the supposed fact that the people living in the District of Columbia were in favor of the abolition of slavery from among them.

Mr. WALL said that he was in favor of printing the usual number. He confessed that it did appear to him a most singular thing, that gentlemen who claimed the right to petition should protest against others having the right to do the same thing. And, although the gentleman from South Carolina had expressed his congratulation at the sentiments avowed by the memorialists, they seemed to him (Mr. W.) totally at war with the fundamental principles of our constitution. He was sorry to see any body of men—respectable as he had no doubt the petitioners were—act upon the high ground that they had a right to petition, and that others, taking a different view of the question, were not entitled to have their petitions received by Congress. He was perfectly willing that they should enjoy their own rights; for he acknowledged, in the utmost extent, the right of petition, as one of the most sacred rights of the people of this country. It was a right which Congress did not give. It was a right which they could not take away. And he was not disposed, for one, to countenance the idea that the Senate could take away the right of petition from any part of this great community, or favor the claims made by one portion of the public, and at the same time deny the right of the other to present their petitions. He declared that he would give no countenance whatever to the sentiments of the memorialists, so far as to vote for publishing an additional number of copies. He was willing to vote for the printing of the memorial, because it was couched in respectful language. And for the reason that gentlemen were interested in the subject, he was for giving every opportunity for a fair, calm, and dispassionate investigation into what they asked. But he would not, he repeated, honor the memorial by having an additional number of it printed at the expense of the United States, because it contained, as he conceived, a principle altogether subversive of the rights of the whole community.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that there was a very marked difference between receiving petitions, the effect of which was to deprive men of what belonged to them, and doing so for the purpose of defending their rights and their property. Slaves were as much the property of the latter, as stocks, houses, or lands, were of those who would deprive them of their rights and property. These petitioners prayed that all good citizens would cease to project acts of robbery upon them. The Senator from New Jersey put both classes of petitioners upon the same footing. Those (concluded Mr. C.) who claim to disturb a man of his property shall not be heard. If one petition is to be rejected, the other is to be rejected. The memorialists have a right to be heard, and they have a right to insist that those who come here to disturb their property shall not be heard.

Mr. NILES said that the question was not whether petitioners in general stood upon a somewhat different ground from the present residents in the District of Columbia, but whether the subject-matter was proper for Congress to entertain, even so far as to print a petition, which might operate on public sentiment. For his own part, he wished that Congress would act decidedly on this agitating topic. He had no doubt that these petitioners had a deep interest in what they requested. But, nevertheless, the question was the same as respected both classes of petitioners, and was one which Congress could not go into at all. When the subject was not at present discussed by the public, and when it was desirable that tranquillity should be preserved, why, he asked, should the Senate of the United States agitate the question now? He recollected perfectly well, that at the last session the gentleman from South Carolina went so far as to protest against the reception of a single petition, though, to be sure, coming from those not having the same interest as the gentlemen whose memorial was now before the Senate, but still such an interest as gave them a right to come here. The rule in regard to the right of petition must apply equally and fairly, and give no preference to one portion of the community over another. He was, then, he must say, altogether opposed to printing the memorial, and should vote against the adoption of that course. The printing of an extra number of copies would produce no good effect, but, on the contrary, would cause the subject to be again agitated in various parts of the Union. His honorable friend [Mr. HUBBARD] seemed to think that by the distribution of the memorial a good effect might be produced on the public mind. He could not agree with him on that point, and must repeat that the subject was one which Congress ought not to entertain, inasmuch as it was not proper that they should act on one side of the question and not on the other.

Mr. BROWN said he intended to vote against the extra number. If he were to vote to print an extraordinary number of the memorial sent here by the grand jury, it would imply that there was some danger of Congress being about to legislate on the subject. He repeated, that should an extra number be ordered, the idea would be spread abroad, and reasons given to suspect, that Congress intended to act in the matter. Now, as he did not believe that there was the slightest ground for any such apprehension, as no such action was entertained by either branch of the National Legislature, he was utterly averse to do any act which had a tendency to create that idea. But, besides that, it did appear to him somewhat novel to ask for the printing of an extraordinary number of a document coming from private individuals.

Abolition in the District of Columbia.

[SENATE]

Undoubtedly the proper course of gentlemen was, not to do any act here which would promote agitation. Now, he contended that the printing of the document in question, and the dissemination of it throughout the country, did, in some degree, tend to increase the agitation in reference to this question.

Why, then, he would ask, should the Senate of the United States lend its sanction to a course which would induce the country to believe that it purposed acting on the subject of slavery? There being no ground to apprehend any such movement on the part of Congress, he would do nothing to lend his sanction to the supposition that Congress intended to interfere with the matter.

Mr. CALHOUN thought it most extraordinary that Senators should put on a level petitioners who had nothing to lose, with the petitioners whose memorial had just been read. Did the Senator from North Carolina mean to say that when men all over the country were agitating the question of the abolition of slavery, that these petitioners, and others situated like them, who had a great interest in this matter, on account of their property, were to close their mouths? Had they not a right to express their assent or dissent? And had not one side a right to express their opinion with regard to the other? Was this the language of the Senator? Was the Senate to understand the honorable Senator from Connecticut that slaveholders had no more claim to be heard than those who were disturbing their interests? This was indeed most extraordinary. He looked upon this as a very calm remonstrance on the part of this respectable grand jury; and he was very happy that the Senator from New Hampshire had thought it proper that the memorial should be distributed among the people; for it would show that what was about to be done was an act of robbery.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, observed that he should vote for the printing of the memorial with great pleasure, but he would not do so if aware that it came from a set of fanatics who were disturbing the quiet of the country, and endeavoring to bring about a dissension. Congress were the sole legislators of the District, as he had been reminded, and they were bound to receive the memorials with proper attention and respect. He hoped that a proper spirit would be manifested with respect to other memorials, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MORRIS] had said he had some hundreds. He maintained that Congress were bound to protect the people of the District of Columbia in their rights. He did not know, however, that the Senate were bound to order an extra number of copies of the memorial to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS, after stating what was the language of the memorialists, remarked that he entirely approved of the sentiments expressed by the Senator from New Jersey, for they were precisely his own. The question then was, "shall this paper be printed?" He was disposed to vote for the printing of it, because he believed it of the highest importance, and one that should be given to the community; for it was desirable that they should be in possession of every thing that was calculated to throw light on the subject. If the memorialists were correct in principle, and if, by their arguments, they should be able to convince the country that the question of slavery ought not to be touched by Congress, a desirable object might be attained; or if, on the other hand, their reasons should be considered unsound, and not founded in justice and truth, they would at least have been presented to the people of the United States, as those of a respectable body of men, speaking according to the dictates of their consciences. He was ready and willing to vote for printing the usual number of copies. He wished that this paper was in the hands of every citizen of the United States; and if his vote and voice could effect that object, he would do it instantly. Why?

That each might read and judge for himself. It was not now necessary to presume upon what would be the action of Congress on the subject, when other petitions should hereafter be presented. Whether they would be ordered to be printed, or received, he would not pretend to anticipate. But with respect to this memorial, it did appear to him that it was desirable it should be printed; even out of courtesy to the mover, if for no other reason, who was the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the representative of an adjoining State, which felt great interest in the subject.

Mr. BROWN understood the honorable Senator from South Carolina to ask the question, whether he (Mr. B.) desired to array the interests of one great section of the country against the other?

Mr. CALHOUN explained, that he had asked the Senator from North Carolina whether he would put in the same scale those petitioners whose rights were not affected, with those whose rights were disturbed and threatened with annihilation?

Mr. BROWN replied, certainly not. Those whose property was involved had every right to petition and protest in every way. He had made no objection to the printing of the usual number of copies of the memorial. But what rights were compromised, what rights were violated, by not printing an extraordinary number of the document proposed to be printed?

This was indeed a novel doctrine, and a mode of violating rights he did not understand. He had resisted at the last session the printing of petitions on this subject, in whatever shape they might be presented. But in this case, as the rights of the petitioners were involved, he would consent to depart from the rule then acted on by him. He would take this occasion to say that he believed now, as he had ever believed, that the discussion of this question here, so far from being beneficial to those whose rights were involved, was imminently detrimental to them.

The Senate were told that the subject was agitating in different parts of the country at this time. He thought that it was but the other day that the Legislature of New York, when some petitions were presented on a subject having relation to this question, met them with the most decided rebuke. In conclusion, he would again assert that there was no agitation in the halls of Congress on the subject, and he could not see the slightest necessity for taking the course proposed.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that it was of very great importance that the petitioners should be protected in their rights; should be heard here. He did not mean to agitate (as the gentleman from North Carolina seemed to suppose he did) the question of abolition. But what he intended to say was, that those whose interests were deeply affected by the agitation of this question had a right to demand to be heard, at least as much so as those who sent their petitions here, and who had nothing to lose. He, (Mr. C.) in speaking of the respectable gentlemen who composed the grand jury, had said nothing more concerning them than was due to them and their rights.

Mr. BROWN said he had made no reference to the grand jury; but merely alluded to those who were discussing the subject here.

Mr. CALHOUN repelled the insinuation thrown out by the Senators from New Jersey and North Carolina, in regard to his creating an excitement on the subject. He denied that he had said any thing to produce excitement. He did not wish to see any agitation, nor would he be the means of causing it. But with respect to the people of the District of Columbia, when their rights were affected, they were compelled to look to Congress for protection. And when they deemed it proper to send a petition here, he would say, that if no one else present chose to hear it, he would. As to the people of the States, they could be heard by their own Legislatures; and if they were not able to protect themselves, they would not receive protection from any quarter.

Mr. KENT made a few remarks, bearing testimony to the respectful language of the memorialists.

Mr. LINN said he would be pleased to know whether any practical benefits were likely to grow out of circulating, by order of the Senate, copies of the document now proposed to be printed. What, he asked, was the proper remedy for the evil of which the people of the District of Columbia complained, and concerning which they had directed the attention of Congress? Was their property in danger? Were the laws insufficient to protect their slaves? If so, let us then march directly up to the subject, and enact such as will afford ample security. For measures of a practical nature, he would give his vote with great pleasure. He said he was well aware that questions of this kind came up here, and incidentally impressed persons at a distance with the idea that Congress wished to deprive them of the right to be heard here, and of the right to petition. Nothing, in his opinion, was more erroneous. Refuse to receive and hear an abolition petition, and you render the abolitionists a thousand times more active and industrious in propagating their doctrines, and more successful in enlisting the sympathies in their favor of those who believed in the inherent right of the people to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances. He never had voted, nor never would vote, for the printing and disseminating an abolition memorial; so likewise he would not lend his aid for the printing of this document in favor of slavery.

On the great question of slavery, the constitution and laws would find ample support in the good sense of the great body of the American people. He gave it as his opinion, that to insure tranquillity was to let this exciting topic alone.

Mr. WALL would say a few words, by way of explanation. He was for treating all petitioners with proper respect, and regarding their petitions in accordance with the motives and intentions which seemed to have originated them. But he did not rate all petitioners on the same footing with these, as the Senator from South Carolina seemed to suppose. I conceive (said Mr. W.) we stand here in relation to the people of the United States as having duties on our part to perform, and they having rights which they may insist upon. And one of their rights, unquestionably, is the right to petition; and when their petition is received, our duty commences. We are to exercise our judgment, to examine and deliberate as to the manner in which we shall dispose of that petition. Now, whenever those persons who are called abolitionists seek to interfere with the subject, I would receive their petition; and then their rights end, and my duties begin. I would examine that petition, and if, in my judgment, in the exercise of my legislative duty, it became necessary that I should not further act on that petition, and that it should be laid on the table, I would have no hesitation in doing so. And I maintain that, in doing so, they would have no right to complain.

When I stated that I was in favor of printing this petition, I drew the broad line of distinction between what I would concede to those who consider their rights attacked, and those who conceive they are acting under the impulse of high and general feelings of philanthropy. I would accord to both something, on account of the motives actuating them. I would give them equal credit for good and honest purposes. But when I am asked to vote for printing an extra number of the petition, although connected, as it is, with men of respectability, I am called to look at my duty, and at the consequences that will result from printing these copies. Whether or not it is to provoke controversy, to produce agitation, and put in danger the property they would take care of, I believe it is not to the interest of the petitioners that there should be any more copies printed than the usual number.

I am perfectly willing that the ordinary number should be ordered; and I hope that the gentleman will not insist on his motion. I trust that no improper motives will be attributed to these petitioners, nor to any other persons who may petition Congress. But, in my humble judgment, the printing of an extra number can produce no salutary effect to the petitioners themselves, and no good to the community. It will not promote the peace and happiness of the Union. It will produce controversy and disputation on this floor and in the other House. And if we are to give circulation to sentiments expressed by these petitioners, can we, with a proper sense of justice, withhold from those who choose to utter their sentiments on the other side of the question the same privilege? I would, then, ask gentlemen to look at the consequences which may result from being gratified in the application to print an extra number of copies. It is my deliberate opinion they ought not to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS renewed his motion for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

And the question was then taken on printing the usual number of copies: Yeas 34, nays 5.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then proceeded to the order of the day, which was the consideration of Mr. WALKER's land bill.

Mr. MORRIS made an effort to have the consideration of the bill postponed, but without success. He then went at length into a statement of his objection to the bill as reported by the Committee on Public Lands, and his reasons for preferring it in the form in which he had himself introduced it into the Senate. He compared the two, section by section; and having concluded,

Mr. EWING moved the postponement of the further consideration of the bill to Friday next.

Mr. WALKER opposed this, lest the passage of the bill might be endangered, and demanded the yeas and nays; which being taken, were: Yeas 14, nays 18.

So the Senate refused to postpone the bill.

Mr. MORRIS then offered an amendment, embracing the principle of graduation in the price of land in proportion to the time it had been offered for sale; which, after some brief discussion, was agreed to: Yeas 19, nays 18.

Mr. MORRIS proposed a further amendment, on which much desultory debate took place, and several modifications were suggested, and in part agreed to; but before any thing was decided respecting them,

The Senate, on motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, went into executive business,

And afterwards adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 18.

Mr. CUTHBERT, of Georgia, appeared and took his seat.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill to limit the sales of the public lands except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities, came up as the special order.

Mr. WALKER proposed, as no gentleman seemed ready to go on with the discussion, to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. CLAY expressed a wish for a postponement to a later period. He expressed his opposition to the bill throughout, and said that he would be able to demonstrate conclusively, that instead of preventing speculations in the public lands, and limiting the sales, it would increase the sales to a great degree, and operate as an encouragement to speculation.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, after a few remarks, moved to postpone the bill until Monday.

Mr. WALKER objected to the postponement to so late a day as Monday, on the ground that, this being a short session, it would endanger the passage of the bill. He wished the bill to be taken up to-morrow, and for the discussion to go on while gentlemen were preparing their amendments. He knew that it could not be passed without considerable discussion; and, therefore, the sooner that discussion commenced, the better the chance the bill would have of being brought to a final decision before the close of the session. If a postponement should be ordered, he hoped that it would not be to a later day than Friday next.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, did not wish to prevent any gentleman from having a fair opportunity of expressing his opinions on the subject, and was willing to allow a reasonable time to make the bill as perfect in its details as possible. With regard to what had fallen from the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] he presumed that it was not his intention to throw any unnecessary impediment in the way of passing this bill. It was not to its details, but to the great principle of it, that the Senator objected; and he would take the occasion to say that it would puzzle that gentleman's ingenuity to show (as he had said he could do) that there were provisions in the bill that would lead to more speculation than was practised under the present system of conducting land sales. No matter what measure should be devised, it was more than any man could do to prevent speculation altogether. But the friends of the bill believed that much could be done towards limiting its extent, and therefore were anxious to give their plan a fair trial.

Now, as to disposing of the bill, he would prefer that the Senate should go on with it to-morrow, and gentlemen could, in the mean time, prepare such amendments as they might wish to offer. He would now repeat, what he had said when he arose, that he was willing to give a reasonable time for the discussion; but beyond the time he had mentioned he was not disposed to go. He hoped the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] would consider it his duty to the Senate and to the country to take up the bill as early as possible, and then gentlemen would have an opportunity of discussing the subject.

The question was then taken, and the further consideration of the bill was postponed till Friday next.

FRENCH AND NEAPOLITAN INDEMNITIES.

Mr. WRIGHT, chairman of the Committee on Finance, moved that the Senate proceed to consider the bill to anticipate the payment of the indemnities stipulated in the treaties with France and the Two Sicilies.

After some opposition, the motion was agreed to, and the bill taken up.

Mr. WRIGHT proceeded to explain the grounds of the bill. Under our treaty with France, there remained due to this Government two of the instalments of the indemnities stipulated by that treaty to be paid to our citizens for spoliation on their commerce during the reign of Napoleon. One of these would fall due on the 23d of February, 1837, and would be realized in the May following. A second would fall due on the 2d of February, 1838, and would be realized in May of that year. Assuming the whole indemnity at five millions, the amount of these two instalments would be one million and two thirds. The indemnity stipulated in our treaty with the Two Sicilies was payable in nine instalments; three of which have been already paid, and six remain still due. They were payable annually on the 8th of June, and would, in regular course, be realized by this Government some months after. The amount of these six instalments was $1,123,000. All these indemnities, both the French and the Neapolitan, stood at four per cent. The result, therefore, of the present bill would be the payment to our own citizens of about $2,800,000, and placing that sum at an interest of four per cent. until, by the gradual payment of the instalments, the whole should return into the Treasury. One half of that paid under the French treaty would be reimbursed in May next; and one sixth of that payable under the Neapolitan treaty would come back into the Treasury in the fall of the present year. The provisions of the bill were simple, and needed, as he presumed, no farther explanation.
